The letter writer said he would offer proof for free that he had valuable information but that PepsiCo better be ready to act fast.

PepsiCo faxed the letter to Coke executives, who contacted the FBI on May 24, 2006.

An undercover FBI agent posing as a PepsiCo go-between called the phone number listed for Dirk and reached Ibrahim Dimson, a New York resident. The agent negotiated to pay Dimson what amounted to a $5,000 deposit on June 8.

Dimson told the agent he had a product sample and they negotiated a $75,000 payment — $30,000 up front and $45,000 after the product was delivered.

By June 12, Coke had set up a camera at Williams' work station to record her movements. She worked as an administrative assistant for a marketing executive at Coke, scheduling his appointments and managing logistics for him. She also had access to his e-mails, prosecutors said.

On June 16, Dimson met with the agent at Hartsfield-Jackson Airport to make the exchange. The agent passed Dimson $30,000 in a Girl Scout Lemon Cooler cookie box. Dimson passed the sample in an Armani bag.

The next day, Duhaney got $8,000 from Dimson. He kept $2,000 and gave $6,000 to Williams. She deposited $4,000 into her bank account two days later.

On June 19, the camera at Williams' work station captured her putting a product sample in her bag. She also printed three copies of a an e-mail from her boss's account with the codename "project normandie."

On June 22, Dimson gave the undercover agent a list of documents he said he had from Coke. The two negotiated a $1.5 million payment. Dimson provided a bank account for a trucking business he set up.

A few days later, Williams was recorded taking more documents from Coke in a Staples box that was later found at Duhaney's house.

On June 29, the agent paid Dimson $10,000 through a wire transfer. Dimson then wrote a check to withdraw the money.

Dimson was arrested July 5 at a Marriot hotel near Perimeter Mall. Agents searched the homes of Williams, Dimson and Duhaney.

Prosecutors say the plot started in Nov. 2005, when Williams asked family friend Edmond Duhaney to come to her Norcross apartment. There he showed her stacks of documents from Coke. She told Duhaney she couldn't sell the documents because she signed a confidentiality agreement, but that Duhaney could, prosectors allege.

Duhaney, a convicted cocaine dealer, shopped the documents around but no one was interested until he reached Dimson, a man he had met in prison in Alabama.

Dimson, who served time for white collar fraud, flew to Atlanta to see the documents. The two then conspired with Williams to organize and sell the materials.

Defense attorney Singer, appointed by the court to defend Williams, told jurors that Duhaney and Dimson plotted the conspiracy behind Williams' back. She said Williams was taken advantage of by two "seasoned cons."

Singer said Duhaney had asked Williams for help with his resume, and during a visit to her apartment he saw the boxes of Coke documents.

"He saw an opportunity and began hatching his scheme," Singer said of Duhaney.

Singer said Williams, who grew up in Decatur and has a business degree from Georgia State University, was in her dream job. But health problems and demands of the job took their toll. Williams' performance was "forgetful" and flighty" and she wasn't getting her work done, Singer said, adding that co-workers and her boss took notice and she feared being fired.

Williams began copying every document and e-mail she touched to prove she was doing her job, Singer said. She didn't copy them to give to Duhaney or Dimson, Singer insisted.

Singer said Williams carried out materials in plain view and pointed out with surveillance tapes that her desk was in plain view of other workers.

Singer said when Duhaney saw the documents, he brought in Dimson to look at them because of his business experience.

Dimson then began romancing Williams, Singer said. Duhaney also convinced Williams to let Duhaney stay with her while he got back on his feet. It was a pretense to get access to the Coke documents, Singer said.

"At no time did Joya give these two cons anything," Singer told the jury.

Coke Espionage Case Moves On (WXIA)

By Jon Shirek

WXIA-TV, January 23, 2007

A government witness testified in Atlanta on Monday that a Coca-Cola employee stole secret documents from company headquarters, then recruited him to try to sell the documents to rival Pepsi.

But the now-former Coke employee blames her accuser, and insists she had nothing to do with any of it.

The former Coke employee who is on trial is Joya Williams. She could go to prison for up to ten years if she's convicted of the single count against her -- conspiring to steal and sell Coke's trade secrets.

In court, the prosecutor said that the case against Williams is a case about greed.

The prosecutor, Randy Chartash, showed the jury surveillance photos of Joya Williams at her desk at Coke's headquarters in Atlanta last year -- taken after the FBI began investigating her -- showing Williams filling her personal bag with company documents, and with bottles of brand new Coca-Cola drinks that were in development.

Then the jury heard a family friend of Williams, Edmund Duhaney, testify that Williams invited him to her apartment a year ago and showed him the Coke secrets that she had taken piled on her coffee table.

He said she told him the material would be worth a lot of money to Coke's competitors, such as Pepsi, and she needed his help.

So, Duhaney testified, he and another man, Ibrahim Dimson, launched a scheme to write a Pepsi executive that they had "very detailed and confidential information about Coca Cola's marketing campaigns for the next 4 years."

And they offered to sell the secrets to the highest bidder -- never knowing that Pepsi told Coke about the letter, Coke told the FBI, and the FBI set up the sting that led to the arrests last summer of Williams and the two men.

The two men pleaded guilty.

Williams' attorney, Janice Singer, told the jury that Williams was always taking work home with her, including confidential Coke documents and other items, all openly, in full view of Coke security -- nothing sinister about any of it.

Not in any way, shape or form, Singer said, was Williams ever involved with the two men to steal Coke secrets and sell them.

The men stole the confidential material from Williams' apartment, Singer said, and then blamed Williams when they got caught.

The government's evidence against Williams involves and includes the Coke secrets she is accused of trying to sell. So Coca-Cola has several attorneys sitting in the courtroom, conferring with prosecutors and with the judge, to make sure no Coca-Cola company secrets are disclosed in open court, but only to the jury.

The trial is expected to last up to two weeks.

Secretary Stole Coke Secrets, Jurors Told (FLSUNSEN/AP)

By Harry R. Weber, The Associated Press

South Florida Sun-Sentinel, January 23, 2007

ATLANTA · A former secretary at The Coca-Cola Co. was angry at her employer for not treating her well and hatched a plan to steal trade secrets from the beverage maker to sell to rival PepsiCo Inc., a co-defendant testified Monday at the woman's conspiracy trial.

Edmund Duhaney, who pleaded guilty in the case and agreed to testify, told jurors that Joya Williams said the documents and product samples -- which include information about the company's new coffee-infused drink, Coca-Cola Blak -- could be worth a lot of money to a competitor.

"She made a statement, `This happens all the time in corporate America' -- that Pepsi, the rival company, would be interested in this," Duhaney said, recalling an April 2006 meeting with Williams and another co-defendant, Ibrahim Dimson.

Duhaney also testified that Williams was angry at the world's largest beverage maker.

"She felt she wasn't being treated right at her job," Duhaney said. He added, "She let it be known that, `People think I'm stupid, but I'm not stupid.'"

Duhaney said Williams told him she had been planning the scheme for some time, copying confidential documents little by little.

Williams faces up to 10 years in prison if convicted of the single federal conspiracy charge against her. She has pleaded not guilty. Williams remains free on bond pending the outcome of the trial. Duhaney and Dimson have pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing.

Williams, Duhaney and Dimson were indicted in July, accused of stealing new product samples and confidential documents from The Coca-Cola Co. and trying to sell them to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc.

The alleged conspiracy was foiled after Pepsi warned Atlanta-based Coca-Cola, and an undercover FBI investigation was launched.

Williams was fired from her job as an administrative assistant to Coca-Cola's global brand director after the allegations came to light.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Randy Chartash told jurors during his opening statement Monday that Williams was the one who first approached the two co-defendants in the case about selling Coca-Cola documents and samples of products that hadn't been launched to rival Pepsi.

But defense lawyer Janice Singer said the case is really about two ex-cons who duped Williams and conspired behind her back.

Subpoenas Raise New Questions (HILL)

By Susan Crabtree

The Hill, January 23, 2007

A flurry of subpoenas issued late last year to three powerful House committees and two staffers are raising new questions about House policies on document retention as well as internal House rules governing response to subpoenas.

A U.S. district court in San Diego sent subpoenas to the House Appropriations, Armed Services and Intelligence committees late in the year, according to notices in the Dec. 27 and Jan. 4 editions of the Congressional Record.

Elizabeth Phillips, an Appropriations staffer, and Rebecca Kuhn, who formerly worked as ex-Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham's (R-Calif.) executive assistant, were also subpoenaed to testify, according to letters they submitted to then-House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), as required by House rules.

The subpoenas originally carried a Jan. 11 deadline, but the assistant U.S. attorney's office in San Diego has extended it to Jan. 31 to give the new Democratic majority and new leaders of the three committees time to "compile documents that are responsive to the subpoena," said Drew Hammill, spokesman for Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.)

The subpoenas stem from the case against Cunningham, a former member of the Appropriations and Intelligence panels who is serving eight years in prison for accepting more than $2.4 million in bribes in exchange for earmarking government contracts. A grand jury in San Diego has been considering evidence against Brent Wilkes, a defense contractor who is accused of conspiring with Cunningham.

The U.S. attorney's office in San Diego first requested thousands of pages of documents from the panels last spring through a letter to the House general counsel. The subsequent subpoenas are an indication that federal prosecutors were concerned late last year that the committees were not voluntarily handing over the previously requested files, which, according to media reports, include classified documents relating to secret CIA contracts and a 59-page classified report into Cunningham's activities produced last fall by an investigator working on an internal probe for the House Intelligence panel.

Rep. Pete Hoekstra (R-Mich.), ranking member on the House Intelligence Committee, said in an interview that he was surprised by the subpoena because the committee was "working with" the Department of Justice last fall.

"… All of the sudden we got popped with a subpoena," he said in an interview Thursday.

Josh Holly, a spokesman for Republicans on the House Armed Services Committee, said that his boss, then-Chairman Duncan Hunter (R-Calif.), and top panel aides also were in the process of cooperating with prosecutors and were even setting up a time for the U.S. attorney to meet with Hunter and committee staff when the subpoena came.

Holly said the aides had reviewed the correspondence between Cunningham and the committee and "nothing came up as improper."

Spokesmen for other committee chairmen or ranking members either declined to comment or did not respond to calls for comment. Prosecutors in the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego also declined to comment on the subpoenas, as did a Justice Department spokesman.

House leaders now must decide whether to invoke the Speech or Debate Clause, which provides protections for members of Congress and staff, just as House GOP and Democratic leaders did in May after the FBI raided the office of Rep. William Jefferson (D-La.).

But the timing of the subpoenas' public disclosure raises other questions about internal House policies.

It is unclear when the committees received the subpoenas and whether the then-GOP committee chairmen who received them chose to wait until after Congress formally adjourned in December to disclose them publicly as a way to deflect attention.

The House rule governing responses to subpoenas only dictates that a member, officer or staffer notify the Speaker in writing "promptly."

And the Speaker has broad latitude in when he or she must respond to a notification. If the subpoena comes during a recess, the rules only state that "notification is not required until the reconvening of the House, when the notification shall promptly be laid before the House by the Speaker," according to the rules.

A Hastert spokesman declined to comment on when the subpoenas were served.

"Any good lawyer can argue what the definition of 'promptly' means," said Stan Brand, a former House general counsel.

In fact, in late December, the Los Angeles Times reported that former Rep. Curt Weldon (R-Pa.) had received a subpoena for documents before the election as a part of an escalating Justice Department corruption probe against him but had failed to report that subpoena to the House, as the rules require.

A review of the Congressional Record details a letter dated Dec. 14, which Weldon sent to Hastert, acknowledging the subpoena. The letter, however, did not appear until early January because Weldon had sent it after Congress adjourned for the year. Weldon lost his reelection race to Democrat Joe Sestak, a retired Navy vice admiral.

Weldon's attorney, William Canfield, said that he could not recall exactly when his client first received the subpoena, but believed it was before the election.

"My instinct tells me it was before the election," Canfield said.

The late disclosure of Weldon's subpoena, as well as the separate subpoenas to the committees and staffers, which all came after Congress formally adjourned, also raise questions about whether anyone in the House did anything to protect the documents, electronic or otherwise. According to two outside sources, the Chief Administrative Officer's office routinely erases the contents of members and staffers' computers once they leave the House.

Once subpoenas are issued, however, leaders in the House and Senate, as well as the general counsel, are legally required to make an effort to preserve documents and ensure they are not being inadvertently or purposefully deleted or destroyed. Because of the Democratic takeover, Republicans lost numerous committee staffers, making efforts to maintain documents even more important.

"If no one took any steps to protect these documents," Brand said, "then that's a major legal problem."

Several calls to the House general counsel's office were not returned.

House Administration Committee spokeswoman Janice Crump declined to comment about what became of the computers of staffers who were let go after the election, referring all questions to the general counsel's office. In response to a question about Weldon's electronic documents, she said that House policy allows all members who are leaving the House for any reason to remove their entire content of their hard drives and take it with them.

"It was done this way to get out of the middle of any possible litigation to allow the Justice Department to contact the member about any information that was either on the computer or was part of his records while he was here," she said.

Generally, she said, members are allowed to take their papers with them and "this is just the 21st-century way of saying that they can take their electronic records with them."

Hoekstra said he met with the committee's Republican and Democratic counsels late last week and walked away confident that no relevant Intelligence panel documents were destroyed.

"There is no concern on anybody's part that there might have been documents of interest that somehow have gone into a shredder or e-mail wastebasket," he said. "Anything or everything that might be of interest is fully available."

Hoekstra explained that the committee found and saved any and all relevant e-mails when it conducted an internal investigation into the Cunningham matter last year. Hoekstra was angered when Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.), who served as the panel's ranking member at the time, released the internal report before the election. The report triggered concerns about how Cunningham used his status and influence over committee staff to get Pentagon contracts for political supporters.

"We are the only committee that when this Cunningham thing started, went out in a bipartisan basis and selected an independent attorney to come in and take a look at anything and everything that went on in the committee," Hoekstra said. "… And [that material is] still available."

Hoekstra, along with the general counsel, and House leaders are still determining whether to hand over that material along with any other documents that fall under the subpoena.

"House counsel along with the general counsel [and Democratic and GOP leaders] will have discussions with Justice to see exactly what the most effective and most appropriate way to address [the subpoena are]," he said.

Judge decides Gardiner didn't know of other bribes, inflated bills

Disgraced educator John Gardiner was placed in a wheelchair to be returned to prison Monday after a judge refused a plea for home confinement but did slice five months off Gardiner's original sentence.

Gardiner, the former superintendent of East Detroit Public Schools, had sought a reduced sentence for his conviction in what has been called the largest public corruption scandal in Macomb County history.

However, U.S. District Court Judge Patrick Duggan issued a new sentence of 41 months in a federal prison in Morgantown, W.Va., reduced from the original sentence of up to 46 months for convictions on racketeering and extortion.

"Dr. Gardiner has maintained he is not guilty and he has the right to feel that way, but a jury has found him guilty," Duggan said.

Monday's sentencing hearing was ordered after the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled Duggan made an error at Gardiner's original sentencing because of confusion over mandatory sentencing guidelines.

At Monday's hearing, it was possible for the judge to add another year onto the original sentence. Instead, Duggan's new calculation resulted in a range of 37 to 46 months, and he opted for five fewer months.

Gardiner, who has been in prison for 22 months, will likely now be released from prison in March of 2008 instead of August 2008.

The 74-year-old Gardiner was among 20 people named in a 35-count indictment handed down by the U.S. Justice Department. They were charged with accepting hundreds of thousands of dollars in gifts, vacations, cash, and home improvements financed by contractor William Hudson Jr.

In return, Gardiner and others helped arrange lucrative contracts for school bond work to Hudson, who also is in prison for his part in the scandal.

In deciding a new sentence, the judge had to decide whether Gardiner's conduct furthered the overall conspiracy and whether the loss to the district could have been reasonably foreseen by the former superintendent while in office.

Margaret Sind Raben, Gardiner's attorney, argued that the former superintendent was not aware of some $2 million in inflated bills submitted by Hudson. She said Hudson had his own relationship with assistant superintendents who approved the doctored bills that gave Hudson more money than he was owed while working on a bond construction program for East Detroit Public Schools.

Raben also pointed out Gardiner's deteriorating health should be a factor in reducing the sentence because he is legally blind and has health issues.

John Engstrom, the assistant U.S. Attorney for the case, said Gardiner accepted $150,000 in bribes from Hudson to have "willful blindness" to paperwork Hudson submitted for payment.

Gardiner accepted a $40,000 down payment for a new home from Hudson along with home improvements, and $12,000 for a house down payment for Gardiner's daughter, according to the Justice Department.

Hudson took in at least $2.4 million legally as the contractor for a $30 million bond issue for East Detroit.

The Justice Department also contends Gardiner drew up a phony contract for Hudson to use to obtain a $600,000 loan from the Bank of Bloomfield Hills when Hudson needed money to pay off his tax debts to the IRS. That showed Gardiner was aware of the criminal enterprise beyond East Detroit, according to Engstrom.

Duggan said it was a "close question" as to whether Gardiner was fully aware of the inflated bills. "He could be criticized for now being more careful," the judge said.

In the end, Duggan said he did not find evidence that Gardiner had a larger role in the conspiracy or knew how much it would cost East Detroit Public Schools.

When Gardiner was asked if he wished to make a statement, the ex-superintendent slowly stood, with his hands on his hips, and continued to maintain his innocence.

"Being involved in the business matters of the district was not my favorite thing," he said. "If I failed on that extent, I apologize."

Engstrom said Gardiner has only tried to minimize his involvement with the conspiracy by blaming his underlings.

"He has shown very little or no remorse to the school district. He's only concerned about his reputation in the future," Engstrom said.

After Monday's hearing, the U.S. Marshal's Service placed Gardiner in a wheelchair and prepared to take him back to a federal prison in Milan, Mich., where he will be housed until he is airlifted back to West Virginia to finish his sentence.

"Bye bye," he said to his wife and daughter as he was wheeled from the courtroom.

CDC Adviser Arrested For Urinal Incident (AP)

AP, January 23, 2007

A prominent public health expert who is a top adviser to federal health agencies was arrested on suspicion of public indecency in an airport men's room.

Dr. Hugh H. Tilson, 67, was arrested Jan. 16 at Hartsfield-Jackson Atlanta International Airport after a plainclothes police officer said he saw Tilson masturbating at a urinal while watching other men urinate.

Tilson, a part-time faculty member at the University of North Carolina's School of Public Health, has advised the government and industry on health issues and co-authored an influential 1988 report on the future of public health in the U.S.

Tilson recently co-chaired a task force advising the Atlanta-based federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention on setting agency priorities and goals. He was visiting Atlanta last week for a senior leadership retreat with CDC Director Julie Gerberding and others.

CDC spokesman Glen Nowak said Monday that agency officials had just learned of Tilson's arrest. The agency had no comment "because it's a law enforcement matter," he said.

Tilson could not immediately be reached for comment at his UNC office or Raleigh, N.C., home, or through his university e-mail.

UNC officials issued a statement that clarified that Tilson is not a classroom instructor. "The university takes the charges seriously. We think it is important to let the Georgia judicial system resolve the case," the statement said.

Public indecency is a city code violation, which is considered of less consequence than a misdemeanor, according to a police report. Tilson posted a $500 bond and was released, and is to return to Atlanta next month for a court appearance.

Ex-Church Official Guilty In Porn Case (AP)

By John Christoffersen, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 23, 2007

(AP) - BRIDGEPORT, Conn.-The former music director of a church where former President Bush once worshipped pleaded guilty on Monday to possessing child pornography.

Robert F. Tate, 64, of Greenwich, admitted possessing between 150 and 300 pornographic images of children, some engaging in sexually explicit conduct. Prosecutors said some children in the images were younger than 12 years old.

"Yes, your honor. I regret to say I did it," Tate told a federal judge.

Tate was the longtime music director of Christ Church in Greenwich, where former President George H.W. Bush attended while growing up. Funeral services for his parents, Prescott Bush Sr. and Dorothy Walker Bush, were held there.

At his last hearing in December, President Bush's aunt and other members of the church attended to support Tate.

Tate faces up to 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine when he is sentenced April 12.

Judge To Review Inquiry Into Leaks In Pellicano Case (LAT)

By Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

A federal judge Monday said she would personally review the government's investigation into the disclosure of confidential documents in the Anthony Pellicano wiretapping case, amid claims that the latest leak was triggered by a previously unreported FBI interview of billionaire Kirk Kerkorian.

U.S. District Judge Dale S. Fischer's decision followed an acrimonious hearing at which attorneys for Pellicano and for Kerkorian's longtime attorney, Terry Christensen, complained that the leaks to the New York Times had severely hurt their clients' rights to a fair trial.

The defense attorneys also pointedly questioned why authorities had not identified the source of the leaks after nine months of investigation.

"This is horrendous," Christensen's attorney, Terree Bowers, said of the leaks. "It is trampling on Mr. Christensen's presumption of innocence."

Last April, the judge issued a protective order to prevent the disclosure of evidence compiled against Pellicano, Christensen and six other co-defendants in a wide-ranging wiretapping case that has rocked legal and Hollywood circles. After the New York Times printed the first of several articles that quoted sealed FBI interview reports in the case, the U.S. attorney's office in San Diego opened an investigation into the leaks.

Two weeks ago, the newspaper published — and posted on its website — excerpts from audio recordings of conversations between Pellicano and Christensen. Attorneys for Christensen had challenged the government's right to use the recordings against their client on the grounds of attorney-client privilege. At the time, they also argued that authorities were so concerned about the tapes' admissibility that they had interviewed Kerkorian "in what appears to be an illicit attempt to get him to inadvertently waive the attorney-client privilege."

In the latest court documents, Bowers suggested that the government, fearing that the tapes might be ruled inadmissible, had decided to leak them.

"Faced with such a result, it is most likely that someone from the prosecution took this illegal and drastic step of ensuring that members of the public got to see excerpts and listen to the recordings," Bowers said in the latest court filing.

Thom Mrozek, a spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in Los Angeles, said, "We have honored at all times Mr. Kerkorian's claim of attorney-client privilege."

Mrozek said he would not comment on what he called "the latest conspiracy theory being floated by people associated with the defense."

San Diego Assistant U.S. Atty. Robert Ciaffa, who is directing the leak investigation, said he would not comment about that probe while it is underway. As is standard practice, the leak investigation is being conducted by another U.S. attorney's office to ensure its independence.

A spokeswoman for Kerkorian's Tracinda Corp. declined comment about the interview, which sources say lasted about two hours.

Bowers urged Judge Fischer to hold a hearing on the leaks, and to subpoena the New York Times reporters to testify. To bolster his argument, Bowers cited the BALCO case, in which two reporters from the San Francisco Chronicle face 18 months in federal prison for refusing to disclose who leaked them grand jury testimony about steroid use in professional sports. In court documents, Bowers also charged that the government's investigation of his client "has been fraught with government deceit, obfuscation, sensationalism and injustice from the minute [it] began."

Catherine J. Mathis, a spokeswoman for the New York Times, said the newspaper would continue to assert the reporters' right not to reveal how they obtained the court documents and recordings.

Subpoenas Sought Against 2 Times Reporters (NYT)

By Katharine Q. Seelye

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

A defense lawyer in the case involving Anthony Pellicano, the Hollywood private eye accused of masterminding a long-running wiretapping ring, called yesterday for two New York Times reporters to be subpoenaed to find out who leaked them recordings of conversations and other evidence in the case.

On Jan. 11, The Times printed excerpts of 33 recorded conversations that Mr. Pellicano had with Terry N. Christensen, a lawyer for Kirk Kerkorian, the billionaire Hollywood mogul. The newspaper also put audio excerpts of the conversations on its Web site. Mr. Christensen has also been charged in connection with the wiretapping.

In papers filed last week in federal court, Mr. Christensen called on the judge, Dale S. Fischer of United States District Court, to force the two reporters, David M. Halbfinger and Allison Hope Weiner, to reveal their sources.

In a hearing yesterday in Los Angeles, Terree A. Bowers, the lawyer representing Mr. Christensen, told the judge that the reporters might be “criminally liable” for their actions. He said in a telephone interview after the hearing that he told the judge that their posting of the conversations on the Internet violated his client’s presumption of innocence.

The judge asked Mr. Bowers to spell out specifically what relief he is seeking and how he would like her to deal with the case. In a statement, Catherine J. Mathis, a spokeswoman for The New York Times Company, said: “We believe it is critically important for reporters to be able to protect their confidential sources of information and will continue to advocate for their ability to do so.”

The judge also said she wanted to meet privately with Robert Ciaffa, the assistant United States attorney in San Diego, who is investigating the source of information leaked to The Times over the last year in what the government has said was a violation of the judge's order. Mr. Ciaffa, who did not attend the hearing, said in a telephone interview that he had no comment.

Judge Fischer also indicated yesterday that she was studying a similar case involving two reporters for The San Francisco Chronicle who have refused to reveal their sources and are facing up to 18 months in jail. The reporters, Mark Fainaru-Wada and Lance Williams, published federal grand jury testimony in which athletes admitted to using steroids supplied by the Bay Area Laboratory Cooperative, known as Balco. The jail terms, as well as a $1,000-a-day fine imposed on The Chronicle, have been suspended pending an appeal, to be heard in March.

The trial of Mr. Pellicano has been delayed until August because of the complexity of the case, the volume of evidence and lawyers' scheduling conflicts.

Man Killed After Officer Is Shot (LAT)

By Andrew Blankstein And Richard Winton, Times Staff Writers

The handcuffed suspect apparently got a gun hidden in his pants and opened fire on police investigating an assault in the Westlake district.

A man who was handcuffed by police during an early morning arrest Monday in the Westlake district of Los Angeles managed to reach for a gun hidden in his pants and opened fire, seriously wounding a veteran officer, according to several LAPD sources familiar with the investigation.

Rampart Division training officer Andy Taylor, 37, was rushed by ambulance to Cedars-Sinai Medical Center, where he was treated for a gunshot wound to the shoulder and chest.

The 12-year veteran, who was in stable condition, also was hit in his bulletproof vest.

Police Chief William J. Bratton said the officer could be released from the hospital as early as today.

Bratton said he would withhold comment on the specifics of the shooting until he was presented with a full preliminary briefing by investigators with the Los Angeles Police Department's Force Investigation Division.

Department officials said Taylor was one of several officers who responded to an apartment building in the 600 block of Coronado Street about 5 a.m. after a report of an assault there.

According to the LAPD sources, who spoke to The Times on the condition that they not be named, the officers questioned several men in a second-floor residence at the multiunit complex.

A rookie officer, whom department officials did not identify, searched and handcuffed one of the suspects before leading him out into the hallway where Taylor was standing, the sources said.

As the officers talked to the other men, the suspect reached into his pants and pulled out a handgun, firing at least two shots that struck Taylor, the sources said.

Two other officers emerged from the apartment, firing multiple times before killing the suspect.

The dead man suffered at least two gunshot wounds.

Department officials said four people — two men and two women — were taken into custody. The women were later released; at least one of the men was held on a parole violation.

At a morning news conference, Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa blamed gang violence for the increase in assaults against police officers, though it was unknown if gangs were involved in Monday's incident.

"One of the reasons why we're targeting gangs, and we're not sure who these suspects are … is because too much of this kind of activity occurs in [the] city of Los Angeles and we've got to do something about it," Villaraigosa said.

Bratton expressed concern that the shooting was part of a spike in attacks on officers so far this year compared with last year.

He said there have been 10 instances in less than a month in which suspects have shot at officers.

LAPD statistics show that although attacks on police increased to 109 last year from 99 in 2005, they are still down from 2002, when there were nearly 130 incidents.

But the numbers also show that the increase in the last three years mirrors an uptick in reported gang crime. Gangs have been tied to several recent officer shootings.

Earlier this month, 13-year LAPD veteran Mark Wilbur was shot in the thigh while he and other officers were investigating a report of armed gang members at a house in Panorama City.

In August, Officer James Tuck was seriously injured when a man with an AK47-style assault weapon opened fire on him during a traffic stop in Montecito Heights.

DOJ_NMG_0120474

In perhaps the most high-profile incident, Officer Kristina Ripatti was left paralyzed from the chest down when she was shot in June by an armed robber who also was described as a gang member.

Former Bolivar County Official Changes Plea In Katrina Kickback (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, January 23, 2007

CLEVELAND, Miss. - Former Bolivar County Administrator Adrian Brown pleaded guilty Monday to receiving a cash kickback from Hurricane Katrina relief funds.

Brown, 29, made the plea Monday in U.S. District Court in Aberdeen. He remains charged with witness tampering.

Brown, who had been administrator in Bolivar County since April 2004, was not taken into custody and will continue under his current $20,000 bond and supervised release until sentencing.

Brown was arrested by FBI agents at his office on June 6 for requesting and accepting kickbacks from David Spikes, as well as witness tampering.

Spikes, who owns Nternet Solutions in Pace, was hired to develop and maintain a Web site for the county to assist displaced Katrina residents who evacuated there. The Federal Emergency Management Agency reimbursed the county $48,402 for the Web site.

The indictment also charged that Brown used intimidation and threats to try to influence the testimony of Spikes' wife, Monique Spikes, to a federal grand jury.

The Boliver County Board of Supervisors suspended Brown without pay, then fired him in August.

A date for his sentencing is not yet known. Chief Judge Glen H. Davidson will handle the sentencing. Brown faces up to $500,000 in fines and up to 20 years in prison.

Iberia Parish Man, Morgan City Residents Plead Guilty To FEMA Fraud (DA)

By Kyle Jackson

The Daily Advertiser, January 22, 2007

MORGAN CITY— Two Morgan City residents and one New Iberia man pled guilty Monday after attempting to defraud FEMA.

According to a news release from Donald Washington, U.S. Attorney for the Western District of Louisiana, the following three individuals pled guilty before U.S. District Judge Tucker Melancon:

Richard Hufnagel, 40, of New Iberia, admitted to applying for emergency benefits following Hurricane Katrina, claiming that he lived in a warehouse in New Orleans during the storm.

Hufnagel received $55,000 in FEMA aid for flood damage he claimed to hae suffered.

Investigations into Hufnagel's claims found that he was living in a hotel room in Gretna prior to the hurricane.

Morgan City resident Shannon Sylvester, 19, received $2,000 in disaster relief funds shortly after Hurricane Katrina in 2005, claiming she had to evacuate her New Orleans residence as a result of the storm.

However, investigations into Sylvester's claim proved that she'd never lied in New Orleans and her primary address was in Morgan City.

Ashley Clark, 22, also of Morgan City, received $4,665 worth of FEMA aid after filing a claim for damages done to her residence as a result of Hurricane Rita.

All three defendants have yet to be sentenced.

When sentenced, each defendant could face up to a maximum of 10 years in federal prison and a fine of $250,000.

Bell has already made full restitution to FEMA.

Cockfighting's 'Cultural Tradition' Kept Alive In USA (USAT)

DOJ_NMG_0120475

By Emily Bazar

USA Today, January 23, 2007

Immigration has helped fuel the popularity of cockfighting, a common practice in some countries that is illegal in most of the USA.

Statistics are hard to come by, but law enforcement officials and animal rights groups in places such as Denver, Houston and Santa Barbara County, Calif., say they've seen a surge. Others question whether there's just more attention on the activity because police are cracking down.

Cockfighting is illegal in every state except Louisiana and New Mexico.

"It's definitely on the rise," says Wayne Pacelle, head of the Humane Society of the United States. Pacelle says the Internet has helped connect cockfighters. He also cites increased involvement of immigrants from countries such as Mexico and the Philippines. "It's legal in a lot of places where there's significant immigration to the United States," he says. "You're seeing participation from people of those nations."

Mark Kumpf of the National Animal Control Association acknowledges there can be a cultural link. He doesn't think cockfighting is on the rise, though. What's up, he says, is enforcement.

Police are aggressively busting cockfighting operations, from fights to bird smuggling, because crimes such as drug dealing, assault and gambling often are associated, he says.

On Sunday, authorities raided a cockfight in Boydton, Va. Mecklenburg County Sheriff Danny Fox says 122 people were cited for violating the state's ban, 22 were arrested by Homeland Security officials and accused of being in the country illegally, and 126 birds were seized.

Kumpf says authorities also are motivated by concerns that cockfighting may contribute to the spread of bird flu. In Asia, it is suspected in some cases of spreading bird flu to humans, and, through smuggling, from country to country, the World Health Organization says.

In cockfighting, razor blades or sharp metal spurs called gaffs are strapped to the legs of specially bred roosters. Spectators place bets and watch the birds battle, often to the death.

U.S. Rep. Elton Gallegly, R-Calif., says fear of bird flu is one reason he is sponsoring a bill that would make it a felony to transport a bird or animal across state or national borders for fighting. It also would prohibit interstate and foreign commerce in cockfighting implements such as gaffs.

In Denver, the number of informal backyard fights is up, says Doug Kelley, director of the Division of Animal Care and Control. "It's normally a couple of households getting together for what they think of as a friendly competition," he says.

Animal control officer James Lopez says the practice is especially popular in Denver's Mexican community. "It's legal in Mexico, so a lot of people come up here and feel they should be able to do it here, too," he says.

The Santa Barbara County sheriff's department broke up four cockfighting rings last year, three run by Hispanics and one by Hmong, Sgt. Erik Raney says.

About 150 birds were confiscated in one case after a drug bust led to a broader investigation. "We often find that the people arrested have other criminal records," Raney says.

Cockfighting has increased "at an alarming rate" in the Houston area, says Sgt. Mark Timmers of the Harris County Constable Precinct 6. He says the number of fighting roosters seized doubles every year. Last year, it was about 800.

In New Mexico, Diana Orosco VanHoozen takes talk of cockfighting personally.

Once her two daughters were old enough to walk, they helped her feed and handle the roosters, she says. Her birds, numbering about 130, represent family and cultural tradition to VanHoozen. A self-described "fifth-generation cockfighter," she raises, breeds and fights roosters.

"This has been in our family for hundreds of years," says VanHoozen, 36, of Las Cruces, who traces some of her lineage to Mexico. "It's Mexican culture. Anywhere you go in Mexico, you can find a cockfight."

Some New Mexico lawmakers, animal rights groups and others want to make cockfighting illegal. Last month, Gov. Bill Richardson backed the idea.

In Louisiana, state Sen. Arthur Lentini plans to introduce a bill to ban cockfighting when the Legislature convenes in April, according to his assistant, JoAnn Loebig.

VanHoozen calls New Mexico's effort discrimination. "I want to be able to still practice my cultural tradition," she says.

State Sen. Mary Jane Garcia, a Democrat, counters, "Whose culture are we talking about?"

Garcia's grandparents are from Mexico. She says her family has never participated in cockfighting.

Garcia has been trying to get a cockfighting ban in New Mexico for 18 years. Last week, she introduced a bill to make cockfighting — or attending a fight — a felony.

A 2004 Albuquerque Journal poll found that 66% of registered state voters would support a law banning cockfighting. Among Hispanic voters, 59% favored a ban. "To me, it's an animal-cruelty issue. It's barbaric and gruesome," Garcia says. "It's an illegal and unethical practice. They allow young boys to go in there and gamble."

Garcia acknowledges that cockfighting is still common south of the border. "It's still practiced a lot in Mexico, but we're not in Mexico anymore," she says.

Most cockfighters and spectators in New Mexico are Hispanic, says Ronald Barron of the New Mexico Gamefowl Breeders Association.

"At least 95% of the people raising game fowl in the state are Hispanic," he says. "It's part of the Hispanic tradition."

Fred Hawley, professor of criminal justice at Western Carolina University, has done research on cockfighting.

"Like any other folk practice, it's been spreading along with a number of other folk practices, like folk healing, into areas that attract large Hispanic populations," he says.

Hawley and Pacelle say cockfighting is also popular with rural whites.

Cockfighters take the practice from their native countries because they feel pride in the tradition, Hawley says. "For people who have been doing it for generations, this is symbolic and important," he says.

Timmers cautions against generalizing about ethnic groups. He says, "There are no cultural boundaries when it comes to cockfighting."

Maryland Couple And Their Company To Pay $1.5 Million Over Federal Contract Suit (AP)

AP, January 23, 2007

COSMOS to Pay $1.5M to Settle Suit

BALTIMORE (AP) -- A Potomac couple and the company they run will pay $1.55 million to settle allegations that they submitted false claims on federal contracts, a case that involved a whistle blower who worked for the company.

Robert Yin and Karen Kaufman-Yin, along with their Bethesda-based company COSMOS Corp., allegedly submitted the claims for contracts with the National Science Foundation, the Department of Commerce, the Department of Health and Human Services and the Justice Department.

Yin is the president of COSMOS while Kaufman-Yin is the vice president and chief financial officer. The company provides research, analysis and other services to government agencies and private organizations.

According to federal prosecutors, COSMOS improperly charged government contracts for costs that dealt with the company's operations, including marketing, bid proposals and administrative labor. The company is also accused of shifting labor costs from private contracts to its government contracts.

The allegations were made in a whistle blower lawsuit filed by former employee Jennifer H. Pobiak under the federal False Claims Act. The law allows Pobiak to receive money as part of the settlement after the government took over the case. Pobiak's share will be $263,500.

Wrongful Imprisonment Case Against FBI Winding Down (AP)

By Denise Lavoie

AP, January 23, 2007

BOSTON - Two men who spent decades in prison for a 1965 gangland slaying they didn't commit wept on the witness stand as they recounted what the years behind bars did to them and their families.

But Justice Department lawyers made it clear Monday that theirs will not be the kind of emotional case presented by the men who are suing the government for wrongful imprisonment and malicious prosecution.

Justice Department lawyer Bridget Bailey Lipscomb said the government will not offer testimony from a single live witness. Instead, the government will rely on depositions from several people involved in the 1965 murder case.

The government has argued federal authorities had no duty to share information with state officials who prosecuted Peter Limone, Joseph Salvati and two other men who died in prison after they were convicted in the 1965 killing of Edward "Teddy" Deegan. They say the FBI cannot be held liable for the results of a separate state investigation.

Attorneys for the men, however, say the FBI knew the men had been framed for Deegan's killing, but hid evidence from state prosecutors that could have cleared the men to protect a Mafia hitman and FBI informant, Joseph "The Animal" Barboza.

Salvati and Limone were exonerated in 2001 after FBI memos dating back to the Deegan case surfaced, showing the men were framed by Barboza.

The memos were made public after they were discovered by a Justice Department task force probing the FBI's relationship with gangsters and FBI informants James "Whitey" Bulger and Stephen "The Rifleman" Flemmi.

Limone, Salvati and the families of two other men who died in prison - Henry Tameleo and Louis Greco - are suing the federal government for $100 million.

Lawyers for the men are expected to finish presenting their evidence Tuesday after 19 days of testimony. Lipscomb told U.S. District Judge Nancy Gertner she expects to start and finish the government's case Tuesday, through depositions and exhibits. Final arguments are scheduled for Feb. 27. Gertner will decide the jury-waived case.

Nicotine Manipulation Confirmed (NYT)

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

Any doubts that the tobacco industry has surreptitiously raised the nicotine content of cigarettes should be laid to rest by a study from researchers at the Harvard School of Public Health. They confirmed last year's discovery of the nicotine increase by the Massachusetts Department of Public Health and went on to identify how the tobacco companies designed their cigarettes to accomplish this.

These manipulations were discovered because Massachusetts requires manufacturers to use a more realistic test to measure how much nicotine is deliverable to typical smokers and requires companies to report design features of their cigarettes. When Harvard researchers reanalyzed the data they found that the nicotine yield per cigarette rose by an average of 11 percent between 1998 and 2005, a conclusion contested by the industry.

Harvard researchers concluded that the companies managed this by using tobacco containing a higher concentration of nicotine and perhaps also by slowing the rate at which cigarettes burned — thus increasing the number of puffs per cigarette. The companies presumably hoped that additional nicotine would hook more new customers and keep old ones from breaking the habit.

Their continued bad behavior makes it imperative for Congress to grant the Food and Drug Administration the authority to regulate tobacco products, including the power to reduce nicotine levels and demand extensive data from the companies. The Senate overwhelmingly approved such legislation in 2004, only to have House Republicans block it. With new Democratic majorities in both houses, it is time to rein in this rogue industry.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Trial Resumes In Noxubee County Reverse Discrimination Case (AP)

AP, January 23, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - The federal trial of a black Democratic Party official in Noxubee County entered its second week Monday with more testimony anticipated from whites who claim their right to participate in the election process has been violated.

Ike Brown, the chairman of the county's Democratic Executive Committee, is accused of violating the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which was written to protect racial minorities when Southern states strictly enforced segregation. It is the first use of the act to allege discrimination against whites.

Noxubee County is a rural area along the Alabama line with a majority black population.

On Friday, two white witnesses said Brown had threatened to challenge their right to cast ballots in the party's 2003 primary. In addition, an unsuccessful white candidate for Noxubee County supervisor told the federal judge he was unfairly treated by the defendant as to how absentee ballots were counted in a close race against the eventual black winner.

Federal prosecutors want U.S. District Judge Tom Lee to rule whites' voting rights were violated by Brown and other black Democratic Party officials in the county and to order unlawful practices stopped.

Cheri Anne Eaves and Kari Hardy testified on Friday that Brown accused them of being disloyal Democrats and had threatened to try to deny their right to vote in the 2003 Democratic primary. Brown allegedly had put them on a list he circulated of 174 white voters he would challenge as ineligible to participate in Democratic Party election because they were closet Republicans.

"I was angry that anybody would have the right to say I couldn't vote," Eaves said.

Despite the threat of being challenged at the polls, she told Lee she did vote in the Democratic primary. Hardy said she did not vote.

Both women testified that they didn't understand why Brown could question their right to vote. They said they hadn't voted in Republican primaries before. Mississippi has open primaries for the two political parties to hold and doesn't require voters to register as Democrat or Republican.

Brown claims the U.S. Justice Department is misconstruing as racial intimidation his attempts to keep Republicans from voting in Democratic primaries. However, the Justice Department alleges that the "relentless voting-related discrimination" is based on Noxubee County blacks trying to shut whites out of the process.

Absentee Vote Count Questioned (JCL)

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, January 23, 2007

Candidate's son claims Noxubee ballot challenges dismissed

A black Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee official said she was going to follow her own law in counting absentee ballots during a 2003 primary election, a white candidate's son testified Monday.

"I was not allowed to make challenges," said Richard Heard, whose father was a candidate for county sheriff.

In the first lawsuit of its kind in the United States, the Department of Justice is accusing black political leaders in majority-black Noxubee County of discriminating against white voters.

A trial on the lawsuit is in its second week in U.S. District Court in Jackson. District Judge Tom S. Lee will decide the case.

The Justice Department is still presenting its side.

Wil Colom, attorney for the Noxubee County Democratic Executive Committee and Chairman Ike Brown, said his clients believe the complaints are imagined. Colom said most of the charges regarding election discrepancies are normal election errors and miscues that happen every year in every county in America.

Heard testified that he remembered seeing one absentee ballot where the signature didn't match the name on the application and questioned pollworkers about it.

"I said over and over something is wrong with this ballot," he testified.

But Heard said the woman in charge at the polls eventually said "We aren't going by state law but my law today."

Heard said he also was concerned that an absentee ballot he notarized for a white voter was rejected.

On cross-examination, Colom asked Heard if he actually saw the white voter's ballot rejected.

Heard said he was told it was rejected.

"You're going by what someone told you?" Colom asked Heard.

Colom asked Heard if he knew that only 15 absentee ballots were rejected and only two of those were from white voters. More than 1,200 total votes were cast in the election.

A black voter also testified for the government on Monday.

Nikki Nicole Halbert said she filed an absentee ballot but the signature on the envelope wasn't hers.

Colom objected that the government ambushed the defense with Halbert's testimony.

On cross-examination, Halbert said she had no reason to believe her ballot wasn't cast as she filled it out.

Limits On Prison Suits Are Eased (NYT)

By Linda Greenhouse

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — Twelve years ago, Congress passed a law intended to make it harder for prisoners to file lawsuits challenging prison conditions as illegal or unconstitutional. On Monday, the Supreme Court ruled unanimously that a federal appeals court had overstepped its bounds by making prisoner lawsuits even harder to file than Congress intended.

The barriers the lower court had put in place “cannot fairly be viewed” as a correct interpretation of the law, the Prison Litigation Reform Act of 1995, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. said for the court. Unless Congress explicitly provided otherwise, Chief Justice Roberts explained, courts should apply to prisoners’ lawsuits the same procedural rules they apply to any other lawsuit and “should generally not depart from the usual practice under the federal rules on the basis of perceived policy concerns.”

The ruling was greeted with relief by advocates for prisoners’ rights, who said the lower court’s approach had threatened to make it all but impossible for an inmate not represented by a lawyer to navigate the procedural hurdles to get a case accepted for a hearing.

“A loss would have been devastating,” said Elizabeth Alexander, director of the National Prison Project of the American Civil Liberties Union, which filed a brief in support of three Michigan inmates whose separate cases were consolidated by the court for a single decision. Dismissed by the United States Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit, their complaints about their treatment are now reinstated.

Ms. Alexander said the decision, Jones v. Bock, No. 05-7058, marked the first time in a half-dozen rulings that the Supreme Court had not adopted the most unfavorable possible interpretation of the Prison Litigation Reform Act.

At issue was the Sixth Circuit's interpretation of the law. The appeals court, which covers Ohio, Kentucky and Tennessee as well as Michigan, adopted three rules to carry out the law's requirement that before going to federal court with a complaint about prison conditions, an inmate must first "exhaust" any administrative remedies provided by the prison.

First, the appeals court held, this requirement meant that inmates had to prove they had exhausted their remedies, in contrast to the ordinary federal rule that places on the defendant the burden of showing, as a defense, that the plaintiff had failed to meet an exhaustion requirement. Second, prisoners could not sue anyone they had not first named during the internal grievance process. And third, a lawsuit that contained a mixture of exhausted and unexhausted claims should be dismissed in its entirety.

In his opinion on Monday, Chief Justice Roberts said "we understand the reasons" for the Sixth Circuit's approach. He noted that prisoners' lawsuits accounted for nearly 10 percent of all civil cases filed in federal court and that many are without merit.

But he added that the circuit's choice of its "more onerous pleading rules" was not based on the statute. "The judge's job is to construe the statute — not to make it better," he said.

Justices Overturn Restrictions On Inmates' Lawsuits (AP)

Associated Press

AP, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON – A unanimous Supreme Court signaled Monday that some courts are going too far in barring lawsuits by inmates complaining about their treatment.

In an opinion by Chief Justice John Roberts, the court overturned procedural obstacles in the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that led to dismissal of civil rights complaints brought by three Michigan inmates.

The appeals court in Cincinnati covers the states of Michigan, Ohio, Tennessee and Kentucky. Federal courts in the circuit allowed just 18 of nearly 500 inmate civil rights suits to proceed, a recent American Civil Liberties Union study concluded, making the circuit the most restrictive in the country for such lawsuits.

The Republican-controlled Congress passed the Prison Litigation Reform Act in 1995, seeking to slow a flood of federal lawsuits.

The law requires prisoners to go through a lengthy administrative grievance process before they may sue in court.

The law worked – too well, according to critics. Nearly 42,000 civil rights petitions were filed in 1995 before the law took effect. Five years later, the number was down to 26,000, according to the Justice Department.

"Today's decision will at least help to ensure that the courthouse door is not completely shut," ACLU legal director Steven Shapiro said in a statement.

Roberts wrote that under the prison reform act, inmates are not required to demonstrate that they have exhausted the administrative complaint procedure. The chief justice said a lawsuit is not necessarily invalid just because a defendant was not named in the inmate's earlier administrative grievance. In addition, Roberts wrote, the prison litigation law does not require dismissing the entire lawsuit when an inmate fails to exhaust some of his claims administratively.

The Supreme Court is "not insensitive to the challenges faced by the lower federal courts in managing their dockets and attempting to separate ... needles from haystacks," Roberts wrote.

But the chief justice added that adopting "different and more onerous pleading rules ... should not be done on a case-by-case basis by the courts."

The cases are Jones v. Bock, 05-7058, and Williams v. Overton, and Walton v. Bouchard, 05-7142.

Long Beach Awaits Hate-Crime Verdict (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

LONG BEACH, Calif. -- A crowd of black teenagers and three young white women stood on a street corner on Halloween night. A male voice cried, "I hate [expletive] white people!" The crowd surged, and someone cracked one of the whites in the head with a skateboard, dropping her to the ground. That much is not in dispute.

Who is responsible and how this could happen in the port city of Long Beach, which prides itself on its diversity and tolerance, has been the subject of arguments in court, civic forums and private living rooms here ever since.

Ten defendants -- nine female and one male, ages 12 to 18 -- were charged with assault for allegedly beating and kicking the women, giving one 12 facial fractures and another a concussion. Eight of the teenagers are also charged with a hate crime. Their trial has dragged on since early November.

This week attorneys are expected to finish closing arguments and a judge will render verdicts. The city is waiting uneasily to find out whether it will live up to its self-image as a unified, tolerant community or dissolve into racial hostility.

City leaders have reacted to the racial flare-up with alacrity, sending out volunteers to the victims and organizing community forums to denounce racism.

Yet some African Americans express frustration that city leaders have not been more visible in their community. Some are also angry at the local newspaper, which initially covered the victims' story that they were attacked, without reporting that some witnesses called it a mutual fight, or that the arrested teenagers have no criminal history and are accomplished athletes on a local high school track team.

As the Rev. O. Leon Wood Jr., the black pastor of the North Long Beach Community Prayer Center, said: "When we're in a situation where whites are on the receiving end of a problem, there appears to be a little more sensitivity added to the issue."

Meanwhile, conservative radio hosts took up the cause of the victims, calling Long Beach a dangerous place for white people.

And the victims, their attorney said, have been fearful of retaliation. During the course of the trial, a witness for the prosecution had her car rammed repeatedly by another vehicle while she was in court testifying. Police called it gang-related witness intimidation.

"I'm very nervous about what's going to happen when there are verdicts," said Doug Otto, the victims' attorney.

Long Beach, like neighboring Los Angeles, has a history of racial tension to match its diversity. In the 1920s, it had a Ku Klux Klan chapter and redlining that kept housing segregated.

The port is now the second-busiest in the country, and the city is a hodgepodge of bobbing oil derricks, leafy streets and run-down apartment buildings filled with newly arrived Latinos, working-class blacks and whites, and refugees from Vietnam and Cambodia.

"This city has made great strides since the Rodney King riots" in 1992, Long Beach Mayor Bob Foster said in an interview. That unrest started in South Central Los Angeles 15 miles away and spread to neighboring Long Beach, destroying more than 300 businesses there.

City officials often refer to a 2000 USA Today study of the 65 largest cities that found Long Beach to be the most diverse. Of Long Beach's 462,000 residents, 36 percent are Latino, 33 percent white, 14 percent black and 12 percent Asian.

Twenty-three hate crimes were reported in the city in 2005, down from 66 in 1998. The drop is steeper than an overall dip in Los Angeles County in the same period. So the Halloween beatings came as a shock.

Laura Schneider, 19, Michelle Smith, 19, and Loren Hyman, 21, were out for a night of fun on a street in a mostly white, middle-class neighborhood where residents deck out their houses for Halloween, prosecutors said. About 40 black teenagers, also in the neighborhood to trick-or-treat, began throwing lemons and small pumpkins at them and taunting them about their race.

When a boy cried out his hatred for whites, "the crowd surged" and began to beat the women, Deputy District Attorney Andrea Bouas argued in court. Hyman's jaw and eye socket were fractured, and Schneider suffered a concussion.

Parents of the arrested teenagers do not dispute the injuries, but they contend that police arrested the wrong children.

Defense testimony in court has bolstered their argument. Neighbors who called 911 on Halloween night reported black boys, not girls, beating the white women. Most of the arrested teenagers were identified by a passerby who recalled their clothing, not their faces. Her credibility was seriously eroded on the witness stand.

"Our hearts go out to the victims," Allene, the mother of a 16-year-old defendant who would not give her last name to protect her daughter's identity, said at a public meeting here Saturday. "We pray for them, because this should never happen to anyone. But our kids are incarcerated based on hairstyles, earrings, dark clothing. . . . It's a rush-to-judgment case."

But the victims are "absolutely convinced that these defendants are among those who attacked them," said Otto, their attorney.

"We haven't heard that anyone is planning on moving, so eventually when this is over people will get back to life," said Anitra Dempsey, coordinator of the city's human dignity program's youth and gang task force. "When the case was first reported there was outrage that this would occur anywhere, and particularly here. [But] Long Beach is one city, and we are not going to be divided or defined by this one event."

Former Exec In Irvine Says He Was Fired Over Religion (LAT)

By Christopher Goffard, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

Discrimination suit alleges car wax manufacturer had expected him to be 'on fire for Jesus.'

A former executive of an Irvine car wax manufacturer alleges in a lawsuit that the company fired him because he had not pursued "a Christian lifestyle" and wasn't "on fire for Jesus."

Atticus O. Firey, 34, of Newport Beach contends Meguiar's Inc. committed religious discrimination when it fired him in July after nearly 10 years with the company. Company president Barry Meguiar repeatedly urged Firey, then the chief operating officer, to attend church, the suit alleges, and told him he was "robbing this company of the blessing of God by not being on your knees and on fire for Jesus."

Meguiar, who is host of a cable TV and radio program called "Car Crazy," did not return a call seeking comment. His lawyer, Richard Ruben, said religion had nothing to do with Firey's firing. He said the company's senior management decided to terminate Firey because his job performance was sub-par, with a management style that was "demeaning" and "negative."

"The company was suffering economically, and Mr. Firey was not showing up at the office and was only sporadically attending to his duties," Ruben said.

He added that the company's management includes "people of all religions" and characterized the lawsuit as a "publicity stunt." He said he expected a judge to throw out the suit, because Firey had previously agreed to submit to arbitration, rather than go to the courts, should such a dispute arise.

The suit, filed Friday in Orange County Superior Court, says Meguiar sat in Firey's office and read to him from the Bible, thrust Christian books on him and demanded he read them and forced managers to attend prayer meetings. When Firey asked about a promised bonus, the suit says, Meguiar said he would not give it to him until Firey joined a Christian church.

Confronted with his behavior, the suit says, Meguiar said he had the right to manage the business, which has some 300 employees, by the tenets of Pentecostal Christianity.

The company hired and fired employees based on religion, the suit says, with Meguiar tutoring executives on how to interview prospective employees in a way that elicited information on their religious beliefs. In one case, Meguiar asked a candidate whether he thought he would go to heaven or hell if he died today, the suit says. When the candidate said he was a Catholic trying to lead a virtuous life, the suit alleges, Meguiar replied that merely "being a good person and following a works-oriented religion" would not save him from hell.

Firey, who is Meguiar's former son-in-law, alleges in his suit that in another instance, his boss tried to block the hiring of an employee because she was living "in sin as a fornicator" with her boyfriend.

"If there were two candidates and one was a Christian but had lesser skills than a non-Christian, Mr. Meguiar would pick the Christian," the suit alleges. In one case, the suit says, Meguiar blocked the hire because he was not "Christian" and accepted a weaker candidate who went to church.

Stuart Jasper, Firey's attorney, said the lawsuit was necessary because the company had "reneged on its obligation to pick an arbitration service." The lawsuit asks for unspecified damages and asks the court both to compel arbitration and to prevent the company from continuing the alleged discriminatory practices.

Jon Gunnemann, a professor of social ethics at the School of Theology at Emory University in Atlanta, said all companies have a "corporate culture," often with powerful implicit signals — such as what kind of jokes are acceptable — that define their boundaries.

"You learn very quickly what can get you hired and what can get you fired," he said. "Almost every business does have a corporate culture which functions not much differently from explicit religious belief. It's not easy to say why the one is all right and the other is not."

Va. Delegate Proposes Juneteenth Measure (WP)

By Amy Gardner

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

RICHMOND, Jan. 22 -- The Virginia lawmaker who caused an uproar last week by questioning the need for a state apology for slavery proposed a measure Monday that would commemorate the freeing of the last U.S. slaves in June 1865.

Del. Frank D. Hargrove Sr., a Republican from Hanover County near Richmond, said he has been deluged with at least 4,000 phone calls and e-mails at his home and office since he inflamed the House of Delegates by saying that blacks should "get over" slavery and that apologizing for slavery was no more necessary than asking Jews to apologize for "killing Christ."

Hargrove said the vast majority of people who contacted him said they support his views, but he also said that he never intended to offend blacks or Jews. He offered the resolution in part to reach out to those he offended, he said.

"I think we can all agree that the end of slavery was a good thing," Hargrove said.

Black lawmakers said they are happy to support Hargrove's resolution to celebrate Juneteenth, but not if it is meant to replace theirs, which calls for Virginia to apologize for its role in slavery. The resolution is intended to coincide with the state's celebration of the 400th anniversary of the English settlement of Jamestown, where slaves first arrived in 1619.

"I can't question anybody else's motives," said Sen. Henry L. Marsh III, a Richmond Democrat and a sponsor of the apology proposal. "But obviously that resolution doesn't address the issues that we are trying to address."

Hargrove's resolution would celebrate Juneteenth, the widely observed name for the June 19, 1865, event in Galveston, Tex., in which federal troops are believed to have informed the country's last slaves that they were free. A number of organizations and jurisdictions celebrate Juneteenth to commemorate the moment when emancipation, foreseen in President Abraham Lincoln's 1863 Emancipation Proclamation, was finally recognized across the nation.

But Del. A. Donald McEachin (D-Richmond), another sponsor of the slavery apology, said it's one thing to recognize the end of slavery and quite another to offer an apology for Virginia's extensive role in it. McEachin thinks an apology is necessary to heal a state and a nation still divided by race.

Last week, the Richmond lawyer objected to Hargrove's assertion that "not a soul in this legislature" had anything to do with slavery. McEachin said he still hears stories from his 102-year-old grandmother about her parents, who were slaves in Virginia and North Carolina.

"Virginia didn't have anything to do with the Emancipation Proclamation," McEachin said. "It had a lot to do with establishing slavery here."

Hargrove said his measure is not intended to replace the apology. "I have no problem with that one going ahead," he said. "I won't vote for it, but I don't intend to block it, either."

Ga. Legislature Chimes In On Delta's Fight Against Takeover Bid (AP)

By Greg Bluestein

AP, January 23, 2007

ATLANTA - Georgia's legislative leaders signed a letter Monday urging the Justice Department to reject a takeover bid facing Delta Air Lines, the Atlanta-based carrier locked in a corporate battle to remain a stand-alone company.

The lawmakers said in the letter that a merger between Delta and Tempe, Ariz.-based US Airways Group Inc. would result in skyrocketing air fares and reduced competition.

"The tremendous amount of overlap between the route networks of these carriers will drive significant consolidation, reduce flight choices, increase fares for our consumers, affect jobs and have a negative impact on our region," the legislators said in the letter, which was addressed to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales.

The ceremonial signing by House Speaker Glenn Richardson and Senate President Pro-tem Eric Johnson drew a gaggle of reporters and lawmakers. It represents the latest attempt by Delta to bring its boardroom struggle into the public.

The airline, the nation's third-largest, has reached out to Atlanta's business and civic leaders and organized public rallies to protest the takeover bid launched by its archrival in November 2006.

US Airways hasn't backed off. After Delta's board rejected one proposal, US Airways upped its offer by 20 percent, making the merger's total value roughly $10.2 billion. The increased offer is set to expire Feb. 1 unless creditors indicate they support the due diligence process, which would open up Delta's books to US Airways.

Delta chief financial officer Ed Bastian, who attended Monday's event, said the airline's board will likely vote on the deal this week.

The airline is credited with helping to transform Atlanta's airport into the world's busiest and the city itself into an economic engine of the Southeast. But Delta was sent reeling after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks. It filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection in 2005, reporting a $2 billion loss.

Bastian said the company has rebounded since then and is making "great progress" in turning its fortunes around. In a reorganization plan filed in December, the company said it plans to emerge from bankruptcy by the middle of this year as a stand-alone carrier.

General Assembly Backs Delta On Merger Attempt At The Capitol (ABH)

By Vicki Eckenrode, Morris News Service

Athens (GA) Banner-Herald, January 23, 2007

ATLANTA - State lawmakers supporting Delta Air Lines' efforts to stave off a takeover from US Airways are sending a letter to federal justice officials reviewing the merger proposal.

A dozen Republican and Democratic legislators Monday signed the note to U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, urging his office to carefully review US Airways' "hostile takeover bid."

"Along with the constituents we represent in Georgia, we also are very concerned about the significant loss of competition and the likely impact on air fares and regional concentration this merger will create," the letter states.

Legislators also on Monday introduced resolutions in the House and Senate voicing support for Atlanta-based Delta.

US Airways is offering Delta's creditors more than $10 billion in cash and stock to accept the merger.

Delta is fighting the offer and wants to emerge from bankruptcy this year standing on its own.

Delta's creditors have not yet weighed in on the bid. But if it is approved, the deal still will have to receive approval from the Justice Department because of antitrust questions.

A U.S. Senate committee on Wednesday also is expected to look at how the proposed merger would effect competition and air service on routes where the two airlines overlap.

State Senate Transportation Committee Chairman Jeff Mullis, R-Chickamauga, said state lawmakers sent the message to the Justice Department "to ensure that we do everything in our power that we see to keep Delta a Georgia company and here in our great state."

Delta Chief Financial Officer Ed Bastian, who attended a news conference Monday for the letter's signing, said the company remains on track to exit bankruptcy.

Airline officials have spent recent weeks rallying local governments, civic leaders and businesses across the state to fight the proposal on a public relations front.

Sen. Chip Pearson, R-Dawsonville, said he was concerned that a merger would reduce the number of flights in Georgia and effect businesses across the state.

"Those in secondary markets, such as Savannah, Augusta and Columbus, will be faced with higher air fare and fewer flight options," said Pearson, chairman of the Senate Economic Development committee. "The loss of Delta Air Lines would be a huge loss for the entire state of Georgia, not just the metro (Atlanta) area."

US Air's Offer For Delta Loses More Ground With Creditors (WSJ)

By Corey Dade, Susan Carey And Melanie Trottman

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

As a Senate committee prepares to take testimony tomorrow on consolidation in the airline industry, US Airways Group Inc.'s hostile $10.1 billion bid for Delta Air Lines Inc. appears to be losing traction among creditors who will determine the fate of the Atlanta airline, according to people familiar with the matter.

After digging into the details of the US Airways offer -- which was sweetened 20% less than two weeks ago -- and hiring former Continental Airlines Inc. Chairman Gordon Bethune to help analyze its prospects, the Delta creditors' committee has grown skeptical of the proposed merger, these people said.

Separately, talks about a possible merger between Delta and Northwest Airlines Corp. have been put on hold, without a framework for a deal and without specific plans for further negotiations, according to people familiar with the thinking of both sides.

Delta creditors encouraged the talks, which culminated in a series of "detailed, specific conversations" among senior managers from the companies regarding potential structures, processes and timetables for a transaction, according to a person knowledgeable about the matter. A combination of Delta and Northwest remains "a very viable option," according to one person close to the situation, but isn't likely to be pursued until both airlines emerge from bankruptcy protection this year, if ever. Delta intends to leave Chapter 11 proceedings in April and has made its own proposal to creditors to emerge as a stand-alone company. Northwest hopes to emerge from bankruptcy-court protection in the second quarter.

The US Airways bid, which expires Feb. 1, is by no means dead. The situation could change, say people familiar with the situation, especially if Delta and its creditors have difficulty reaching agreement on issues such as board composition and compensation for the airline's management and employees. US Airways Chief Executive Officer Doug Parker said yesterday that he has had no indication creditors are lining up against his bid. "We've given them what we think is a compelling offer," he said.

In a flurry of behind-the-scenes meetings over the past week, representatives from the creditors' committee and Delta have been trying to iron out issues related to the airline's hope to emerge from bankruptcy protection as an independent carrier. Issues have included how the Delta board will be selected, compensation for senior management, and how to compensate nonunion front-line Delta employees, according to several people close to the discussions.

Delta creditors and the executive search firm Spencer Stuart recently spent more than a day interviewing current board members, some of whom likely will remain. The unsecured creditors' committee also has begun assembling a slate of potential directors, according to several people close to the process. Mr. Bethune's name has been floated as a possible board chairman, but not all creditors support that option. Mr. Bethune has said he isn't looking for a job.

The makeup of the board would be pivotal if Delta Chief Executive Gerald Grinstein keeps his pledge to retire after guiding the airline out of bankruptcy protection. The creditors' committee is seeking a strong hand alongside Delta's in selecting the directors, preferring members open to a merger that would keep Delta competitive in an anticipated wave of industry consolidation.

In his testimony tomorrow, Mr. Grinstein is expected to reprise his criticisms of the US Airways deal, which he says would cost thousands of Delta employees their jobs, severely diminish competition in many U.S. markets, and fail to pass antitrust scrutiny due to both airlines' concentrated operations on the East Coast. Some people involved in the Delta case believe the creditors are cooling on the US Airways offer, not for those reasons but because they think Delta management wouldn't cooperate to see the transaction through the antitrust process and other necessary steps.

Mr. Parker is expected to defend the merits of the merger, including $1.65 billion in cost and revenue synergies he promises will create a more-efficient and financially secure airline, similar to the merger he engineered in 2005 between America West Holdings Corp. and US Airways.

In a recent letter responding to questions from Sen. Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, Mr. Parker said the merger would offer New York travelers "more reasonable fares" and flights to every city served by the two airlines. "It simply doesn't follow that consolidation should or will lead to higher fares, and we have our own track record -- nationally and in New York -- to prove it," he said in the letter.

Cemex Extends $11.7 Billion Takeover Bid For Rinker (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Miriam Steffens

Bloomberg, January 23, 2007

Jan. 23 (Bloomberg) -- Cemex SA, the world's third-largest cement maker, extended its $11.7 billion hostile takeover bid for Australia's Rinker Group Ltd. by two months while it waits for U.S. regulatory approval.

Cemex's $13-a-share offer for Australia's biggest building materials company will now end March 30, the Monterrey, Mexico- based company said in a statement to the Australian Stock Exchange today.

Cemex wants to buy Rinker because of its business in the U.S., which is focused on Florida, Arizona and Nevada, the fastest-growing states. The deal would make it the world's biggest cement maker. Cemex Chairman Lorenzo Zambrano said today the offer is ``compelling'' while Rinker has described it as 36 percent too low.

Shares of Rinker fell 8 cents to A$18.22 at the market close in Sydney, which equates to $14.36 using today's exchange rate. The stock has gained 31 percent since Cemex made its bid on Oct. 27.

Rinker Chairman John Morschel on Nov. 29 said the Mexican company could ``offer a lot more,'' citing a report by adviser Grant Samuel & Associates Pty. which valued the stock at up to $17.74.

Cemex is offering to pay Rinker's shareholders in U.S. dollars, saying they can choose to be paid in Australian dollars at the exchange rate prevailing at the time of settlement.

U.S. antitrust regulators on Nov. 30 said they needed more information from both companies before being able to make a ruling on the proposed deal.

Earnings Report

This also gives Rinker more time to find alternatives to the Cemex offer. The Sydney-based company will report third-quarter earnings on Jan. 30, when it may face questions from investors on its defense strategy.

``The longer the process drags out, the more it plays into Rinker's hands in that the worst of the downturn in the Florida housing market may be in the past,'' Goldman Sachs JBWere Pty. said in a trading note today.

The Department of Justice's request for information was an indication Cemex may have to sell some assets in Arizona and Florida, where both companies have strong market positions, according to Andrew Dale, an analyst at Macquarie Bank Ltd. in Sydney.

The regulators intervened in Cemex's takeover of Britain's RMC Group Plc for 2.3 billion pounds ($4.5 billion) in 2005, allowing the purchase only on condition it sold RMC's ready-mix concrete operations in Tucson, Arizona, within six months to preserve competition.

Cemex's bid for Rinker would be the biggest takeover of an Australian company after a record year of acquisitions. Proposed takeovers in the country jumped to $200 billion last year, from $111 billion in 2005, according to data compiled by Bloomberg.

Cemex is advised by Citigroup Inc. UBS AG is assisting Rinker on its defense.

'Sticky' 3M Antitrust Lawsuits Finally Losing Their Grip (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, January 23, 2007

The company is poised to close the books on 10-plus years of antitrust litigation

With a proposed settlement worth nearly $40 million, office supply giant 3M is poised to close the books on more than a decade of litigating antitrust suits.

In a series of suits, a competitor and purchasers accused 3M -- the maker of Scotch tape and Post-It Notes -- of abusing its monopoly power in the market for transparent tape by driving a competitor out of business.

The $39.75 million settlement in Bradburn Parent/Teacher Store Inc. v. 3M -- a class action brought by direct purchasers and retailers -- comes on the heels of a trio of settlements reached last year.

In court papers filed last week, plaintiffs lawyers asked U.S. District Judge John R. Padova to grant final approval of the settlement and to award them attorney fees of $13.9 million and nearly $1 million in litigation costs for their 11,000 hours of work over four years.

In August, Padova approved a $28.8 million settlement in Meijer Inc. v. 3M, a class action brought on behalf of large-volume retailers who were excluded from the Bradburn case.

And court papers show that 3M also struck deals with two big retailers that had opted out of the Meijer case -- Kmart and Publix Supermarkets Inc.

All of those suits stemmed directly from a 1997 suit, LePage's Inc. v. 3M, which resulted in a $68 million verdict in 1999 and a finding that 3M had set out to monopolize the market for transparent tape.

LePage's, a competing supplier of tape, had accused 3M of using illegal tactics to drive it out of business.

To do so, the suit said, 3M offered "bundled" rebates to large retailers for reaching sales goals in several categories of 3M products. In reality, the suit said, the rebates could be earned only by removing LePage's products from their shelves.

At trial, LePage's had argued that it landed significant contracts to provide retailers such as Staples and Kmart with "private label" or store-brand tape, but lost those accounts when 3M offered the "bundled rebates" since they could be earned only if the retailers purchased targeted amounts of several 3M products.

The effect of the bundled rebate program, LePage's said, was to force the retailers to drop LePage's as a supplier.

A jury agreed and in an October 1999 verdict awarded LePage's $22,828,899 in damages -- a figure that was automatically trebled by Padova, for a total judgment of $68,486,697.

On appeal, 3M won the first round when a three-judge panel of the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals overturned the verdict, saying the case was fatally flawed because there was no evidence that 3M had ever slashed its prices to below-cost levels.

But the case was later reargued before a 10-judge en banc panel, which reinstated the verdict by a vote of 7-3. Writing for the majority, Circuit Judge Dolores K. Sloviter said LePage's had a valid antitrust claim because the evidence showed that 3M had set out to "kill" the niche market LePage's had created for discount "private label" tape.

The U.S. Supreme Court later refused to take the case up in an order handed down on the final day of its term in June 2004.

But for 3M, the litigation was hardly over because retailers responded to the suit by filing class actions that said the LePage's verdict had proven that the company was selling its tape at "supra-competitive" prices.

If the Bradburn settlement is approved by Padova, 3M will finally be finished with a 10-year stretch of litigation that has likely cost it well in excess of $200 million -- and that's not even counting the defense lawyers' fees.

In the court papers filed last week, the Bradburn plaintiffs team -- R. Stephen Berry, J. Daniel Leftwich and Gregory Baruch of Berry & Leftwich in Washington, D.C., and Charles M. Jones and Billy N. Jones of Jones Osteen & Jones in Hinesville, Ga. -- argued that the settlement is an excellent result that is likely to bring about few or no objections from the class members.

By recovering more than 40 percent of the class members' damages, the settlement is "in the top tier of antitrust settlements nationwide," the brief said.

Courts analyze the fairness of a class action settlement on the basis of a nine-factor test, and the plaintiffs team argues that the Bradburn settlement easily passes that test.

The suit was a highly complex one, they argue, and was litigated up to the point of trial. If not for the settlement, however, the case would likely have continued for years in post-trial motions and appeals.

But despite having strong claims and winning several key pretrial rulings, the plaintiffs' team also said the case was not without significant risks.

Among the issues that posed a challenge, they said, were proving that 3M's anti-competitive conduct had not only harmed LePage's, but had also harmed purchasers by driving up prices, and that "ongoing monopolization" after 1999 had harmed the class members.

And while the plaintiffs had an expert witness who was ready to testify that the purchasers suffered between $82 million and $96 million in damages, the brief said, lawyers for 3M would have called experts who would have insisted that none of the class members were overcharged since tape prices were declining or stabilized during the class period.

In their fee petition, also filed last week, the plaintiffs lawyers asked Padova to award them more than $13.9 million in attorney fees, equal to 35 percent of the settlement fund.

The petition notes that the $39.7 million settlement is the "highest single damages recovery against 3M, since the Meijer class settled for $27.7 million and the LePage's verdict, prior to trebling, was $22.8 million."

As a percentage of purchases, the brief said, the Bradburn settlement recovers about 18.5 percent of the class members' purchases, while the Meijer class recovered just 2 percent.

Kmart and Publix, both of which opted out of the Bradburn class, also settled for 2 percent of purchases, the brief said.

In an affidavit filed along with the fee petition, law professor Geoffrey Hazard said he believes a fee award of 35 percent -- despite being a higher percentage than is awarded in most class actions -- is "appropriate and justified" due to the value of the settlement.

Hazard said courts often approve antitrust settlements in which the class will recover only a small fraction of its damages -- often less than 20 percent -- while the Bradburn settlement recovers between 41 and 48 percent of the damages. And comparing the Bradburn settlement's recovery of 18.5 percent of purchases to the 2 percent of purchases settlements in the Meijer, Kmart and Publix cases, Hazard said, shows that the Bradburn settlement "is an exceptionally good one."

Qantas Bidders Try To Reassure Labor Unions (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

The buyout group bidding for Australia's Qantas Airways Ltd. met with union officials yesterday, promising not to cut services or send maintenance operations offshore, amid fears about jobs and working conditions.

However, unions said they wanted legally binding guarantees to protect staff and would continue talks with the buyout consortium, Qantas and the Australian government.

The Airline Partners Australia consortium, which includes Macquarie Bank Ltd., Allco Finance Group Ltd., Allco Equity Partners Ltd. and North American private equity firms Texas Pacific Group and Onex Corp., said it talked with representatives from the Transport Workers Union and the Australian & International Pilots Association.

"We reassured the representatives that Airline Partners Australia supports the existing management's approach and it will be business as usual for Qantas and its employees," APA director Bob Mansfield said. He said the support extended to Qantas' 10 billion Australian dollar (US$7.9 billion) fleet-renewal program over the next five years, its substantial training program, and continuation of its two-brand carrier strategy.

Peter Somerville, chief executive of the pilots association, which represents more than 2,300 Qantas technical flight crew, described the meeting as "cordial, but frank."

REIT To Consider Another Takeover Bid (NYT)

By Terry Pristin

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

Equity Office Properties, which agreed in November to be bought by a private equity company, the Blackstone Group, for $36 billion, including debt, said yesterday that it would begin discussions with a rival group that has offered to top that price.

Equity Office, the nation's largest office landlord, with 585 buildings in 24 metropolitan areas, also said it would open its books to the challengers, a consortium led by Vornado Realty Trust.

Raising the stakes in what was already the largest buyout battle ever, Vornado and its partners, Starwood Capital Group and Walton Street Capital, proposed last week to pay $52 a share for Equity Office, or 7.2 percent more than what Blackstone has offered. Vornado, a real estate investment trust that owns more than 100 million square feet of office, retail and showroom property, said its offer would include about $10.6 billion of its stock.

Setting a Jan. 31 deadline for the Vornado group to submit a formal proposal, Equity Office said it continued to recommend approval of the Blackstone merger.

A Blackstone spokesman, John Ford, had no comment, except to point out that the Blackstone deal could close three days after Equity Office shareholders approve the transaction. The vote is scheduled for Feb. 5.

Record Labels Contemplate Unrestricted Digital Music (NYT)

By Victoria Shannon

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

CANNES, France, Jan. 22 — As even digital music revenue growth falters because of rampant file-sharing by consumers, the major record labels are moving closer to releasing music on the Internet with no copying restrictions — a step they once vowed never to take.

Executives of several technology companies meeting here at Midem, the annual global trade fair for the music industry, said over the weekend that at least one of the four major record companies could move toward the sale of unrestricted digital files in the MP3 format within months.

Most independent record labels already sell tracks digitally compressed in the MP3 format, which can be downloaded, e-mailed or copied to computers, cellphones, portable music players and compact discs without limit.

The independents see providing songs in MP3 partly as a way of generating publicity that could lead to future sales.

For the major recording companies, however, selling in the MP3 format would be a capitulation to the power of the Internet, which has destroyed their control over the worldwide distribution of music.

Until last year, the industry was counting on online purchases of music, led by Apple's iTunes music store, to make up the difference.

But digital sales in 2006, while 80 percent ahead of the year before, grew slower than in 2005 and did not compensate for the decline in physical sales, according to an industry report released in London last week.

Even so, the move to MP3s is not inevitable, some insiders warn.

Publicly, music company executives say their systems for limiting copies are a way to fairly compensate artists and other copyright holders who contribute to the creation of music.

But privately, there are signs of a new appreciation in the industry for unrestricted copies, which could be sold as singles or through subscription services or made freely available on Internet sites that support advertising.

The EMI Group said last week that it would offer free streaming music on Baidu.com, the leading Web site and search engine in China, where 90 percent of music is pirated. EMI and Baidu also agreed to explore developing advertising-supported music download services. This summer EMI licensed its recording to Qtrax, an ad-supported music distribution service.

Experiments by Yahoo — last year it offered a handful of tracks from Norah Jones, Jessica Simpson, Jesse McCartney and Relient K without any digital restrictions — will continue this year, David Goldberg, vice president and general manager of Yahoo Music, said in an interview at Midem. Two of the major labels, Sony BMG and EMI, agreed to the tests in 2006.

In a handful of European countries, especially in France, consumer frustration has led to government proposals to legislate interoperability.

"There is a groundswell, and I say that on the basis of private conversations," said Rob Glaser, chief executive of RealNetworks, which sells digital music protected against piracy through the Rhapsody subscription service.

"It will happen between next year and five years from now, but it is more likely to be in one to two years," he said.

Legacy Issue: How Bush Is Preparing An About-turn To Tackle Climate Change (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, January 23, 2007

In his quest for a defining legacy beyond the Iraq war, tonight a chastened President George W. Bush in his State of the Union address will put energy security - reducing US dependence on foreign oil - at the heart of his political agenda for his final two years.

It is not a new issue for the former oilman. He trumpeted it in 2001, cemented by an energy strategy he summed up as: "We darn sure have to do a betterjob of finding more supply. We can't conserve our way to energy independence."

But this year will see a transformation in this view. In his past five State of the Union speeches, Mr Bush made no reference to global warming. Tonight he will make an explicit link between the demands of energy security and the environment, says Tony Snow, White House spokesman. "Energy and environmental policy are linked, for the simple reason that the president has talked about getting rid of an addiction to oil, and looking for alternative sources of energy which do not contribute to greenhouse gases or global warming."

The fact that Mr Bush is even talking about his actions on climate change, and will set out how his own policy helps address it, marks a profound departure from the past. Yet there remain doubts about whether the White House is willing to embrace more radical energy efficiency initiatives, or abandon its policy of the first six years of seeking to expand the supply of domestic oil.

The shift comes amid radical changes affecting Washington, from the shake-up in Congress in favour of the Democratic party to a freakish change in weather patterns. Last month the capital enjoyed a winter heatwave: Mr Bush went cycling as temperatures reached the 70s Fahrenheit (above 21 degrees Celsius), way higher than normal. Last year was the hottest in 112 years in the US.

On the other coast, normally warm winters have turned frigid and newspapers have been full of pictures of fresh California oranges on trees covered in icicles. This month the fate of weight-losing polar bears became front-page news when the White House for the first time conceded that climate change was a grave threat to their future. Dirk Kempthorne, interior secretary, said: "We are concerned the polar bear's habitat may literally be melting."

Yet the fact that Mr Bush will be talking about a linkage is one of the clearest signals that he feels the need to defend his efforts to cut greenhouse gases and address his image as a climate change sceptic, impassively looking on as the earth warms. Senior aides say he has been frustrated by the barrage of leaders admonishing him on global warming, from Tony Blair's constant solicitations to interventions by Angela Merkel, the German chancellor. Ban Ki-Moon, the new United Nations secretary general, last week also sandbagged him in the Oval Office on climate change.

Finally, it marks an acceptance that Democrats have transformed the Washington agenda, forcing a focus on a different kind of energy policy that gives high priority to climate change and energy efficiency. Interest in that agenda is evident in the box office success of former vice-president Al Gore's film, An Inconvenient Truth, a story of the impact of climate change that has grossed $24m (£12m, €19m) in the US. Last week Nancy Pelosi, speaker of the House of Representatives, created the first ever select committee to focus on climate change and energy independence and called for an energy independence package by July 4.

Within their first two weeks in office, senators have introduced at least eight bills proposing mandatory limits on greenhouse gas emissions, including one from Republican Senator John McCain. That compares with just one substantive carbon bill in 2003 and two in 2005. In the first 100 legislative hours, the House voted to rescind $14bn in tax breaks for oil companies granted by the Bush administration.

Proposals to raise fuel economy standards for US vehicles, which remain below those of China, are receiving more attention. The powerful House environment and public works committee has seen a U-turn from the chairmanship of Republican Jim Inhofe, who called the threat of catastrophic climate change "the greatest hoax", to that of Barbara Boxer, who calls it a "crisis".

"Energy policy has become high politics. The concept of energy independence is embraced across the political spectrum, offering a starting point for talking about energy," says Daniel Yergin, chairman of Cambridge Energy Research Associates. "The shift in Congress ensures this will be at the centre of debate for the next two years. It ties together national security, climate change, the future of the Middle East, the US relationship with Latin America and of course the burning political issue of what people pay the pump."

The resonance of the phrase "energy independence" is evident in the number of citations in the US press, rising from 1,245 in 2003 and 3,370 in 2005 to 6,082 last year. All the front-runners to be the Democratic presidential nominee in 2008 use it. Hillary Clinton wants to cut dependence on foreign oil in half by 2025. Senator Barack Obama wants to cut oil imports by the amount imported from the Middle East by 2025. Senator Joe Biden has conceded that the overall goal is "grandiose" but important.

Democrats' embrace of the ideal has convinced Mr Bushthat energy independence offers a chance for bipartisan co-operation. "The president wants this as a legacy issue and the Democratic congress needs to show it can get results in the next year," says Robert Hormats, vice-chairman at Goldman Sachs and former economic policy adviser to Henry Kissinger.

In fact, energy independence is something both parties could always agree on. President Richard Nixon first put it on the map when he launched Project Independence after oil prices jumped from $3 a barrel to $11. "In the year 1980, the United States will not be dependent on any other country for the energy we need to provide our jobs, to heat our homes and to keep our transportation moving," he predicted.

Gerald Ford sagely pushed the date back to 1985, but made progress introducing federal standards for energy efficiency for cars. In 1977 President Jimmy Carter called the energy crisis the "moral equivalent of war" and wore a woollen sweater in the White House in a sign of his personal conservation effort. Two years later he pledged: "This nation will never again use more foreign oil than we did in 1977 - never" and set the goal of "cutting our dependence on foreign oil by one-half by the end of the next decade".

All these initiatives, while slowing the rate of growth in US energy dependence, proved quixotic. Oil imports made up 35 per cent of US petroleum supplies in 1973. They have risen steadily since then to 40.5 per cent in 1980 and 66 per cent now, according to the Energy Information Administration. Dependence on imported oil has risen since Mr Bush took office, when it stood at 58 per cent.

George Shultz, former secretary of state, sees a stark change from three decades ago when he chaired task forces for Nixon on the oil import system and as Treasury secretary coped with the first big oil price explosion. The array of forces in favour of energy independence is stronger now, he says.

"The big difference I think is that in 1968-73, it was largely economic," he says. "Now there are people concerned about the environment, economics, national security. Those are very different constituencies and there is a chance they can interact together and produce something that will be different."

These constituencies, which have formed an unusually unwieldy coalition on energy independence, include national security hawks, dubbed "green hawks", concerned about dependence on oil from a volatile Middle East and oil giants such as Russia that use energy as a political weapon. The group includes Mr Shultz; John Deutch and James Woolsey, two former CIA directors; James Schlesinger, former defence secretary; and retired officers such as Air Force General Chuck Wald.

"Look where the money from high oil prices is going," says Mr Shultz. "Iran is rolling in money. Venezuela is rolling in money. Russia is consolidating an autocracy using oil money. We just hope Saudi Arabia keeps producing, because it is vulnerable."

The hawks find themselves strange bedfellows with trade unionists and the powerful Midwest farm lobby, which is eager to fan concerns about foreign oil in order to sustain the massive subsidies for ethanol, a renewable fuel created from corn. - Evangelical Christians have joined the coalition in order not to "destroy Creation": last February 86 evangelical leaders launched the Evangelical Climate Initiative.

US companies have also become more engaged, driven by self-interest, a desire to pre-empt punitive legislation and concern about the sprawling patchwork of regulation introduced by different states, such as Arnold Schwarzenegger, governor of -California (see right). A total of 22 states now require a fixed percentage of their electricity to come from renewable sources.

An alliance of 10 of the biggest US corporations yesterday joined environmental groups to demand caps on greenhouse emissions, to cut these by up to 30 per cent over the next 15 years. "Companies have concluded it is not 'if' but 'what' in terms of a carbon regime," says Mr Yergin. A Cera survey of electric utility chief executives and finance directors showed 85 per cent expected mandated restrictions within 10 years.

The Bush administration has been identified with efforts to boost US supply, to reduce dependence on foreign oil. Now, however, it could face more pressure to focus on energy efficiency, such as raising fuel economy standards.

On renewable fuels, the record has been mixed. The administration has shifted from backing hydrogen fuels in 2003 to ethanol last year. The $2bn it set aside for loan guarantees in renewable fuels has been snarled in bureaucracy. According to the General Accounting Office, the Department of Energy's budget for energy research and development fell by 85 per cent in real terms from 1978 to 2005 and has generated only "incremental progress in reducing costs for renewable energy technologies".

The White House therefore needs a bigger commitment to show that it is serious. Mr Bush is expected to set an aggressive target for how much ethanol US refiners must mix with gasoline, an attractive policy given the popularity of ethanol. "Carrots tend to work better than sticks," says Mr Snow. It has, however, ruled out imposing economy-wide caps on greenhouse gases. That sets it on a collision course with Capitol Hill. An industry lobbyist says: "Energy policy has been the creation of Congress. Almost anything Bush says in the speech is irrelevant the day after he says it."

Oil companies, demonised by many Democrats as "Big Oil", are fearful of the momentum against them. As Red Cavaney, president of the American Petroleum Institute, put it in a speech last week: "Bad energy legislation has a decades-long shelf life, through both its adverse direct effects as well as its chilling effect on investment through fear of 'what's next'."

CEOs Urge Bush To Limit Greenhouse Gas Emissions (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 23, 2007

On the eve of the State of the Union address, the chief executives of 10 major corporations urged President Bush to embrace mandatory ceilings on U.S. greenhouse gas emissions in order to stem climate change.

DOJ_NMG_0120490

But yesterday White House spokesman Tony Snow said that binding caps on carbon dioxide emissions would not be part of the president's proposals tonight. And a member of the corporate delegation said that last week the White House canceled a meeting with the executives that had been scheduled for yesterday morning.

"The President has always believed, when it comes to climate change, that the best way to achieve reductions is through innovation," Snow said, "and to figure out ways to come up with energy sources that are going to meet our economy's constant demand for energy, and at the same time, do it in a way that's going to be friendly for the environment."

There has been widespread speculation about what Bush might say about climate change tonight. Several legislative proposals have emerged in Congress with different ways for addressing climate change.

Major corporate leaders have been changing their position on climate change for the past year or two, and many of them are convinced that some form of regulation of or tax on carbon emissions is inevitable. With many states talking about coming up with their own laws, corporate leaders have started to urge the federal government to establish a nationwide standard.

"We can and must take prompt action to establish a coordinated, economy-wide market-driven approach to climate protection," the executives said in a letter to Bush. In an interview later, Jeffry E. Sterba, chairman of PNM Resources, a New Mexico utility, said that it was better to act now than to be forced to act in a "precipitous way" later.

The executives support a system that would create a cap on emissions, give allocations to companies based on past emissions and allow firms to trade allocations to meet gradually declining emission targets. The system, similar to one being used in Europe, would have far-reaching implications for utility rates, power plant construction, energy efficiency and American automobiles.

The executives' plan would slow the growth in greenhouse gases over the next five years, then reverse that growth and cut annual emissions by 70 percent to 90 percent of today's levels in 15 years.

Jeffrey Immelt, chairman of General Electric, pointing to initiatives in California and a group of Northeastern states, said "this is happening already." In addition to Immelt and Sterba, the group included the chief executives of Lehman Brothers Holdings, PG&E, Alcoa, Caterpillar, BP America, Duke Energy, DuPont and FPL Group.

Snow said that he thought Bush's proposals "address in a comprehensive and realistic way concerns about greenhouse emissions, and also their primary sources."

NEW CONSENSUS In Climate Controversy, Industry Cedes Ground (WSJ)

By Jeffrey Ball

Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

The global-warming debate is shifting from science to economics.

For years, the fight over the Earth's rising temperature has been mostly over what's causing it: fossil-fuel emissions or natural factors beyond man's control. Now, some of the country's biggest industrial companies are acknowledging that fossil fuels are a major culprit whose emissions should be cut significantly over time.

A growing number of these companies are pushing for a mandatory emissions limit, or "cap." Some see a lucrative new market in clean-energy technologies. Many figure a regulation is politically inevitable and they want to be in the room when it's negotiated, to minimize the burden that falls on them.

The broadening, if incomplete, consensus that fossil fuels are at least a big part of the global-warming problem signals real change in the environmental debate. The biggest question going forward no longer is whether fossil-fuel emissions should be curbed. It's who will foot the bill for the cleanup -- and that battle is heating up.

Yesterday, 10 companies, including industrial giants that make everything from bulldozers to chemicals to electricity, joined environmental groups in calling for a federal law to "slow, stop and reverse the growth" of global-warming emissions "over the shortest period of time reasonably achievable." Tonight, President Bush, whose administration has rejected such caps as economically unacceptable, will deliver a State of the Union address in which he's expected to announce a bigger push for such things as low-emission alternative fuels.

In the center of the regulatory cross hairs are utilities. They're the world's biggest emitters of carbon dioxide, the global-warming gas that's produced whenever fossil fuels are burned. Written one way, a cap would help utilities in the Southeast or the Midwest, which burn lots of coal, a particularly carbon-intensive fuel. Written another way, a rule would help utilities on the West Coast, the Northeast and the Gulf Coast. They use mainly natural gas, which produces lower CO2 emissions than coal, and nuclear energy, which produces essentially no CO2.

Auto makers and oil producers also are worried about a potential cap, and they're lashing out at each other. The Big Three auto companies are making speeches and running advertisements calling on Big Oil to crank out more low-carbon alternative fuels such as corn-based ethanol. Big Oil, in its own speeches and ads, says the auto makers should build more-efficient cars.

Lobbying on the issue is ramping up. The American Iron and Steel Institute, which opposes any emission cap, this month assigned an executive who had been working broadly on environmental issues to focus specifically on global warming. Some companies that oppose a cap argue it would raise their costs and hurt their competitiveness against rivals in developing countries such as China, where no cap exists.

DuPont Co., the chemical giant, heartily endorses a cap in part because it figures it would help boost demand for energy-efficiency products the company makes.

Entergy Corp., a utility that's also pushing for a cap, had a lobbyist in the room last week when Sen. Dianne Feinstein, a California Democrat, announced a carbon-cap bill. Entergy would likely benefit from her measure because the company's fuel mix includes a lot of low-carbon fuels.

"It was a hand-holding, kumbaya moment," says Brent Dorsey, Entergy's director of corporate environmental programs. "Every company is going to be playing to their own strengths and weaknesses" in the regulatory battle that's breaking out over global warming, he adds.

Among scientists, a broadening consensus has developed that fossil-fuel emissions are contributing to global warming; the debate has been over whether they're the main cause. In 2001, the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, a United Nations body that periodically assesses climate science, cited "new and stronger evidence that most of the warming observed over the last 50 years is attributable to human activities." In 2005, representatives of scientific societies from 11 countries, including the U.S., called the science "sufficiently clear to justify nations taking prompt action."

Still, uncertainties remain. Among them, the U.N. panel noted in its 2001 report, is the extent to which "natural factors" unrelated to human activity play a role in the rising temperatures. The U.N. panel is set to release its next climate-science report Feb. 2.

Fossil fuels provided 80% of global energy in 2004, and they're on track to provide 81% in 2030, according to the International Energy Agency, a Paris-based energy watchdog for Western industrialized countries.

Significantly curbing their emissions would require sweeping technological change, from more-efficient power plants and cars to the potential injection and burial of massive amounts of CO2 underground.

Another possibility would be to reduce the rate of growth in fossil-fuel consumption by supplementing the fuel mix with alternatives, from nuclear power to crops to the wind and the sun.

Outside the U.S., many countries already have modest experience in emissions caps, thanks to the Kyoto Protocol. The treaty, which hasn't been ratified by the U.S., requires ratifying nations collectively to cut their emissions 5% below 1990 levels by 2012.

Several Northeast states and California already have announced plans to impose emission caps of their own. And a handful of proposed federal caps are under consideration in Congress. The least stringent is one from senators led by Jeff Bingaman, a New Mexico Democrat. By 2030, it would raise gasoline prices 12 cents per gallon, according to a study issued this month by the U.S. Energy Information Administration, and slow the rate at which U.S. coal consumption increases.

The federal proposals differ in the structural details of the "cap and trade" system they would set up to regulate CO2 emissions. Under such a system, the government would set a ceiling on how much CO2 the U.S. economy -- or whichever sectors lawmakers pick -- could emit each year. It would ink a corresponding number of pollution permits, each entitling the bearer to emit one ton of the gas.

Then, based on complex allocation rules it devises, the government would divide up the permits among companies. Those companies could buy and sell permits among themselves on a greenhouse-gas market like a Kyoto-related one already under way outside the U.S. Companies that decide it's too expensive to cut their own emissions enough to comply with their government cap would go to the market and buy extra emission permits from companies that ended up with more than they needed. The theory behind the market is to create an economy of scale that reduces everyone's cost.

Other regulatory structures are possible, including a straight tax on CO2 emissions. Politically, a cap-and-trade system is more popular than a tax. Environmentalists like the severity of an absolute ceiling on the amount of CO2 companies can emit. Industry likes the flexibility of a market in which permits to pollute can be bought and sold.

And cap-and-trade systems already are in use. The U.S. has had one for more than a decade to curb the pollution that causes acid rain, a regulation widely viewed as successful.

Still, Steven Rowlan, director of environmental affairs for Nucor Corp., one of the biggest U.S. steelmakers, warns U.S. industry is in for a shock if Washington follows Europe and imposes a global-warming cap. The U.S. steel industry already has gotten more energy-efficient in recent years, he says, so it would be unfair to require it to make further emission cuts while its competitors in the developing world, where emissions are rising fastest, remain free from a cap. The steelmaking process itself emits large amounts of CO2.

A smarter tactic, he says, would be for the U.S. to slap trade restrictions on developing-world steelmakers requiring them to meet minimum environmental standards as a condition for exporting their products to the U.S.

"The biggest hammer that the United States has is its market," Mr. Rowlan says. "And that, more than anything we do domestically, will have the greatest impact on greenhouse gases." Nucor, based in Charlotte, N.C., is considering running ads to drive this point home.

DuPont, on the other hand, is actively promoting an emissions cap. It thinks a cap would help its business. DuPont makes materials used in such devices as solar cells, wind turbines, fuel cells, and lightweight automobiles -- all of which are likely to be in higher demand in an economy in which CO2 emissions carry a cost.

"We think there is a lot of market opportunity," says Linda Fisher, a former U.S. Environmental Protection Agency official who's now DuPont's chief sustainability officer.

But DuPont, based in Wilmington, Del., doesn't want just any cap. For one thing, it wants a cap that covers all sectors of the economy -- not one that's limited to utilities, as are some proposals pending in Washington. The more industries covered by a cap, the more potential customers for DuPont's environmental products.

DuPont also wants a cap to award companies credit for past emission cuts they've made. DuPont already has invested to significantly cut its emissions.

Utilities, for their part, are split on whether they want a cap -- and, if so, what kind. Where a utility stands on this issue depends largely on where in the country it sits.

Duke Energy Corp., based in Charlotte, is the country's third-largest burner of coal, though it also has significant nuclear assets. It's pushing for permits to be distributed based on the amount of CO2 a utility has emitted in the past -- a system that would protect big coal burners such as itself.

James Rogers, Duke's chairman and chief executive, notes that Duke already is assuming in its investment decisions that it will have to pay for carbon emissions. So it has begun investing in new plants that will burn coal more cleanly than today's plants do. He argues any cap should ensure adequate permits to utilities making such investments. "It's going to take several decades to bring this on," he says of the technology. "We shouldn't have an economic scheme that puts an undue economic burden on regions of the country that are reliant on coal."

Given Duke's coal reliance, it might seem strange that Mr. Rogers has emerged in recent years as perhaps the U.S. utility industry's most outspoken proponent of a global-warming constraint. His position is a bit "awkward," he notes, because he also serves as chairman of the Edison Electric Institute, the electric industry's Washington trade group, which opposes any mandatory global-warming cap. He's set to speak on three panels discussing global warming this week at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland.

Mr. Rogers, wearing his Duke hat, says he's just being realistic. He has concluded a cap is coming -- and that his shareholders are likely to do better if he can influence the details. "If you're not at the table when these negotiations are going on, you're going to be on the menu," he says. "This is about being at the table."

Fighting Duke and other coal-burners are utilities such as Entergy. Based in New Orleans, it uses a lot of natural gas and nuclear fuel. Unlike Duke, Entergy wants permits to be distributed based on a utility's total electricity output -- a system likely to give low-carbon generators such as itself excess permits they could sell.

Duke's Mr. Rogers says that would amount to a "windfall" for low-carbon utilities. "Even though they don't need allowances, they would get them, just because," he says.

Entergy's Mr. Dorsey says his company isn't asking for a windfall. The permits Entergy would get amount to "a revenue stream that we will need to build a new nuclear plant," he says. Still, he allows, "because of our natural gas and nuclear, we will fare better than most" under a carbon cap.

Auto companies also are jockeying to shape a potential carbon constraint to their advantage. They've been playing this sort of regulatory game for years.

They already face a kind of carbon limit in the federal government's longstanding fuel-economy standards for cars and trucks, because vehicles that burn less gasoline emit less CO2. Those rules give auto makers extra credit for building versions of their conventional vehicles they've modified to run on either gasoline or ethanol. Very few of those vehicles actually wind up running on anything but gasoline. But the credits let the auto makers build more thirsty sport-utility vehicles and pickup trucks -- the industry's bread and butter, particularly when oil was cheaper.

Auto officials who declined to be named said the industry probably will accept some toughening of the fuel-economy standards. But in return, it may seek bigger credits for selling vehicles that burn less oil, including those that can run on ethanol.

At the same time, auto makers want to ensure other industries get hit. In a speech last week in Detroit, Rick Wagoner, General Motors Corp.'s chairman and chief executive, said his company plans to build more ethanol-capable and electric-powered vehicles. But he also stressed "important roles for other industries, like oil and electric utilities, to name a few." He called for more tax credits and subsidies for alternative fuels.

The oil industry itself is mobilizing -- including Exxon Mobil Corp., the Irving, Texas, oil giant that in the past has been outspoken in its questioning of global-warming theories. Scientific questions remain, says Kenneth Cohen, Exxon's vice president for public affairs, but "we know enough now -- or society knows enough now -- that the risk is serious and action should be taken." Exxon isn't calling for an emission constraint, but it's starting to talk about how it wants one structured if one is imposed.

In November, Rex Tillerson, Exxon's chairman and chief executive, called in a speech for "steps now to reduce emissions in effective and meaningful ways." Then he listed two: boosting automotive fuel economy and cutting emissions from coal-fired power plants.

Springtime For Ethanol (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Renewable Fuels Association, the ethanol industry's major lobbyist, works out of cramped offices that it shares with a lawyer near Capitol Hill. Pictures of ethanol plants from its 61 board members hang everywhere. "We're about to run out of wall space," said Bob Dinneen, the association's president.

The association may only have six staff members but it is now bursting with energy, a far cry from the early days when its founder, a South Dakota farm boy who was convinced America needed to break the stranglehold of foreign oil, quit in frustration after four years.

After three decades of surviving mostly on tax subsidies, the industry is poised tonight to get its biggest endorsement from on high that it has a long-term future as a home-grown alternative to gasoline.

In his State of the Union address, President Bush is expected to call for a huge increase in the amount of ethanol that refiners mix with gasoline, probably double the current goal of 7.5 billion gallons by 2012.

While the details of the proposal are not known, 15 billion gallons of ethanol would work out to more than 10 percent of the country's current gasoline consumption, and is far beyond the current capacity of about 5.4 billion gallons.

At least half of the new ethanol would come from corn, signaling the administration's support to the Midwest farm states that have benefited the most from the recent ethanol boom.

For an industry once dominated by the will of a single powerful producer, Archer Daniels Midland, ethanol has come a long way, joining the oil industry and producers of major agricultural commodities as an entrenched political force in Washington. And it now enjoys a powerful role in presidential politics because of Iowa's status as one of the first states to select delegates to the parties' nominating conventions.

But with dozens of new ethanol plants coming online this year, the ethanol lobby is facing a critical point. The political reality is that corn's days as the chief crop for making the fuel may be numbered.

Corn-based ethanol can only marginally reduce America's dependence on foreign oil. But it does little, if anything, to improve energy efficiency, and the mounting concern of some politicians is that relying on corn is leading to collateral damage in other parts of the agricultural economy and threatening the nation's status as the leading corn exporter. The big increase in the works may mean consumers would end up paying more at the supermarket.

So the ethanol lobby and its political supporters now face the challenge of trying to maintain the momentum of ethanol's feel-good story before the potential negative consequences of the rapid ramp-up become all too apparent.

Clutching the reins these last five years is Mr. Dinneen, a longtime Washington lobbyist who joined the association in 1988. He recalled his early years there as a pitched war with the oil industry. "I would wake up in the morning and try to think of a way to vilify the oil guys," he said.

Today, to keep the ethanol train moving, ethanol makers are cozying up to the oil industry, forming political alliances and enlisting executives from companies like Chevron as they race to make a quicker transition to cellulosic ethanol made from nonfood crops, like switchgrass.

Otherwise, public support could turn against the fuel, which yields a third less energy than petroleum-based gasoline and still relies on a federal subsidy of 51 cents a gallon to remain competitive.

"We are no longer debating whether this makes sense, if this public policy should be pursued," Mr. Dinneen said. "The discourse now is how much ethanol can we produce, how quickly can we produce it and what is the pathway for greater production of domestic renewables."

That pathway, at the moment, relies on commercializing cellulosic ethanol made from crops like switchgrass or wood chips, which today is twice as expensive to produce as ethanol made from corn.

Some analysts, though, believe that politics has already trumped economics. “Once we have a corn-based technology up and running the political system will protect it,” said Lawrence J. Goldstein, a board member at the Energy Policy Research Foundation. “We cannot afford to have 15 billion gallons of corn-based ethanol in 2015, and that’s exactly where we are headed.”

Mr. Goldstein said that rather than speed up the process of producing more ethanol, Congress should “step back and reflect on the damage we have already done.”

By contrast, ethanol advocates in Congress are pushing to accelerate research into cellulosic sources with the stated goal of speeding the timetable for when corn can be supplemented — or supplanted — as the chief ethanol crop.

“We need additional funds for transitioning to making more energy crops for our national security,” Senator Tom Harkin, an Iowa Democrat and the new chairman of the Senate Agriculture Committee, said in an interview earlier this month.”

The agriculture secretary, Mike Johanns, said there will be an “adjustment period“ for ethanol that will last a few years. But he is confident that more corn will emerge to ease the pain of higher grain prices, as seed companies improve yields and farmers shift their acreage from other crops. “When you look at the whole constellation of issues, and advancements that are out there, it is a very encouraging time for agriculture,” Mr. Johanns said in an interview.

The race to crack the code to produce cellulosic ethanol more efficiently has attracted dozens of researchers, venture capitalists and even the interest of major oil companies like BP and Chevron. Vinod Khosla, a major venture capitalist who has poured money into seven different start-up companies, has been pushing Washington lawmakers to set more aggressive targets to ensure that the demand for corn moves beyond corn. “If I am going to take the risk, the market has to be big,” Mr. Khosla said.

The Renewable Fuels Association is trying to balance the competing concerns. The organization was not always interested in rapid expansion, particularly if that meant allowing competition for A.D.M. from sources like Brazilian sugar. David Hallberg, the association’s founding president, said he left after four years in the job partly because he grew tired of disputes with A.D.M. executives over the future direction of the industry.

“I thought my job was to grow the industry to be as large as it could be,“ said Mr. Hallberg, who denied he was forced out. “That isn’t what our bigger members always wanted.”

By the time Mr. Hallberg left the organization in 1985, oil prices had plummeted to $9 a barrel, making ethanol uneconomic as a fuel. The industry turned its efforts toward selling ethanol as an oxygen enhancer for gasoline that could lift octane and reduce carbon monoxide.

With the influence of Dwayne O. Andreas, A.D.M.’s longtime chief executive and now chairman emeritus, Congress passed the federal excise tax in 1978 that gave ethanol its primary subsidy, a credit worth 51 cents per gallon of ethanol, or $21 per barrel of oil. Mr. Andreas had powerful friends in Congress, including Senator Robert J. Dole, a Republican from Kansas who rose to majority leader and who pushed consistently over the years to retain the ethanol subsidy.

In those early days the influence of Mr. Andreas and A.D.M.’s generous contributions to both Republicans and Democrats kept ethanol alive. The company also held greater sway within the organization because of its great weight as an ethanol producer. Even today, at around 25 percent of total ethanol capacity, A.D.M. remains the largest maker.

At first, the ethanol producers had few allies. The National Corn Growers Association was agnostic about ethanol at best, and the American Farm Bureau opposed ethanol, worrying that it could raise the price of livestock feed and cut into exports, Mr. Hallberg said.

That began to change in the late 1980s when the groups began to work together to supply ethanol to some 30 cities as a gasoline additive in the winter months. Those months were also when A.D.M.’s wet mill corn processing plants made more ethanol.

While the ethanol and corn forces preferred their wintertime plan, they later threw their support behind a federal proposal to implement a reformulated gasoline with an “oxygenate” — either ethanol or methyl tertiary-butyl ether — in nine of the country’s smoggiest cities. The program took effect in 1995.

Ethanol’s big breakthrough came over the battle to ban M.T.B.E. After gasoline spills in California revealed that M.T.B.E. could corrode groundwater, the Renewable Fuels Association and the corn growers were among those pushing ethanol as an environmentally safer alternative.

California banned M.T.B.E. in 1999 and requested a waiver from the federal oxygenate standard, arguing it could make a cleaner-burning gasoline without ethanol. President Bush rejected the waiver, spurring an ethanol construction miniboom.

In 2001, Mr. Dinneen took over as president, focused on reaching détente with the oil industry. To win approval for the renewable fuels standard, he eventually cobbled together an unlikely coalition of consumer groups, the American Petroleum Institute and environmentalists like the Natural Resources Defense Council.

The fuel standard Congress approved in 2005, which called for a ramp-up of ethanol use to 7.5 billion gallons by 2012, ended up lighting a fire under the industry. When oil prices shot over $50 a barrel, ethanol became profitable, and then President Bush set off an industry building boom when he said last January that “America is addicted to oil.”

It helped that the mix of ethanol’s advocates had been changing. About a decade ago farmers began investing in ethanol plants; today more than half of the 110 ethanol plants in production are at least partly owned by farmers. The ownership by farmers brought home the rural benefits of the ethanol industry more directly.

The association’s expanding board, which is 10 times the size it was some 20 years ago, has also become more diverse and less beholden to the business agendas of its biggest members.

As ethanol expands, Mr. Dinneen dismissed the concerns of some economists that its explosive growth could threaten exports and livestock prices, and that a potential investment bubble could burst before cellulosic ethanol has a chance to hit the market.

“I don’t get all that worried that we are building too fast,” he said. “I am not bright enough or foolish enough to try to control the market.”

Ethanol Production Booming On Demand (WP)

By Steven Mufson

Washington Post, January 23, 2007

The energy agenda in Washington has been long dominated by oil interests, but in a reversal of political fortunes, these days it is Big Oil fighting to preserve its tax incentives and the ethanol industry that is adding new ones.

President Bush may up the ante tonight in his State of the Union address, many analysts think, by setting new targets for ethanol use or encouraging automakers to shift to engines capable of handling E85, a fuel that is 85 percent ethanol.

The ethanol industry is already on a roll: This year's production will surpass the mandate set for 2012 -- 7.5 billion gallons -- in the Energy Policy Act of 2005. And investors drove up the stock prices of ethanol companies yesterday in anticipation of Bush's speech. Though the stock market fell, shares of VeraSun Energy Corp. soared 7.2 percent and Pacific Ethanol Inc. jumped 7.6 percent. (One senator has invited VeraSun's chief executive to attend Bush's speech.) Bush may have trouble matching proposals made by Democratic lawmakers and farm-state Republicans. Sens. Tom Harkin (D-Iowa), Barack Obama (D-Ill.), Richard G. Lugar (R-Ind.), Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) and Byron L. Dorgan (D-N.D.) have proposed raising to 60 billion gallons a year the amount of ethanol that oil companies must mix into automotive fuel supplies by 2030. That would amount to 3.9 million barrels a day, more than a third of current gasoline consumption.

Bill Wicker, communications director at the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee, said that biofuel and ethanol executives and lobbyists keep the committee's fuels expert busy "from the time she gets in in the morning until the time she grabs her coat to go home. It's a pretty steady stream of customers."

But an increasing number of economists and energy experts are questioning whether the benefits of producing ethanol -- especially ethanol made from corn -- have been oversold. They say that rising ethanol production is driving up corn prices, adding to summer smog and draining investment from other energy projects.

"We think that corn-based ethanol will grow to about 10 percent of the total gasoline pool, which is a significant number. It's the same level as Indonesia's oil production," said Daniel Yergin, chairman of Cambridge Energy Research Associates. "But then you really do run into the fuel-versus-food tradeoffs, which we're already beginning to see some signs of."

There are 111 ethanol refineries nationwide, with the capacity to produce more than 5.4 billion gallons annually, according to the Renewable Fuels Association. There are 78 ethanol refineries and eight expansions under construction with a combined annual capacity of more than 6 billion gallons.

Lester R. Brown, president of the Earth Policy Institute, said that existing ethanol refineries plus refineries under construction will gobble up half the U.S. corn harvest in 2008. That in turn will set up a global competition between rich automobile users and poor food consumers, Brown said.

Even at current levels, ethanol production is driving up demand for corn, and corn prices as a result. Many foods rely on corn feed and corn sweeteners, so prices could rise as well for a wide variety of goods. Because the United States accounts for 40 percent of the global corn harvest, higher corn prices here will affect consumers worldwide, Brown said. Last week, Mexican President Felipe CalderÃ³n sought to defuse anger over the rising price of corn tortillas by persuading producers to accept voluntary price controls.

Ethanol also has foes in the environmental community. Because ethanol is a less stable compound than other additives, in the summer it evaporates easily and contributes to greater smog levels.

Meanwhile, an effective tariff protects American-made ethanol from cheaper imports from Brazil and elsewhere.

Many ethanol boosters say that the industry will move away from corn to cellulosic sources. But it remains unclear whether that technology will work. In December, when the Joint Committee on Taxation calculated the five-year cost of a tax break for the builders of cellulosic ethanol plants, the low cost suggested that it expected no more than one plant up and running by 2012.

Economists have also been warring over the question of how much energy it takes to produce ethanol. Most experts say that distilleries produce slightly more energy than they consume. But growing more corn has other costs, such as greater soil erosion and pesticide use. The numbers vary widely depending on process and location.

While the controversy continues, so does the boom. An economist at Iowa State University has calculated that when the ethanol distilleries under construction in Iowa are complete, the state will become a corn importer. But with the early start of the 2008 presidential fray, few politicians will suggest putting the brakes on corn ethanol for fear of alienating voters in Iowa caucuses, the first contest for presidential candidates.

Internal Rifts Cloud Democrats' Opportunity On Warming (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin And Michael Grunwald

Washington Post, January 23, 2007

The House Democrats had not quite finished their "100 hours" agenda when they met in the Capitol basement Thursday morning, but Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) was already looking ahead. As her colleagues ate bagels and turkey sausage, she warned that their next challenge would be a lot tougher than popular issues such as student loans and ethics reforms. For her next act, she planned to take on global warming.

Democrats, she explained, had to show a sense of urgency about the carbon emissions that threaten the planet, and so she was creating a select committee on energy independence and climate change to communicate that urgency. The new committee, she said, would help the caucus speak with one voice -- even if it trampled the turf of existing committees.

Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.), a close Pelosi ally, raised his gavel and asked whether anyone had anything else to say, in the same pro forma way that question is posed at weddings. "One, do I hear anything?" he asked. "Two do I hear, 2 1/2 do I hear, three." Emanuel's gavel came down. "The caucus meeting is over."

Pelosi's power play demonstrated her seriousness about climate, a complex issue that may be as legislatively difficult and politically treacherous as health care was in the 1990s. But it also reflected her seriousness about imposing discipline on her caucus and preventing a return to the days when long-serving Democratic chairmen ran their committees as independent fiefdoms.

Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John D. Dingell (Mich.) -- the longest-serving House member and a legendary defender of his committee's prerogatives as well as the carbon-emitting auto industry of his home state -- had made it clear that he expected to lead the party's global-warming debate in a rather leisurely fashion. Pelosi was end-running him.

When "Big John" chaired Energy and Commerce from 1981 to 1995, the prickly power broker displayed a prominent photo of the Earth to illustrate his view of the panel's jurisdiction. Now the photo is back, along with Dingell's determination to resist interference. A few hours after Pelosi presented her plan to the caucus, Dingell convened the 31 Democrats on Energy and Commerce. Predictably, he saw Pelosi's new committee as a recipe for duplication, incompetence and the suppression of democracy.

Less predictably, Dingell was supported by a longtime Energy and Commerce rival, Rep. Henry A. Waxman, a California liberal who agrees with Pelosi about global warming and persuaded her to co-sponsor his own aggressive climate bill last year, but who also wants her to respect her chairmen. That's because he chairs the Oversight and Government Reform Committee, where he plans to hold hearings on his bill. At the Energy and Commerce meeting, he warned that Pelosi might be scheming to write bills out of her own office.

"That's the way the Republicans did it," Waxman said.

Those are fighting words in the new majority, and some Energy and Commerce Democrats are willing to fight. Several with mixed feelings about drastic carbon regulations -- including Rep. Rick Boucher, who represents a coal-heavy Virginia district and chairs the subcommittee on energy and air quality -- discussed working with Republicans to defeat the new committee on the House floor.

The strict emissions cuts that Pelosi supports had no chance in the GOP Congress, but they still face an uphill climb. Carbon-reliant industries including coal, oil, agriculture and manufacturing will resist any strong legislation, a position that will pose serious dilemmas for Democrats in districts where those industries and their unions hold sway. Some representatives of low-income minority districts are also concerned that a climate bill would slap heavy energy costs on their constituents.

Even if Pelosi manages to finagle a bill through the House, there is the problem of the Senate, where global-warming skeptic James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.) has lost his chairmanship to climate-conscious Barbara Boxer (D-Calif.) but has threatened a filibuster. And President Bush seems unlikely to sign anything too far-reaching.

That is why some environmentalists want Pelosi to delay until she can send a bill to a more sympathetic president in 2009, and why some Democrats want her to delay so they can use the issue against Republicans in 2008.

"It's a briar patch," said one industry lobbyist. "I can understand why Pelosi wants to hold hearings to show the Democrats care, but I can't believe she really wants to try to legislate."

But Pelosi and her leadership team believe action will be good politics as well as policy, branding climate as a Democratic issue while showing the caucus that recalcitrant chairmen are no longer free to freelance. Pelosi had already warned Rep. John Conyers Jr. (D-Mich.) not to use the Judiciary Committee to try to impeach Bush, and she denied her rival Rep. Jane Harman (D-Calif.) the gavel of the Intelligence Committee. Less than two hours after the mutinous Energy and Commerce meeting, she stood up to Dingell as well, holding a news conference to declare her select committee a done deal.

"It says to the American people, we are about the future," she said.Act Fast vs. Go Slow

Rep. Jay Inslee (D-Wash.) is worried about the future on a hotter planet, and the posters in his office show why. There's Glacier National Park, where Inslee believes "there will be no glaciers in 50 years." There's Mount Rainier, where alpine meadows are retreating as higher temperatures push the tree line higher. There's a photo of his 28-year-old son, Connor, skiing down Washington's Stevens Pass; two years ago, there was so little snow on the mountain that Connor could only work on the ski patrol for a few days.

For the first decade of Inslee's congressional career, Republicans controlled Congress, and emissions-reduction rules were about as likely as new gun restrictions or same-sex marriage rights. But now Inslee and many of his colleagues speak with a fervor reminiscent of the GOP revolutionaries who seized the House in 1995 and immediately wanted to shake things up.

"The flat-Earth society has been removed from power," Inslee said. "This opens the door to meaningful change."

Inslee is just a back-bencher on Energy and Commerce, but he is already trying to hash out details of climate change legislation. Last week, he spent an hour on the phone with Duke Energy chief executive Jim Rogers, who has endorsed a limit on carbon emissions. They delved into the details of how a limit could work, how to promote cleaner technologies, how it is easier to sequester carbon in the soil in Indiana than in North Carolina.

Inslee has no patience for the go-slow crowd that thinks Democrats would be smarter to grandstand the climate issue in 2008, then work with an eco-friendlier president in 2009. He wants to get to work.

"This should not be a planning year," he said. "This should not be a debating year. This should be an action year."

Dingell represents the other side of the debate, the side that is quick to point out that overzealous restrictions on emissions could decimate the U.S. economy. He wants to hold extensive hearings on climate change, to investigate the problem, if in fact it is a problem, and what it might cost to try to address it. That is the way he has dealt with issues since he came to Congress during the first Eisenhower administration. He says global warming will be a priority for his committee, but clearly not the only priority.

"We've got Medicaid, Medicare, health insurance, prescription drugs," Dingell said. "We've got leaky underground storage tanks."

Leaky underground storage tanks? When Glacier National Park is melting?

"Superfund isn't being properly administered," he continued. "We have safe drinking water . . . what else?" His chief of staff, former auto lobbyist Dennis Fitzgibbons, mentions telecommunications, and Dingell is back to his list: Net neutrality. Universal service. "We have to address high-definition television, and a similar issue with regard to radio . . . "

Pelosi and her allies may think CO2 is more important than HDTV, but Dingell will not be rushed. He mentions that the politics of carbon are "substantially similar, if not identical" to the politics of the Clean Air Act, which required a decade of debate before it was amended in 1990 to deal with acid rain. He does not mention that his own opposition was the main obstacle to action, or that environmentalists -- who had loved his work on the Endangered Species Act and other wildlife protections -- dubbed him "Tailpipe Johnny" during the acid-rain debate.

Dingell is an older bull now; at 80, he sometimes walks with a cane, and his hearing aid doesn't seem to work as well as it once did. But he is still a formidable figure on the Hill, and he grumbles that it takes time to build consensus.

"I could bring up a bill like that," he said with a snap of his fingers. "It would take about a week, and I could get it on the floor a week or so after that, and I can give you the absolute certainty that it will not become law. I'm not sure you want that, do you?"

But Pelosi draws her power from the Inslees of the caucus, and they believe that the time for deliberation has passed. Inslee is careful to pay homage to Dingell, "one of the most brilliant people I've ever met in public policy, but he rejects the chairman's comparison of global warming to acid rain."

"The challenge we're facing is a hundredfold more critical," Inslee said. "We need to address this on an emergency basis." And he believes that Pelosi, with support from green manufacturers and green evangelicals as well as the usual green groups, will break the logjam on Capitol Hill -- with or without Dingell's help.

"She is willing to make a few omelets, which is to say, break a few eggs," Inslee said.A Question of Tactics

In the old Congress, with J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.) as speaker of the House, the "majority of the majority" ruled. Policies were hashed out inside the GOP caucus, which was dominated by conservatives; Hastert's team then pressured the entire caucus to back them. The result was a steady tack to the right -- and eventually, electoral disaster, especially for GOP moderates.

Pelosi has promised a more open and bipartisan process and has said she will not drag her caucus to the left. But global warming could be a telling test. Inslee's support for fast and aggressive legislation to reduce emissions is probably supported by a majority of House Democrats -- but not a majority of Congress.

On the other hand, when Dingell and Boucher talk about building consensus around a moderate bipartisan approach that respects the concerns of industry, the Earth-on-fire crowd suspects a do-nothing approach. The top Republican on Dingell's committee, Rep. Joe L. Barton (Tex.), has done more to block climate legislation than any other House member, with the possible exception of the top Republican on Boucher's subcommittee, Hastert.

"Industry is an important part of the equation," Boucher said.

But there are options beyond Inslee's strong-and-fast and Dingell's modest-and-slow.

Waxman's bill, for example, is extremely strong, mandating an 80 percent cut in emissions by 2050. Waxman is known as a dogged street fighter as well as a dealmaker; after feuding with Dingell for years over acid rain, they forged the compromise that led to the 1990 amendments. But while he believes that global warming may be irreversible if emissions do not start to decline within a decade, he does not see how Democrats can get strict emission limits past Bush. So he seems content to hold hearings that will expose GOP intransigence.

"Quite frankly, this is not a bill that's going to pass in six months, or even two years," he said.

While Waxman is willing to wait for radical change, other Democrats are pushing for lesser reductions with greater speed. For example, five-term Rep. Tom Udall (N.M.) has been lobbying for a "third way" between nothing and a hard-and-fast emissions limit, offering corporations a "safety valve" of modest fees if they cannot meet pollution targets.

Udall comes from a green pedigree -- his father served as interior secretary, and his uncle was a longtime conservationist congressman -- but some environmentalists dismiss his plan as a recipe for inaction. When Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee Chairman Jeff Bingaman (D-N.M.) proposed a similar plan in 2004, the Environmental Defense Fund ran ads criticizing him in his home state.

Still, Udall has enlisted a Republican co-sponsor, Wisconsin Rep. Tom Petri, in hopes of engineering a quick compromise. He says the perfect should not be the enemy of the good.

"I wrote this bill with the idea that Bush can sign it," he said. "Our idea is to start now."

But as long as Dingell wields his gavel, starting anything might be tough. Last October, Udall approached Dingell in the Democratic cloakroom and handed over some information about his bill. Dingell never got back to him. In an interview in his office, which is dominated by heads of animals he has shot and photos of presidents he has worked with, Dingell recalled his friendships with Udall's father and uncle, but brushed off questions about Udall's bill.

"If I thought it was a good idea, I would have already done it," he said.Gearing Up for Showdown

A recent Washington Post-ABC News poll found that only 27 percent of Americans approve of Bush's handling of global warming, so it's easy to see why Pelosi welcomes a confrontation. That is one reason she asked Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), a Bush-bashing environmentalist and a Pelosi loyalist, to lead her new committee. In April 2005, when Bush walked hand in hand with Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah after asking him to produce more oil, Pelosi asked Markey to deliver the party's response to Bush's radio address.

"She does believe, along with Iraq, that this is a big issue on which we have to take on the president," Markey said.

Industry lobbyists say they expect to endure a lot of unpleasant climate hearings during this Congress, but they are not too worried about draconian legislation. They do not think the House or the Senate can pass anything too stringent, much less override a Bush veto. And they say their focus groups show that the public's eagerness to do something about global warming droops after hearing warnings of serious economic consequences.

With trillions of dollars at stake, it is reasonable to expect industry-funded ads to raise those alarms, in the vein of the "Harry and Louise" spots that helped sink President Bill Clinton's health-care plans.

"If you're a Democrat in a moderate district, this is not the kind of vote you want to take," said Myron Ebell, director of global-warming policy for the Competitive Enterprise Institute, an industry-funded think tank. "I think Democrats are really going to disappoint the enviros over the next two years, because all they're going to do is talk."

In fact, it's not clear that environmentalists would be all that disappointed. They believe the public is moving in their direction, as climate-friendly actions by companies such as Wal-Mart and states such as California help build pressure for a national solution. Many of them think two years of hearings could set the stage for a Waxman-style bill that a Democratic president -- or a climate-conscious Republican such as Sen. John McCain (Ariz.) -- could sign in 2009.

"If we can get some real facts into the public domain, keep educating the American people, lay down some principles about what kind of bill is acceptable and help get the next Congress ready to act, that would be a success," said Ana Unruh Cohen, a global-warming expert at the liberal Center for American Progress. "You know, Bush is still the president."

And Dingell is still the guy with the gavel. He and Boucher are already planning hearings on global warming, and they have invited former vice president Al Gore to testify. ("Al's a good friend," Dingell said. "So was his father.") But Dingell warns that he is a "fairly fussy, careful legislator."

Pelosi is pushing for action by July 4. She wants to show Americans that Democrats care. And she wants to show Dingell that a new guard is running the show.

"We shouldn't get hung up on procedural matters," Emanuel said. The select committee, he said, is "continuing to remind people this is a different Congress, with different priorities."

Climate Panel Creates Lobbying Stir (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, January 23, 2007

Energy and Commerce Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) found an unlikely ally in his spat with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) over a new climate-change panel: former committee chairman Joe Barton (R-Texas).

While Barton and Dingell have butted heads on energy policy, the two were like-minded in their opposition to a select committee on climate change that would operate outside the bounds of their own committee.

Dingell compared the panel, which Pelosi is pushing as a way to draw attention to the issue of global warming, to “feathers on a fish.”

Keeping with the avian theme, Barton’s spokeswoman Lisa Miller called the effort “a publicity machine with wings.”

The spat threatened to draw energy lobbyists, who largely had sat on the sidelines this session, into an awkward intra-caucus fight between two people — Dingell and Pelosi — it doesn’t pay to upset.

Pelosi has put global warming and energy independence near the top of her priority list, after having successfully pushed through the Six in ’06 agenda. She has said she wants a climate-change bill on the floor by July.

A select committee on global warming “will give us the opportunity to gather state-of-the-art scientific research, focus public attention on these urgent issues, and support the work of the authorizing committees,” Pelosi said in a letter to colleagues.

After the select committee was announced, Barton quickly gathered about 15 Republican energy lobbyists in a meeting on Capitol Hill where he implored them to ask members they knew to vote against the creation of the committee.

“He said, ‘Let’s support Dingell on this,’” one lobbyist who attended the meeting said.

In an effort to ease opposition from Dingell and others, Pelosi wrote in her memo that the select committee would not have legislative authority and would be disbanded after two years. But the idea still makes members nervous, particularly those close to fossil fuel industries that would be among the hardest-hit under carbon dioxide caps. Dingell is a longtime supporter of the domestic auto industry, which could find it tough to comply with a tough global-warming bill.

“That’s what they always say,” one Democratic aide said of the limits the Speaker has put on the committee.

Lobbyists come into play because the creation of a select committee likely requires a floor vote.

Energy lobbyists largely sat out the debate on the tax subsidies, believing their efforts would be of more use in the Senate, where a closer voting margin improves the chances to alter some aspects of the package.

But the climate-change panel seemed to create a bigger stir on K Street. Democratic energy lobbyists began quietly to do their own whipping, fearing the select committee signaled a shift to the left on climate change.

The issue holds “enormous consequences” for their clients, one of the lobbyists said.

Increasingly, however, businesses are coming forward seeking clarity on the issue of climate change. General Electric, DuPont, Alcoa and Duke Energy announced the creation of a coalition to press the administration and Congress to address global warming through efforts like a mandatory cap on carbon dioxide.

Democratic lobbyists, meanwhile, concentrated on members from energy-producing states, so-called oil-patch members already a little peeved at the repeal of billions of dollars in tax breaks the industry now receives, and on the Congressional Black Caucus (CBC), one of the most powerful subgroups within the Democratic Caucus.

Lobbyists argued, according to a Democratic aide and a lobbyist, that traditional committee structure is more suited to the interests of the Blue Dogs and the CBC, which has several members in charge of congressional panels.

A select committee likely requires a floor vote. Lobbyists said Speaker Pelosi could still create a lesser panel -— a task force, for instance — that wouldn't require a vote.

Energy and Commerce Democrats met Friday, after which Dingell wrote a memo that summed up his position: "This entity would exist for a fixed period of time and can take the form of a Speaker's Committee within the Democratic Caucus or a Task Force of the House," the memo stated.

But a source close to the Speaker said a vote is likely to be held, although given the remaining confusion over what authority the panel would possess, the vote is likely to be delayed until after this week.

Some Dems Angry With Rep. Markey And New Energy Panel (HILL)

By Jonathan E. Kaplan

"Let's get in his grille," said Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-N.Y.), referring colloquially and aggressively to Rep. Edward Markey (D-Mass.).

Weiner was talking to fellow Democrats on the House Energy and Commerce Committee panel last Thursday; they were disgruntled about Speaker Nancy Pelosi's (D-Calif.) plan to take away some of their turf by creating a Select Committee on Energy Independence and Global Warming with Markey at its head.

"Guys from Boston are soft," Weiner added, according to sources at the private meeting last Thursday, and said they should constantly preempt Markey by holding Energy and Commerce panel hearings a day before any scheduled hearing by the new select panel. If Markey traveled to Stockholm, Energy and Commerce members would travel to Stockholm, he said. Lawmakers and aides present chuckled.

Some liberal Democrats are said to be frustrated with Rep. John Dingell (D-Mich.), the Energy and Commerce chairman, who is closely allied with the auto industry and opposes some measures, such as increasing gas mileage standards, to reduce greenhouse gases.

But a cross-section of members are frustrated with Markey.

Energy and Commerce committee members worry that creating a select panel would set a bad precedent. (The Homeland Security panel started as a temporary committee, but is now permanent.) They debated why a task force could not accomplish some of the same goals, said sources in the room.

"Members are angry with Markey because he already had a platform on these issues with three good committee assignments," said a senior Democratic aide. "Now it looks like he's trying to take away more from other members to add to his own portfolio."

Another senior Democratic aide who is an ally of Markey said, "The Speaker is turning to Markey because his past assignments ensure that he knows what he's talking about, and also because he has frequently helped the party by stepping aside when extra slots were needed on his other committees, and here again, this new select committee helps the Speaker by creating extra slots to help members get good assignments."

Since the Democrats recaptured the House, Markey has angled to move up the committee ladder. He is the third-ranking Democrat on the House Energy and Commerce Committee and serves on the Homeland Security and Natural Resources committees.

Markey suggested late last year that he wanted to head the House Resources Committee. Rep Nick Rahall (D-W.Va.), now chairman of the House Natural Resources Committee, had been the ranking Democrat, but Markey had more seniority.

Markey also expressed interest in reclaiming his seniority on the U.S. Helsinki Commission, which is part of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, but Pelosi named Rep. Alcee Hastings (D-Fla.) to the post, Democratic sources said.

Markey, 60, arrived in Congress in 1976 after winning a special election. He's become known for his expertise on telecommunications, energy and health issues. But he also is considered a media hound and his critics noted his penchant for foreign travel and being seen at A-list gatherings, such as last year's Academy Awards and the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland.

Markey spent the weekend in Boston and returned to Washington yesterday. No further decisions had been made, said a committee aide.

The only lawmaker on Pelosi's side was her longtime friend, Rep. Anna Eshoo (D-Calif.). She said the panel was a "great idea" and didn't understand what everyone was worried about, according to Democratic sources familiar with the discussion.

The drama did not end Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0120501

On Friday, Dingell met Democratic Reps. Markey, Henry Waxman (Calif.), Rick Boucher (Va.), Bart Gordon (Tenn.), Bobby Rush (Ill.) and Albert Wynn (Md.). He wrote in a memo that "we should work with Markey toward achieving the Speaker's objectives of creating a communications entity through a different structure."

That's not quite how Markey remembered it, David Moulton, Markey's chief of staff, wrote in an e-mail.

"Rep. Markey appreciated the dialogue that the members had this morning. It was constructive and helpful," he wrote, adding that Markey did not share the same recollection of the meeting as some participants. The consensus, as far as there was one, was that the select committee would not have legislative power and it would last two years.

"He did not agree, however, that what Pelosi had proposed needed to be restructured," Moulton wrote.

Pelosi wrote in a memo released Friday, "This [committee] will be a bipartisan entity with no legislative authority [and] will be created only for the current Congress, and will not be extended beyond that date."

If the proposed select committee were transformed into a task force, the committee chairmen would have more say in legislation. In 1982, former Ways and Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.) forced the House Democratic Caucus to adopt a rule that gives committees five legislative days to review, consider or report on any legislative measure taken by an ad hoc task force, according to a Congressional Research Service report.

'Energy Independence' (WSJ)

By Daniel Yergin

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

A cry is being heard across the nation, and loudly so in Washington. It is the call for "energy independence," and it will be at the center of the national energy debate over the next several months, providing the rationale for new policies and expansion of existing ones. Indeed, one might even anticipate a "declaration of energy independence" this July 4.

But what does "energy independence" mean for a $13 trillion economy that uses the equivalent of 50 million barrels of oil every day? Is it realistic and achievable? Or is it rhetorical overreach that will lead, as in the past, to disappointment and cynicism, the kind that drives the cycles of inconsistency in energy policy and leaves the U.S. no less vulnerable? The latter is more likely -- at least without a realistic appraisal of the U.S. position and the country's possibilities. But "energy independence" can provide a constructive framework for policy if it is properly thought through and the realities are recognized. * * *

With geopolitical turmoil, volatile prices and continuing reminders of the international political power of oil, the concept of energy independence is compelling and deeply appealing. In fact, it has been appealing for quite some time. The idea was introduced by Richard Nixon in November 1973, three weeks after the Arab oil embargo, when he introduced "Project Independence" and pledged that the U.S. would, within seven years, "meet our own energy needs without depending on any foreign energy source." It was a bold assertion but one that puzzled his own advisers. "I cut the reference to 'independence' three times from the drafts, but it kept being put back," recalled Richard Fairbanks, a drafter of the speech. "Finally, I called over, and was told that it came from the Old Man himself." Nixon knew that energy independence was something that Americans would crave after the 1973 oil shock: He deliberately modeled his Project Independence on John F. Kennedy's Apollo goal of getting a man on the moon within a decade.

Back then, the goal may have seemed only somewhat unlikely. After all, when Nixon began his political career after World War II, the country already had a long history of energy independence -- and then some. For it had actually been the world's No. 1 oil exporter; indeed, out of seven billion barrels of oil used by the Allies in World War II, six billion were produced in the U.S. By the late 1940s, the U.S. had become a net importer of oil, although the real surge in imports did not begin until the 1970s.

It proved much easier to get a man on the moon than to make a nation energy independent. In the three and a half decades since Nixon, the U.S. has gone from importing a third of its oil to importing 60%, and that share is set to continue rising. The country is on a similar path for natural gas (which is about 25% of our total energy usage). North American supply has flattened out. Yet large amounts of new natural-gas-fired electric power generation have been added over the last decade, which means that demand will increase. Natural gas is also used in the making of ethanol, adding to the demand growth. This means growing imports of liquefied natural gas -- LNG -- rising from 3% of our current demand to more than 25% by 2020.

All of which suggests that thought needs to be given both to what energy independence means and what can be achieved. For, right now, the U.S. is moving at some speed in the opposite direction, toward greater integration into the global energy markets.

How dependent is the U.S.? If we look at total energy -- including coal, nuclear and a small but growing share from renewables -- the country is over 70% self-sufficient. Oil -- refined into liquid fuels for transportation -- is where most of the current dependence comes from. The risks do not owe to direct imports from the Middle East, contrary to the widespread belief. Some 81% of oil imports do not come from that region. Thus, only 19% of imports -- and 12% of total petroleum consumption -- originates in the Middle East

Our largest source of oil imports is Canada. It's also the source of most of our current natural gas imports, via pipelines. One can hardly say that either Canada or energy imports from Canada constitute a major threat to national security. The energy trade is part of a normal trading relationship with the country with which we're conjoined economically and which just happens to be our biggest trading partner. Our second largest source is Mexico, with which we are also in a dense relationship. Mexico depends upon oil for about a third of total government revenues.

The picture becomes more complex when one turns to our third largest source of oil imports, Venezuela. The once much-discussed "hemispheric energy solidarity" loses much of its resonance when balanced against the "21stcentury socialism" of Venezuela's Hugo Chávez. After all, President Chávez is currently nationalizing the private sector, has on occasion threatened to embargo oil shipments to the U.S., and is putting much effort into fashioning an anti-U.S. alliance, the latest manifestation being the visit of Iranian President Ahmadinejad to Caracas. These are not the actions one normally associates with a good friend or a reliable trading partner.

Yet the source of imports is significant only up to a point. Energy security is a global issue. Although oil around the world varies greatly in terms of physical qualities and transportation costs, there is only one world oil market. So disruptions and loss of supply in one place radiate throughout the global market -- and global politics -- affecting consumers everywhere. Even if the U.S. did not import a drop of oil, it would still be vulnerable to turmoil involving oil outside its borders.

What are the prospects for "energy independence" in the way that Richard Nixon defined it 34 years ago -- that is, 1930s-style "autarky" and total self-sufficiency? Based on where we are today, very small, at least for a couple of decades. In terms of vehicles, as pointed out in our new study on "Gasoline and the American People," only about 8% of the auto fleet turns over every year. So the lead times are long for more efficient vehicles to enter the fleet. Ethanol, derived from corn, is on track to grow to about 10% of our total gasoline pool in a few years. This is certainly not inconsequential; it represents diversification and is equivalent to creating a new Indonesia-level oil-producing country in America's Midwest. But signs are already evident of an upper bound on corn-based ethanol, as the fuel-versus-food trade-off pushes up corn prices, setting off vocal protests from livestock growers and dairy farmers and, in due course, from those who buy breakfast cereals and soft drinks made with high fructose corn syrup.

What about technological advances that provide new answers? There is a "great bubbling" all along the innovation frontier of energy, ranging from conventional energy and efficiency to, especially, renewables, alternatives and "clean tech." Activity this wide-ranging has never been witnessed before. The impact could well be considerable, or even transformative. One would be very hard-pressed today, however, to say when and what form this impact will take.

In the end, if energy independence is presented as self-sufficiency, it will likely fall flat. And, as prices run through their cycles, disappointment will undermine the longer-term commitments that are required for a sound energy future. Today, quite simply, cutting ourselves off from global energy markets is not realistic.

But, if the goal of energy independence is understood differently, to mean energy security -- resilience, robustness, reduced vulnerability -- then it is much more useful.

This kind of definition recognizes that trade, in itself, is not bad. At the same time, it emphasizes the central goal of diversification -- encouraging investment and higher levels of research and development in both alternative and conventional energy sources. It means a new push for energy conservation, higher energy efficiency, lower energy intensity -- a theme that German Chancellor Angela Merkel will make the centerpiece of her agenda as chairman of the G-8 countries later this year. It certainly requires a consistent commitment to pushing the innovation frontier in ways that, eventually, lead to economically competitive alternatives and new technologies.

And it requires an understanding that this kind of energy independence -- as measured in energy security -- actually requires interdependence with other nations, both consumers and producers of energy. Indeed, how we manage our relations with other countries and other regions is a very essential ingredient for our own energy well-being.

Mr. Yergin, chairman of Cambridge Energy Research Associates, is writing a book on energy and geopolitics.

Getting Hydrogen Cars To Live Up To Their Hype (WP)

By Sholnn Freeman

Washington Post, January 23, 2007

The Ford Edge gliding along the George Washington Memorial Parkway doesn't have spinning rims or a booming sound system. The bling in this SUV is the technology. The vehicle runs almost silently. It needs no gas and releases no polluting exhaust.

The HySeries Edge, which is to be unveiled at the Washington Auto Show today, is a plug-in hybrid with an electric drive powered by a battery and a hydrogen fuel cell. Its arrival intensifies the competition to manufacture a mass-market electric hybrid that reduces reliance on gasoline and curbs the emission of greenhouse gases.

But the futuristic Edge vehicle is Ford's only one, and it cost $2 million to build. To get a car like this into the showroom for sale to the public will require the automotive and energy industries to leap high technological hurdles. The infrastructure to deliver alternative fuels such as hydrogen is in its infancy, and engineers are puzzling over how to mass-produce a lightweight, inexpensive and safe electric battery.

Because development costs are steep, the industry is hoping President Bush will announce his intention to increase research funding during his State of the Union speech tonight. Already the government pumps millions of dollars into the development of automotive technology. The carmakers frame their latest request as a battle cry against Japanese rivals, whose fuel-efficient models have cut sharply into the U.S. market. They have asked for as much as $500 million for battery research and development.

The Edge plug-in, a vehicle Ford calls the first drivable plug-in hybrid from a major auto company, is one result of a $44 million matching grant from the government, which has gone into a variety of projects. Its on-board fuel cell is used to recharge the battery while driving; it has a range of 225 miles with fuel cell recharging. The vehicle also can be plugged in for recharging.

Its appearance on the roads around the District tries to trump General Motors' entry in the race. This month, GM revealed an electric plug-in hybrid with a small gas engine. But while GM's vehicle, the Volt, looked sharp under glass on the floor of the Detroit auto show, there was no road-ready version.

"We are past this being a science experiment," said Mujeeb Ijaz, who directs Ford's hydrogen plug-in Edge project. "It's a tough road to commercialize. It takes support."

The Department of Energy is finalizing a comprehensive plug-in plan, according to industry and government officials who spoke on condition of anonymity because the plan has not been announced. The goal is to get plug-ins on the road within the next several years.

During the Clinton and Bush administrations, the federal government has spent hundreds of millions of dollars a year on advanced automotive technology. Joseph Romm, an Energy Department official in the late 1990s, estimates the total expense at $3 billion since the early 1990s.

President Clinton launched an initiative called the Partnership for a New Generation of Vehicles. The goal of the program was to deliver an advanced hybrid family sedan that could get 80 miles per gallon.

The Bush administration revised the program when it took power. In his 2003 State of the Union address, Bush said the goal of the government's auto policy would be to advance hydrogen technology in cars.

"As soon as George Bush got elected, the U.S. car companies walked away from the partnership and didn't continue developing hybrids," Romm said. "And the Japanese did. As a result, they ended up the leaders."

Producing electric batteries for automobiles presents several challenges. The preferred technology is found in lithium-ion batteries, which are smaller and lighter than others and have the capability to store two to three times as much power. But without the benefits of mass production, the batteries are still far too costly.

Battery engineers are also working on the safety problems of lithium-ion batteries. Under certain conditions, some of the materials in the batteries are unstable and can ignite or explode when packed together. Scientists have been working on reducing the risk, but technologies needed for those improvements make the batteries less powerful and less effective. Engineers are also testing to make sure the batteries can survive a 15-year lifetime without malfunctions.

Ford's Ijaz said the biggest hurdle is getting the costs down. Among the vehicle's other expenses, fuel cell technology is dependent on precious metals such as platinum.

"History shows that we are making the steps," he said. "Before, there were no fuel cell cars. Ford has 30. We've cut the weight of fuel cell power by half. The auto industry is pushing forward."

Judge Moves 'Divine Strake' Court Hearing Up To Jan. 31 (AP)

A federal judge has pushed forward by one day a scheduled hearing on a proposed non-nuclear explosion that authorities say would generate a mushroom-shaped dust cloud in the Nevada desert.

Judge Lloyd George cited a scheduling conflict in moving the date of the telephone conference call to January 31st. A Justice Department lawyer from Washington is due to provide an update of the federal Defense Threat Reduction Agency proposal. No date has been set for the blast.

It would involve detonating a 700-ton ammonium nitrate and fuel oil bomb at the Nevada Test Site -- about 85 miles northwest of Las Vegas.

Government officials call the test important for gathering data about penetrating hardened and deeply buried targets. Critics have called it a surrogate for a low-yield nuclear "bunker-buster" bomb.

They say it'll scatter dust contaminated nuclear weapons tests at the test site. The explosion has been postponed since Western Shoshone tribe members and "downwinders" in Utah and Nevada filed suit last year.

Judge Revisits Land-use Plan Suit (SLT)

By Joe Baird, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, January 23, 2007

Feds, environmental groups argue that claims of harm from Grand Staircase plan won't hold up

The federal government and environmental groups got a do-over Monday in their bid to dismiss a lawsuit filed by Kane and Garfield counties that seeks to overturn the Grand Stair- case-Escalante National Monument's land-use plan.

U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart originally heard arguments to dismiss the suit last fall, then recused himself. Judge Bruce Jenkins replaced Stewart, and opted to hear the arguments for a second time at the Moss Courthouse in downtown Salt Lake City.

But where Stewart seemed skeptical of the government's contention that the counties could show no harm from the monument plan - and thus had no standing to bring the suit - Jenkins appeared dubious that the counties could make their claims stick without laying out more specifics.

Jenkins also challenged the counties' argument that they have been permanently tied to the decisions made by the Bureau of Land Management in 1999 that regulated travel, water diversions and other land uses in the monument.

"What statute do you point to showing that this is a final agency action?" Jenkins asked Shawn Welch, the counties' attorney, during the nearly two-hour hearing.

The counties have claimed that there is a large network of county-owned roads that criss-cross the 1.8 million-acre monument that the BLM has refused to recognize.

"The BLM knows what is out there. They know there were historical uses. We'd like the court to look at the record," said Welch.

Welch also charged that the BLM's refusal to allow the diversion of monument water to Kane County usurps the authority of the state engineer and is illegal.

Justice Department attorney Tom Snodgrass once again argued that the counties have failed to prove any road ownership claims beyond four routes that were recognized in the land-use plan - and thus could show no harm.

"The plan leaves the door wide open for the counties to come [to court] and prove their claims," added attorney Ted Zukoski, representing the Southern Utah Wilderness Alliance.

Snodgrass reiterated that the counties' water claims also fall short, saying that the monument's water resources are backed by federal law.

Jenkins took the dismissal request under advisement, though also indicated a quick decision would be forthcoming.

Lack Of Budget Could Hurt Nuclear Energy Revival, Official Says (NYT)

By Matthew L. Wald

New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — The senior member of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission warned on Monday that the failure of Congress to pass a detailed budget for the current fiscal year could damage the nuclear renaissance that the government tried so hard to encourage with the energy bill of 2005.

No one has applied for permission to build a power reactor since the 1970s. But with the incentives offered by the federal government in 2005, utilities are considering building about 20 reactors, and several of them are expected to apply for authorization this year.

The commission member, Edward McGaffigan Jr., said that if the commission received applications this year, “we basically are going to have to put them on the shelf, because we’re not going to have the folks to work on the applications until well into calendar year 2008.”

Congress passed only 2 of the 11 spending bills for the fiscal year that began Oct. 1, 2006, those covering the Pentagon and the Homeland Security Department. The rest of the government has been operating under a “continuing resolution,” a stopgap measure that finances most agencies at the previous year’s levels. Democrats say they plan to extend that resolution through Sept. 30, the end of the fiscal year.

According to the nuclear commission, under a continuing resolution its budget would be lower by $95 million, or about 12 percent, compared with the level approved by the House and Senate Appropriations Committees but never by the full Congress.

Most of the commission's budget comes from fees paid by companies licensed to use radioactive material. The agency has been arguing on Capitol Hill that giving it the amount already approved by the Appropriations Committees would require only $13 million of general tax revenues.

Mr. McGaffigan said that if the commission could not process applications, some companies wanting to build would decide to wait. But he said that "some, seeing the instability, may disappear" and build coal plants instead.

Earlier this month, Mr. McGaffigan, saying he had metastatic melanoma, told the White House that he would serve only until a successor could be confirmed. He spoke Monday at a meeting with reporters organized by Platts, an energy information company.

Mr. McGaffigan also said that the Energy Department should begin looking for alternatives to Yucca Mountain, in Nevada, for disposing of nuclear waste. When he came to the commission in 1996, he said, the opening of the repository was said to be 14 years away; now it is probably 20 years away.

"There's just tremendous uncertainty," he said, "and each year that passes, we're not going to get any closer to Yucca under the current circumstances." He said the government should look for a site where there was local cooperation.

Keeping Up With Nigeria (NYT)

By Karin Lissakers

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

IN the last six months, media coverage, Congressional hearings, lawsuits by private citizens and a scathing report by the Interior Department's inspector general have exposed a litany of failures in the department's management of oil and gas leases on public lands and waters.

These failures have lost the government billions of dollars in royalties. They have become so glaring, in fact, that there is even speculation that the president, a good friend to the energy industry, might speak about them in his State of the Union address tonight.

If he does, he would only be about a term-and-a-half too late. Our government's record on resource revenue management — a bipartisan record, one should add — looks more like that of a corruption-ridden failing state than that of an advanced industrial country. Many of the same failures we criticize elsewhere — for example, the mismanagement of the Iraqi oil industry — are rampant here.

Like the Iraqi government, the United States government lacks the systems to determine exactly how much oil and gas is being produced on federal properties. Private lawsuits and state investigations have exposed systematic underpayment by companies on gas leases, yet the Interior Department relies on these companies to tell the government how much they owe, with no independent verification.

The department's inspector general, Earl E. Devaney, found that the government's bookkeeping is so poor that it does not actually know how much money it recovered, nor how many audits it conducted. The inspector general also found the department unable to verify quantities and prices for payments-in-kind (when the government takes a share of the oil and gas instead of cash), which are a growing portion of the royalties the government collects.

Interior's mismanagement is compounded by the secrecy that surrounds the entire enterprise. Though these are payments to the government for oil and gas extracted from public lands, companies are not required to disclose either payments or production levels to the public. The department says such data must be protected, because it could reveal pricing strategies and cost structures.

Such secrecy is contrary to the public's right to know what is being done on public lands. It is also contrary to an emerging international standard of transparency and accountability regarding oil, gas and mining revenues — standards that the United States is pressing developing countries to adopt.

What's more, energy companies have shown a willingness to comply with these standards. BP almost got kicked out of Angola for trying to disclose its payments there without Angola's permission. Newmont and other mining companies have started posting on their Web sites information about taxes and fees they pay to individual governments. Statoil, a large international operator, is required by Norwegian law to report, country by country, all taxes paid at home and to foreign governments.

ExxonMobil, ChevronTexaco, Shell, Total, Anglo American and many other international oil and mining companies are part of the international Extractive Industries Transparency Initiative — under which they report all royalties, taxes, fees, bonuses and payments-in-kind.

In some countries that take part in the initiative, company payments are lumped together before publication. Nigeria, however, requires individual disclosure. Surely the United States should not have a lower standard of disclosure than Nigeria.

Congress, with the president's encouragement, should insist that the United States practice at home the transparency it preaches abroad. It should enact a requirement that all companies extracting oil, gas and other minerals from federal lands publicly report all of their production on those lands and all royalties and other payments made to the federal government from that production.

Only then can the American public have confidence that the taxes owed by those who have benefited from the use of our public lands are being properly accounted for and fully collected.

Troubled Waters (WP)

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

THE PROMISE of massive redevelopment in the District -- new neighborhoods, office buildings, parks, retail complexes, and baseball and soccer stadiums, with the Anacostia River as an urban centerpiece -- could wind up mired in muck. As reported in distressing detail by staff writer David A. Fahrenthold, the river is disgracefully dirty, brimming with trash, toxic chemicals, dead animals, diseased fish and raw sewage. At least the Potomac River and the Chesapeake Bay have constituencies pressing for improvements in those waters; but without a groundswell to revive the Anacostia, potential developers may hold their noses and turn away.

With a ballpark already blooming near the Frederick Douglass Memorial Bridge, city officials and the owners of the Washington Nationals have a large stake in the redevelopment of this area. So, too, will the new owners of D.C. United, who have started a public push for a $150 million soccer stadium in Southeast. If a partnership with the District government does materialize, Mayor Adrian M. Fenty and the D.C. Council should insist that the team's owners ante up for a serious Anacostia River cleanup. Similar commitments should be extracted from other developers. After all, it is in their interest.

One revolting source of pollution is the District's sewer system, designed more than 100 years ago to dump raw sewage into the river during rainstorms. The D.C. Water and Sewer Authority has a plan to dig huge tunnels under the city to store this flow and then treat it to remove the sewage. But the agency's chief of staff, Johnnie Hemphill, told The Post that the project could take close to 20 years and $2 billion. This month, the U.S. Supreme Court let stand a lower court's ruling that set stricter caps on the amounts of pollutants dumped into the Anacostia. Jerry N. Johnson, the water and sewer authority's general manager, said the new rules may slow the project while officials figure out how to adapt. But the cleanup must go faster, not slower.

Maryland, home to more than 85 percent of the Anacostia's watershed, must help, too. Chesapeake Bay Foundation President William C. Baker says runoff from Montgomery and Prince George's counties is a significant river pollutant. The foundation is pressing for stricter requirements in federal Clean Water Act permits. No single pollution solution exists, but until federal, state and local officials develop a sense of emergency, the Anacostia River will continue to dampen the chances of economic vitality in the core of this region.

Judge Overseeing Arellano Felix Case Disagrees On Trial Timing (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 23, 2007

SAN DIEGO – The federal judge overseeing the possible death-penalty trial of accused drug cartel kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Felix sharply disagreed with lawyers for both the defense and the prosecution over when a jury would hear the case.

Prosecutors and defense lawyers told U.S. District Judge Larry Alan Burns Monday that they could be ready to take the case to trial in June 2008.

Burns disagreed and refused to put the case off that far.

He has been pushing the lawyers to get the case before a jury quickly, at first saying that it should go this spring, but now insisting it can get started this year.

The lawyers say that's impossible, given the voluminous evidence gathered against Arellano and the fact that before the case can go forward, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has to decide whether prosecutors will seek the death penalty.

Arellano is accused of racketeering and conspiracy, and could face the death penalty if convicted of operating a continuing criminal conspiracy that has led to several murders.

Also accused in the case is Manuel Arturo Villarreal Heredia, who prosecutors say was a top Arellano Felix henchman who ordered the beheadings of Rosarito Beach police officers last year.

Burns said he had hoped to appoint a publicly paid lawyer for Villarreal by now, but has not yet found one willing and able to take the case.

Mexican Drug Lords Appear In U.S. Court (AP)

HOUSTON (AP) -- With federal agents armed with automatic weapons standing guard on the courthouse roof, four drug lords who had been serving time in Mexican prisons were brought shackled into an American courtroom Monday to face drug and intimidation charges.

Among them was Osiel Cardenas-Guillen, believed to be one of the kingpins most responsible for violence along the Texas-Mexico border in recent years, said Karen Tandy, chief of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

"This is the first time in the history of Mexico that they have extradited to the United States what amounts to a clean sweep geographically of the cartel leadership," Tandy told reporters by teleconference from Washington.

The Mexican government was willing to extradite Cardenas-Guillen and the other suspected drug lords because they had been able to continue their drug operations from within prison in Mexico, not because of U.S. pressure, officials said. They were flown into Houston late Friday and early Saturday.

They faced a federal magistrate under extraordinary security measures, including agents with automatic weapons perched on the roof and around the outside of the downtown federal building.

Besides Cardenas-Guillen, the group includes Hector Palma Salazar, the suspected former leader of the Sinaloa cartel, and brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, former chiefs in the Arellano-Felix cartel in Tijuana.

Cardenas-Guillen, a former federal police officer in Mexico, faces 17 counts of drug importing and distribution, as well as three charges of threatening a federal agent and one count of money laundering. He faces a maximum sentence of life in prison if convicted.

Prosecutors said that the charges against Cardenas-Guillen originate in South Texas, but that he will be held in Houston, 350 miles from the border, out of concern for witness safety and border protection.

Cardenas-Guillen's lawyer, Robert Yzaguirre, said he hadn't had any time yet with his client.

The Guerreros, who face drug and money laundering charges, and Palma, who faces a charge of conspiracy to distribute cocaine, did not have attorneys with them.

Along with the suspected drug kingpins, Mexico also extradited 11 people wanted in the United States on charges including murder, drug trafficking, kidnapping and sex crimes. They also appeared in court Monday.

In all, 12 made their initial appearances in federal court, while three appeared in state district court in Houston. Most were set to have bond and arraignment hearings later this week. Cardenas-Guillen's was set for Feb. 1.

Once these hearings are done, the individuals are to be transferred to states where charges against them were originally filed, including California, New York and Colorado. Cardenas-Guillen is to remain in Texas, as will two other people. The Guerreros and Palma are to be transferred to California.

Mexico has recently shown more willingness to extradite drug lords, even those facing life in prison. A record 63 were sent to the U.S. in 2006 alone. However, it refuses to extradite anyone who would face the death penalty, which is illegal in Mexico.

Mexican President Felipe Calderon pledged Monday to wage a permanent war on organized crime.

"This is a permanent fight in which, unfortunately, many have lost their lives," he said. "We are fighting without pause so that these sacrifices will not have been in vain."

Mexico's President Pledges War Against Organized Crime, Promises Better Police (AP)

By Mark Stevenson

AP, January 23, 2007

MEXICO CITY -- President Felipe Calderon pledged Monday to wage a permanent war against organized crime by coordinating more closely with local police and giving all law enforcement better training, equipment and intelligence work.

Calderon has largely relied on federal police and soldiers for a series of massive anti-crime sweeps in several Mexican states, but he has said future efforts will need to rely more on local police.

"In order to win the war on crime, it is indispensable that we work in a united manner," Calderon told a national gathering of state governors and top public safety officials.

His comments came three days after his administration extradited four alleged drug lords and 11 other suspects to the United States. He said he wouldn't give up the battle.

"This is a permanent fight in which, unfortunately, many have lost their lives," said Calderon. "We are fighting without pause so that these sacrifices will not have been in vain."

Karen Tandy, chief of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, described the extraditions as "an enormous leap forward."

"Most were major drug traffickers. Many were long-term targets of the United States. All now face their worst fear: U.S. justice," Tandy said in a media conference call Monday. "On behalf of the DEA, I have one last thing to say to these 15 criminals: Welcome to the first day of the rest of your lives."

Tough-to-control prisons, untrained or corrupt local police, and citizens' distrust of police are all major obstacles that Calderon faces in his crackdown on drug violence that includes executions, gunbattles and beheadings.

He said on Monday that he hopes to use the federal operations to strengthen local police, although in some cities, like Tijuana, one of federal agents' first jobs has been to investigate local forces for alleged corruption or violence.

"We will extend and fortify joint operations against organized crime, with the aim of having these operations result, in the end, in leaving behind strengthened local police forces," Calderon said.

He proposed better training, equipment, vetting and intelligence work, including a unified national criminal information data center.

"The idea is for all police forces in Mexico -- local, state and, of course, federal -- to comply with standards that will ensure that the public can trust our police," he said.

Four Extradited Mexicans To Appear In Texas Court On Drug Charges (AP)

By JUAN A. LOZANO

AP, January 22, 2007

HOUSTON

More than a dozen leaders and workers in Mexico's most brutal and powerful drug cartels were brought before a federal magistrate in Houston Monday before being shipped to several states to face charges.

They face various drug-related charges in different states, including New York, Colorado and California, officials said.

Among the 15 individuals extradited were four alleged senior cartel leaders, including Osiel Cardenas-Guillen, believed to be one of the kingpins most responsible for violence along the Texas-Mexico border in recent years, said Karen Tandy, chief of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration.

Besides Cardenas-Guillen, allegedly the leader of the powerful Gulf cartel, the group includes Palmas Salazar, the alleged former leader of the Sinaloa cartel, and brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, former chiefs in the Arellano-Felix cartel in Tijuana, Mexico.

The Mexican government was willing to extradite the alleged drug cartel leaders because they had been able to continue their drug operations from within Mexican prisons.

They faced a federal magistrate under extraordinary security measures, including agents with automatic weapons perched on the roof and around the outside of the downtown federal building.

"This is the first time in the history of Mexico that they have extradited to the United States what amounts to a clean sweep geographically of the cartel leadership," Tandy told reporters. "These people are drawn from the (Tijuana, Juarez, Gulf and Federation) cartels. The level of these leaders is extraordinary."

Cardenas-Guillen, who was shackled and wearing a blue prison jumpsuit, faces 17 counts of drug importing and distribution as well as three charges of threatening a federal agent and one count of money laundering. He faces a maximum sentence of up to life in prison. He answered the magistrate's questions through a translator.

Prosecutors said the charges against Cardenas-Guillen originate in South Texas, but he will be held in Houston, 350 miles north of the Mexican border.

Cardenas-Guillen's lawyer, Robert Yzaguirre, said he hadn't had any time yet with his client.

Mexican President Felipe Calderon pledged Monday to wage a permanent war on organized crime.

"This is a permanent fight in which, unfortunately, many have lost their lives," said Calderon. "We are fighting without pause so that these sacrifices will not have been in vain."

Eduardo Medina Mora, Mexico's attorney general, said Sunday the four defendants were extradited to stop them from communicating with their cartels from behind bars and to reduce the risk of violence and escape, not because of U.S. pressure.

"This decision was a unilateral and sovereign one by the Mexican government," Medina Mora said in Mexico City. The aim was to break any "physical and geographical" contact they might have had with their gangs while in Mexican prisons. He also said Mexico plans to extradite other criminals and suspects who have exhausted their legal appeals.

Mexico has recently shown more willingness to extradite drug lords, even those facing life in prison. A record 63 alleged criminals were sent to the U.S. in 2006 alone. However, it refuses to extradite anyone who would face the death penalty, which is illegal in Mexico

Along with the four drug lords, Mexico also extradited 11 alleged criminals wanted in the United States on charges including murder, drug trafficking, kidnapping and sex crimes.

Alleged Cartel Members Extradited To Texas (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand, Usa Today

A suspected Mexican drug lord whose cartel allegedly smuggled more than 4 tons of cocaine a month over the U.S. border will stand trial in Texas.

Osiel Cardenas-Guillen, the alleged kingpin of the Gulf Cartel, and three other alleged drug lords appeared in a Houston court Monday. Mexican authorities delivered Cardenas-Guillen and 14 other alleged Mexican drug dealers and criminals to Houston late Friday and early Saturday, the Drug Enforcement Administration said.

"These extraditions are unprecedented in the history of Mexico," DEA Administrator Karen Tandy said Monday. "Did we get all of Mexico's major drug dealers? Not yet. But this past weekend, the U.S. and Mexico took an enormous leap forward."

Cardenas-Guillen, whose trademark was a gold-plated .45-caliber pistol, was charged in Texas in December 2000 with drug trafficking and threatening to kill federal agents, Tandy said. Cardenas-Guillen and his cohorts allegedly attempted to kidnap and kill a DEA agent and an FBI agent during a confrontation in November 1999, the indictment said.

"He killed his way up the ladder to lead the Gulf Cartel," Tandy said.

The Mexican army captured Cardenas-Guillen in 2003. He continued to run his cartel from a Mexican maximum-security prison, Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said.

McNulty said the largest-ever Mexican extradition of drug traffickers demonstrates newly elected Mexican President Felipe Calderón's commitment to confronting the country's drug gangs.

"We can't say enough about the overall effort going on with the Calderón administration," McNulty said. "They are demonstrating courage by taking on these organizations as they have."

Other defendants extradited this weekend included brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, alleged leaders of a cartel operating in Tijuana; and Gilberto Salinas Doria, who is charged with trafficking more than 200 tons of cocaine.

"Prosecutors have been working for years to make these cases," McNulty said.

Calderón Outlines Drug Fighting Plan (DMN)

By Alfredo Corchado, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, January 23, 2007

U.S. hails Mexican leader's extradition of accused cartel leaders

MEXICO CITY – President Felipe Calderón called on the political opposition Monday to share "co-responsibility" for fighting the drug war, and senior U.S. officials praised Mr. Calderón's "stunning" leadership in extraditing alleged Mexican drug lords to the U.S.

At a meeting of his security Cabinet, Mr. Calderón outlined an eight-point plan that calls for the creation of a national criminal database and higher standards for law enforcement officials. Mr. Calderón also called on leaders of the three major parties and Mexicans in general to leave aside their differences and focus on reinforcing their country's security.

"More than ever, Mexico demands co-responsibility," he said. "Mexicans expect much from us. We will not give up or give in ... because the progress of the nation is at stake."

On Friday Mexico extradited 15 criminal suspects, including four alleged drug kingpins from the nation's three top cartels, to the United States. In doing so, Mr. Calderón struck a blow against warring cartels, which killed about 2,500 people last year and turned large areas into lawless badlands.

The alleged drug traffickers were brought Monday before a federal magistrate in Houston before being shipped to several states to face charges, including New York, Colorado and California as well as Texas, officials said.

Since taking office in December, Mr. Calderón has sent troops and elite police units to tackle drug gangs and halt a surge in violence as rival cartels fight over smuggling routes and drug fields.

In Washington on Monday, senior U.S. officials praised Mr. Calderón. John Walters, director of the Office of National Drug Control Policy, said the Bush administration is prepared to "look at added resources" to help strengthen Mexican security.

Mr. Walters, speaking to reporters by telephone, was joined by Deputy Attorney General Paul J. McNulty of the Department of Justice and Karen P. Tandy, administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

"This past weekend, the U.S. and Mexico took an enormous leap forward, particularly with the extradition of Mexican drug kingpin Osiel Cárdenas-Guillén," Ms. Tandy said, adding that Mr. Cárdenas' organization, the Gulf cartel, and its arm enforcement, the Zetas, were responsible for much of the violence along parts of the Texas-Mexico border.

"For the past eight years, he commanded one of the most brutal and powerful drug cartels in the world," Ms. Tandy said. "For the last four of those years, he did so from a Mexican prison. Today we put an end to his reign of terror."

Mexican Drug Lord Jailed In Houston (KHOU)

KHOU-TV, January 22, 2007

It is an unprecedented move Osiel Cardenas and 13 other drug suspects were extradited to the United States.

The alleged drug kingpin is accused of running one of the biggest drug cartels on the Texas/Mexico border.

The high profile extraditions included the alleged leader of the gulf cartel—which operates along the Texas-Mexico border and is blamed for escalating violence.

Federal agents in Mexico who transported reputed kingping Osiel Cardenas Guillen shot video that appeared on a website of the Mexican Newspaper el universal.

It shows Osiel Cardenas on a flight to Houston where he was handed over to DEA agents.

He faces charges in Texas including conspiracy to murder federal agents.

The U.S. Government praised the extraditions.

Mexico's attorney general says it is part of a crackdown on drug traffickers who continue to run their illegal business behind bars in Mexico.

Mexican President Sends Alleged Cartel King To Houston (KHOU)

KHOU-TV, January 23, 2007

It didn't look like downtown Houston, automatic weapons at the ready. It looked more like an image from a war zone, but unprecedented actions call for unprecedented measures.

Monday, Houston's federal courthouse was the epicenter of the war on drugs.

The head of the Gulf Cartel, Osiel Cardenas, said to be responsible for much of the violence along the Texas-Mexico border, was extradited to Houston from Mexico, along with 14 other major drug traffickers.

"They have extradited to the United States what amounts to a clean sweep geographically of the cartel leadership," said Karen Tandy, DEA Administrator.

"They" refers to the administration of Mexican President Felipe Calderon.

"The Calderon administration has taken a position in favor of law abiding citizens everywhere. By choosing to stand up to these organized criminals," said U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzalez.

"This is the first time that the Supreme Court of Mexico has extradited cartel leaders and leadership, " said Tandy.

Federal agents shot video footage of Cardenas being brought into Ellington Field. He is considered to be one of the most dangerous drug kingpins in recent history that, according to DEA agents, transported up to six tons of cocaine per month to the U.S.

Most recently, it was suspected that he continued running his drug empire from inside his prison cell in Mexico.

"He killed his way up the ladder to lead the cartel, but now the drug lord is facing 17 federal charges, including the transportation of drugs, money laundering, and threatening to kill U.S. FBI agents. Now he's looking forward to the first day of the rest of his life," said Tandy.

In addition to Cardenas-Guillen, the group includes Palmas Salazar, the alleged former leader of the Sinaloa cartel, and brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, chiefs in the cartel in Tijuana.

After the initial court hearings the accused will be sent to various U.S. jurisdictions to face charges, some more than 10 years old.

John Walters is the U.S. drug czar and he calls these extraditions the beginning of the end for the Mexican cartels.

"Taken an enormously powerful and unprecedented step to take these structures down," he said.

Alleged Mexican Kingpins In Court (HC)

Judge appoints lawyers for 12 of 15 defendants

He's known as the "Friend-Killer" and the "Crazy Man," testimony to his allegedly swift and ruthless rise to the pinnacle of Mexico's drug mafias.

Osiel Cardenas Guillen, the purported head of the powerful Gulf Cartel, is now facing trial in Houston on charges ranging from narcotics trafficking to threatening to kill U.S. federal agents.

U.S. officials say Cardenas is the biggest catch of the 15 Mexicans extradited to Texas on Friday and Saturday, in what they called unprecedented cooperation between the two countries. Other high-profile suspects include Hector "Blondy" Palma Salazar, an alleged former leader of the Sinaloa cartel, and brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, alleged lieutenants of the Tijuana cartel.

"Did we get all of Mexico's major drug traffickers?" Karen Tandy, head of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said Monday. "No, not yet. But this weekend the U.S. and Mexico have taken a tremendous leap forward, and particularly with Osiel Cardenas Guillen."

In Houston, 12 of the accused made their first appearances before a federal judge — most after having their indictments translated to them in Spanish. The dozen suspects are wanted on federal charges in Texas, California, New York, Colorado and Washington. They are accused of affiliation with the Tijuana, Juarez, Gulf and Federation cartels. The three others are being held on state charges in New York, Washington and in Ector County, Texas, where a child kidnapping and sex assault case is pending.

Calderon's vowThe people who are accused of running financially influential organizations asked for court-appointed lawyers. They said they worked menial jobs or not at all.

Houston was chosen as the first U.S. destination because federal officials "had to pick a location that would be as central and conducive to security and the resources that we needed to have available," Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty said.

The extraditions came less than two months after Mexican President Felipe Calderon took office and vowed to clamp down on drug trafficking.

Top U.S. anti-drug officials on Monday praised Calderon and trumpeted the scope of the case.

"We cannot over-emphasize the significance of these actions," said McNulty.

"Mexico is extraditing to the U.S. for the first time defendants who have held serious high-level positions in the country's most significant drug cartels, and other serious violent criminals were included."

He added that none of the suspects will face the death penalty, a punishment that does not exist in Mexico.

"We have to make the assurances necessary for a successful extradition," McNulty said.

John Walters, director of the White House anti-drug office, agreed, calling it "a watershed event."

Tandy said Cardenas directed the trafficking of 4 to 6 tons of cocaine across the South Texas border each month — first from his base in the border city of Matamoros, and after his arrest in 2003 from a federal prison outside Mexico City.

Cardenas, 39, is also charged with leading an ambush of U.S. federal agents in Matamoros, across the border from Brownsville, in November 1999. Brandishing his trademark gold-plated .45-caliber pistol, Cardenas and a dozen of his henchmen surrounded a car carrying two agents from the DEA and the FBI and threatened to kill them if they didn't turn over an informant, Tandy said.

A former policeman, Cardenas in the early 1990s joined the Gulf Cartel under the leadership of Juan Garcia Abrego.

In 1992, Cardenas was arrested in South Texas and charged with smuggling 5 1/2 pounds of cocaine into the United States, according to U.S. federal court documents. The charges were later dropped and he was released a year later, according to news reports.

After Garcia Abrego was arrested and extradited to Houston in 1996, Cardenas quickly established control by killing off many of his rivals, officials from both countries say.

But his crowning move was luring dozens of members of an elite army squad to join his criminal ranks in 1998, they say. The Zetas, as the elite gang of hitmen is known, have been crucial to establishing the Gulf Cartel as one of the country's most powerful criminal organizations, officials say.

In March 2003, Mexican authorities triumphantly announced Cardenas' arrest in Matamoros. But rather than isolate him, they placed him in a cell alongside the accused Tijuana cartel boss, Benjamin Arellano Felix. The two joined forces, continuing to run their businesses by using banned cell phones, officials say.

Last year, as the Gulf Cartel waged a turf war against its main rival — an alliance of several cartels known as the Federation — more than 2,000 people were killed in Mexico.

Prison operationsOperating from inside Mexico's notoriously corrupt prison system helped Cardenas cement his reputation as a kind of Robin Hood of the border, despite being behind bars.

In April 2004, he reportedly bankrolled a Children's Day party for thousands of flood victims in the border city of Piedras Negras, across from Eagle Pass, Texas.

Collaborators with bullhorns drove through nearby towns announcing that the gifts — including Nintendo sets and bicycles — were thanks to "Osiel Cardenas, friend of the poor," according to local news reports.

A month later, Cardenas hosted a giant Mother's Day celebration for working-class women in two border towns, where prizes included refrigerators and dining-room sets, local media reported.

However, Tandy said, Cardenas' glory days are now over.

"He killed his way up the ladder to lead the Gulf Cartel," she said, "and now he's looking forward to the rest of his life" in a U.S. prison.

More Extraditions To Come, Mexico Says (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez And Carlos Martinez, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 22, 2007

Attorney general says transfer to U.S. of drug suspects severs criminal ties and restores the integrity of prisons.

MEXICO CITY — On the heels of the extradition of four top drug cartel leaders, Mexico's attorney general said Sunday he planned to send more suspects to face U.S. trials, tacitly acknowledging that corruption had allowed drug kingpins to direct operations even while in maximum-security Mexican prisons.

The latest round of extraditions Friday night — which also includes six other drug suspects of lesser rank — breaks ties between drug capos and "the structures of the criminal organizations in our country," Atty. Gen. Eduardo Medina Mora said. He added that the transfer of wealthy suspected traffickers to the United States would help return security and integrity to the prisons where they were held.

Aggressive extradition is emerging as the second prong of Mexican President Felipe Calderon's get-tough approach to the drug gang violence that killed more than 2,000 people nationwide last year. In January, 17 Mexican suspects have been handed over to U.S. authorities, a pace that would easily surpass last year's record 63 extraditions.

Calderon's first line of attack started shortly after he took office in December, when he began ordering the army, navy and federal police into several states, including his home state of Michoacan and the key smuggling cities of Tijuana and Acapulco.

Medina Mora said Sunday the army had also been working in Mexico's so-called Golden Triangle, where the states of Sinaloa, Chihuahua and Durango intersect in the western Sierra Madre. The mountainous region is a longtime center of marijuana and heroin production, and Sinaloa is home to Mexico's most notorious drug lords.

Federal forces in recent weeks have burned 2,500 acres of marijuana fields and nearly 2,000 acres of opium poppy fields, security officials said Sunday. They've confiscated 2.6 tons of cocaine and 20 tons of harvested marijuana.

Authorities say they have arrested 98 people, mostly low-level growers, workers and a few alleged assassins.

Disrupting business

Among those turned over to U.S. authorities late Friday was Osiel Cardenas, a former police officer and the reputed head of the so-called Gulf cartel. His group has been battling a Sinaloa-based Pacific Coast organization for control of lucrative smuggling routes along the U.S.-Mexico border. He has allegedly been running his operation from a maximum-security prison outside of Mexico City since his 2003 arrest.

Two of the other top drug leaders extradited were Cardenas allies from Tijuana, brothers Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero; and one, Hector "Guero" Palma, a competitor from the Sinaloa group.

"There are dozens of extraditions pending, but there are ongoing legal procedures that federal courts haven't yet resolved," Medina Mora said. Cardenas and the other drug leaders had exhausted appeals in their legal fight against extradition, he said.

Calderon's short-term goal, officials say, is to warn competing leaders that he will disrupt business unless they end the daily kidnappings, beheadings and torture in the war between Mexico's east and west coast factions.

"Mexicans can be sure that we will continue working to reclaim public spaces and to close down territory on criminals," Mexican Interior Secretary Francisco Ramirez Acuna said Sunday.

Nearly all the cocaine and marijuana consumed in the U.S., an annual market estimated at more than $50 billion, comes via Mexican smugglers, wholesalers and dealers. Based on 2005-06 border seizures, about 60% of the cocaine arrives in Texas, and California and Arizona each account for about 20%.

Although experts believe some of the profits are invested in Mexican real estate and business, the Calderon administration worries that the drug war will scare off legitimate investors and hobble his promise to create millions of new jobs.

UPDATE: Drug Ring Busted After Two-year Investigation (TUSN)

By Stephanie Taylor, Staff Writer

Tuscaloosa News (Alabama), January 23, 2007

More than 20 people have been accused of taking part in a sophisticated operation that brought illegal drugs from the West Coast to West Alabama.

A two-year investigation by dozens of federal agents and local law enforcement officers resulted in federal drug trafficking charges against 21 people from Tuscaloosa and Greene counties.

A 37-count indictment unsealed Monday charges them with distribution of powder and crack cocaine. Twelve of them were arrested over the weekend.

The men allegedly used several drivers who used 18-wheeler freight trucks to haul drugs from California to a location in Greene County where it was then distributed to lower-level dealers, said Jill Ellis, spokeswoman for the U.S. Attorney's office in Birmingham.

David Smith, 58, of Boligee was described as the organizer of the operation.

The first count of the indictment charges Smith with operating a continuing criminal enterprise. Other charges included using a telephone or computer to facilitate drug trafficking, conspiracy to posses with the intent to distribute and distribution of cocaine and crack.

"Smith's drug trafficking organization was a major distributor of powder and crack cocaine to high- and mid-level dealers throughout West Alabama," U.S. Attorney Alice Martin said in a written release.

The men arrested over the weekend were described as "lieutenants" within the organization, or distributors who use "runners" to get the drugs to street-level buyers.

"This weekend's arrests are the result of an outstanding DEA led counter-drug investigation which targeted the organizational structure and its leadership," Martin said.

The indictment filed seeks criminal forfeiture of at least $9.7 million in cash and seven parcels of property in Greene and Tuscaloosa counties. Also seized in the weekend arrests were 7.5 grams of cocaine, 32 firearms, $60,000 in cash, a Harley Davidson motorcycle, a Cadillac SUV, a Chevrolet SUV and a Mercedes G55 SUV.

Martin and Gregory Borland, Assistant Special Agent in Charge of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Agency's Alabama office, spoke about the indictments at a press conference in Birmingham Monday.

"This was a very complex and long-term investigation into the drug trafficking activities of an organization that has operated with impunity for many years," Borland said in a release. "The close-knit relationship of those involved in the conspiracy, as well as the rural area in which they operated, rendered the investigations security of paramount importance."

A task force was organized to gain access to the drug ring, which included special agents with the Drug Enforcement Administration; the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives; the Internal Revenue Service; and the U.S. Marshals Service. Officers from the Alabama Bureau of Investigation, the Tuscaloosa and Jefferson County Sheriff's offices, the Calhoun County Drug Task Force, Birmingham, Alabaster, Fairfield and Montevallo Police departments assisted in the investigation.

"The ability of such a large number of officers from various agencies to work together without compromising the investigation speaks volumes about the professionalism of Alabama Law Enforcement," Martin said in the release.

The men alleged to have been involved in the drug ring have been arrested and were in the process Monday of making initial court appearances, including bond and detention hearings. The names of the remaining five people indicted were withheld pending the service of warrants. The U.S. Attorneys Office will prosecute the men.

Drug Ring Probe Names 21, Catches 12 (BN)

By Val Walton, News Staff Writer

The Birmingham News (AL), January 23, 2007

A federal indictment unsealed Monday charges 21 people with involvement with a major drug distribution ring operating out of west Alabama.

The charges result from a two-year undercover Organized Crime Drug Enforcement Task Force investigation to dismantle the drug ring, which is believed to have been supplied with powder cocaine and crack cocaine delivered by several drivers using tractor-trailer rigs running from California to a central location in Greene County for distribution.

Dozens of federal, state and local law enforcement officers on Saturday rounded up the first dozen of those indicted, including David Smith, 58, of Boligee, whom U.S. Attorney Alice Martin described as the organizer of the ring.

The defendants were taken before federal court magistrate judges on Monday for court appearances such as bond and detention hearings.

Nine people are still being sought on warrants.

Authorities so far have seized 7½ kilograms of cocaine, 32 guns, $60,000, a Harley Davidson motorcycle and three luxury vehicles, including a Mercedes SUV, Martin said.

The indictment, which had been under seal since December, also seeks criminal forfeiture of seven parcels of land in Greene and Tuscaloosa counties.

Smith is charged with operating a continuing criminal enterprise, using a telephone to facilitate a drug-trafficking crime; conspiracy to possess with the intent to distribute, and distribution of cocaine and crack.

The government is seeking criminal forfeiture of at least $9.7 million by Smith.

The other defendants face charges of drug conspiracy and possession with the intent to distribute cocaine or crack, Martin said at a Monday news conference.

Separately, Freddie Hill, 64, of Livingston was charged by prosecutors in a criminal complaint Monday and arrested on drug conspiracy charges related to the drug ring, Martin said.

Gregory Borland, assistant special agent in charge of Alabama's Drug Enforcement Administration, called the investigation one of the most significant he has been involved in in Alabama.

"This was a very complex and long-term investigation into drug trafficking activities of an organization that has operated with impunity for many years," Borland said.

Tyson Pleads Not Guilty To Drug Charges (AP)

By The Associated Press

PHOENIX (AP) -- Former heavyweight champion Mike Tyson pleaded not guilty Monday to charges of drug possession and driving under the influence of drugs.

Tyson spoke only to give his name and his birth date during the brief hearing before Maricopa County Superior Court Commissioner Lisa Vandenberg, who entered the plea on Tyson's behalf. Tyson stood with his arms crossed while Vandenberg spoke to his attorneys. He didn't speak to reporters after the hearing.

One of Tyson's four lawyers, David Chesnoff, said Tyson is seeking professional help "for whatever problems he has" and would fight to stay out of prison.

"Drug addiction is a victimless crime," Chesnoff said. "We believe this is the kind of crime where you shouldn't go to prison."

Tyson was indicted earlier this month on felony drug possession and paraphernalia possession counts and two misdemeanor counts of driving under the influence of drugs. If convicted of all four charges, he could be sentenced to up to 7 1/2 years in prison.

Maricopa County Attorney Andrew Thomas has said he would pursue prison time for Tyson, who was convicted of rape in Indiana in 1992 and pleaded no contest to misdemeanor assault charges in Maryland in 1999.

The latest charges stem from Tyson's Dec. 29 arrest in Scottsdale. Tyson was pulled over after leaving a nightclub, and an officer found bags of cocaine in his back pocket and another in a package of cigarettes in his car, according to court records.

Tyson is due back in court Feb. 26.

Tyson, who recently got back in the ring for a series of four-round exhibitions, became the youngest heavyweight champion in history at 20 in 1986, when he knocked out Trevor Berbick. Four years later, he was knocked out by James "Buster" Douglas. By 1997, Tyson's career hit a low point when he bit Evander Holyfield's ear during a fight.

Chesnoff, who previously represented celebrity homemaker Martha Stewart on charges of lying about a stock sale, said Tyson's celebrity has brought unfair attention to his arrest by the public and prosecutors.

"Mike provided a lot of thrills and excitement," Chesnoff said. "He made a lot of people rich. He's concerned about this. He's a sensitive guy. This is not a game to him."

Consequences: Gun Ownership Linked To Higher Homicide Rates (NYT)

By Eric Nagourney

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

States with the greatest number of guns in the home also have the highest rates of homicide, a new study finds.

The study, in the February issue of Social Science and Medicine, looked at gun ownership in all 50 states and then compared the results with the number of people killed over a three-year period.

The research, the authors said, “suggests that household firearms are a direct and an indirect source of firearms used to kill Americans both in their homes and on the streets.”

The researchers, led by Matthew Miller of the Harvard School of Public Health, drew on data gathered by the federal Centers for Disease Control and Prevention. In 2001, the agency surveyed more than 200,000 people and asked them, among other questions, whether they had a gun in or near the home.

In states in the highest quarter of gun ownership, the study found, the overall homicide rate was 60 percent higher than in states in the lowest quarter. The rate of homicides involving guns was more than twice as high.

Among the possible explanations for the higher homicide rates, the study said, is that states with high gun ownership tend to make it easier to buy guns. There are also more guns that can be stolen. And the presence of a gun may allow arguments and fights to turn fatal.

The researchers said they could not prove that the guns caused the increase in homicides, only that there was a link. It may be, they said, that people are more likely to buy guns in states where violence is already high. But they said that explanation did not appear to be supported by their findings.

Report Details Problems With Gun Sellers (PHI)

By Robert Moran

The Philadelphia Inquirer, January 23, 2007

Gun-control advocates joined Philadelphia Police Commissioner Sylvester M. Johnson yesterday in calling for more prosecutions of gun dealers who sell to the gun-traffickers and straw purchasers fueling the violence plaguing Philadelphia and other cities.

At City Hall, the Brady Center to Prevent Gun Violence released a national report, "Shady Dealings: Illegal Gun Trafficking from Licensed Gun Dealers," that highlights more than two dozen cases - including nine in Pennsylvania - of dealers who sold guns that wound up in the hands of criminals. The criminals were prosecuted but the dealers were not.

"The recent upsurge in criminal gun violence places renewed importance on the question: Where do criminals get their guns?" the report states.

The report identified, among others, Abington Gun Sports in Willow Grove, which allegedly sold to female straw buyers working for a man who authorities say then went on a rampage in Philadelphia in 2003, holding up fast-food restaurants, carjacking a Lexus, and robbing a bank of nearly $60,000.

The guns the women bought included an AK-47 SAR assault rifle, two 12-gauge shotguns, a Bushmaster .223-caliber rifle, and a Marlon 30-30 rifle, according to the federal indictment of Andre Henry, three other men and three female straw purchasers. The case is pending.

"Is it any wonder that Philadelphia streets are overrun by illegal guns?" asked Brian J. Siebel, coauthor of the report.

Johnson said Philadelphia needed federal help because Pennsylvania gun laws are weak.

Frank D. Strange, owner of Abington Gun Sports, said in a phone interview that he was vigilant about straw buyers and anyone else who shouldn't be buying guns, but that he couldn't spot everybody trying to fool him.

He said that in an effort to thwart illegal purchases, he bans customers from using cell phones in his store to prevent possible straw buyers from getting advice about which guns to buy.

He also said that when he suspects people are acting as straw buyers, he lets them fill out all the paperwork first, then refuses to make the sale. He then provides the completed paperwork and ID evidence to the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, which investigates gun trafficking.

In addition to the regular reports he must make to the ATF, Strange said, he must submit a separate report every three months about his activity because his store has a higher-than-normal rating for "time to crime" - the time that passes before a gun he sold is used in a crime.

He attributed the rating to his proximity to Philadelphia, but he said he can't stop selling to people from Philadelphia if they appear to be legitimate buyers.

Strange, 63, a retired banker, called the Brady Center "a bunch of whackjobs" who want to "disarm everybody."

Paul Helmke, president of the Brady Center and former mayor of Fort Wayne, Ind., said the ATF had been greatly weakened by pro-dealer legislation Congress passed, including some laws dating to 1986.

For example, if ATF agents make a surprise visit to a gun shop suspected of breaking the law, they are not allowed to make another surprise visit for 12 months, Helmke said. During that period, the ATF must warn the dealer in advance that they are coming.

Strange, who has owned his shop for about eight years, said ATF agents had inspected it three or four times, most recently last week when they came in to retrieve all his sales documentation from last year. He said the visits were all unannounced.

With Democrats now in control of Congress, gun-control advocates and law enforcement leaders will press their case for new laws and tougher enforcement.

Today, Mayor Street is expected to join more than 50 other mayors, including Mayor Michael Bloomberg of New York, at a summit in Washington to address the proliferation of illegal guns.

Feds Unveil Plan To Stop Illegal Gun Sales (KTVT)

KTVT-TV, CBS 11, Dallas-Fort Worth, January 23, 2007

(CBS 11 News) DALLAS The U.S. Attorney's Office, the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms and the firearms industry are joining forces to stop the illegal purchases of firearms.

Monday they unveiled a campaign called "Don't Lie for the Other Guy." The program hopes to raise public awareness and educate firearms dealers about "straw" purchases.

A straw purchase is when someone buys a firearm for someone who cannot legally buy one for themselves.

A spokesperson for the ATF said, "This program is an important tool for ATF as we pursue our mission of preventing terrorism, reducing violent crime and protecting the public."

It is a federal felony to purchase a gun for someone who can't, punishable up to 10 years in jail and up to a $250,000 fine.

In 2005, ATF arrests led to over 1440 individuals being convicted of illegal firearms trafficking. That's up 14 percent from the previous year.

The group will display flyers in all gun stores and distribute materials about illegal firearms transactions. Several public service announcements about the program are also planned to hit the airwaves.

Sheriff Traces Guns' Crooked Paths To Compton's Streets (LAT)

By Megan Garvey, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

To crack down on gangs and stem soaring violence in Compton, Los Angeles County Sheriff Lee Baca asked his deputies and detectives not just to investigate crime but to also probe where gang members were getting their guns.

So sheriff's officials embarked on an unprecedented census to track down the origins of nearly 900 weapons confiscated there last year.

The results, released Monday, offer a glimpse into the complex and unexpected ways guns get into the hands of gang members.

Sixteen guns recovered in or near Compton were traced to a single store in Sparks, Nev., through databases of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

That same location, officials said, accounted for more than 350 weapons recovered nationwide by law enforcement officials last year, including 65 in the Los Angeles area.

The bureau is investigating the store, and law enforcement officials declined to identify it, Baca said.

The bulk of the weapons confiscated in Compton were originally sold in California. But scores of others came from Arizona, Nevada and Colorado. Nine weapons were registered in Connecticut and a few others were registered in Ohio.

Several of the weapons were traced to killings. Five of the recovered weapons were among 37 taken in a burglary of a Westminster gun store in October.

In all, however, only a couple dozen of the guns had been reported stolen, even though almost none were found in the possession of the registered owner.

"It tells us that these people are selling them," said Cmdr. Ralph Martin, referring to a practice known as "straw buys" in which a person who is legally able to buy a weapon turns around and passes the gun to someone who cannot.

By the end of 2006, gang suppression deputies and detectives, along with street officers working out of the Compton station, seized 875 weapons, about 10% of the total recovered by law enforcement countywide last year.

"There's only one or two gun stores in Compton," Martin said. "We thought: Is there a gun store or two that is selling to cons? If so, we thought we should know that."

Sheriff's officials said clear patterns have already emerged showing a disproportionate number of confiscated weapons originating from a relatively small number of gun dealers or retailers.

"Certain gun stores led the pack," said Lt. Paul Pietrantoni, who headed a gang task force sent to Compton a year ago after the city experienced soaring homicides in 2005.

Those stores, he said, are the focus of an investigation that may be concluded in the coming weeks.

Now, sheriff's investigators hope to go further, connecting the dots between the legal purchases and the guns ending up in the possession of known gang members on the streets of Compton.

Local law enforcement officials said they were surprised by the connection between Compton crime and a store in Sparks, a suburb of 81,000 near Reno. There are at least half a dozen gun dealers and gunsmiths in the Sparks area, including a pawnshop, gun stores and a specialty precision weapons maker.

In 1999, one Sparks-based gun manufacturer was found negligent in U.S. District Court in Brooklyn, N.Y., for marketing and distribution practices that a jury determined had contributed to illegal drug trafficking in New York state. Los Angeles law enforcement officials said Monday that they did not know if that maker had any connection to the current investigation.

The next step, they say, will be to knock on the doors of as many of the registered owners as possible.

"We need to ask: Do you know where your gun is? Where'd it go? Did you sell it? Why didn't you register the sale?" Pietrantoni said. "It shouldn't be easy to lose track of a gun."

Baca said the data collected so far suggest federal and local officials need to significantly improve the tracking of weapons that change hands.

He called the relationship between those who buy guns legally and those guns ending up being used illegally "the nexus between law-abiding and lawlessness."

"That gap has to be closed," said Baca, who added that he believed the survey of guns seized in Compton showed "the idea of checking people's background who are the purchasers is not enough. It's not only not doing enough, it's then not holding the original gun purchaser accountable for their guns."

He said he plans to pursue ways to go after gun owners who knowingly or willingly give or sell their weapons to people who cannot legally buy a gun.

"I think there is virtually no control," he said. "There should be a law against that. If you buy a gun, it is yours to care for and secure and you are prohibited from giving that gun to another person for any reason whatsoever."

Baca announced the overall results of the task force Monday at a news conference outside Compton City Hall. He said the goal had been to reduce homicides by 40%, a goal he said was exceeded.

In 2005, the station reported 72 gang-related homicides, compared with 36 last year. In addition, two suspected gang members were shot and killed by deputies in 2006.

The task force made 1,622 arrests, 959 of them on felony charges. It executed 301 search warrants and worked closely with probation and parole officers assigned to Compton.

The sheriff said Monday that he plans to keep the task force, which is paid for with county funds, in place for "a long time."

"When you have a crisis in any part of Los Angeles," Baca said, "it's absolutely irresponsible not to respond."

His goal: "There is no longer a significant gang problem in Compton."

Baca had moved several dozen gang suppression deputies and detectives as well as a narcotics team and homicide detectives to Compton a year ago, even though the city had no additional funds to increase services.

Since 2000, Compton has contracted with the sheriff for law enforcement, a move made by then-Mayor Omar Bradley, who said the police force was too costly to maintain.

When task force personnel were shifted back to other areas at midyear without the sheriff's knowledge, the city and nearby unincorporated areas experienced seven homicides in eight days.

In 2006, Compton had only 13 homicides through early July and had been on a pace to set the lowest number of killings in a generation.

"It was a mistake," Baca said of the task force's temporary removal. "It showed how quickly the guns and the gangs and the drugs and the racial hatred will return if you leave. We learned the hard way."

IMMIGRATION:

Illegal Immigrant Charged With Sex Assault Asks To Be Deported To Avoid Punishment (FOX)

Fox News, January 23, 2007

WOODSTOCK, Ill. — Not many illegal immigrants ask to be deported. But Jose Vallejo of Mexico did, rather than face a potential prison term of 30 years for sex assault here in the United States. And he nearly got his wish.

Prosecutors in Illinois say Vallejo, who is now a 17-year-old Mexican national, pinned a 4-year-old girl down on a bed, then molested her on April 12, 2006. Even though Vallejo was only 16 at the time of the alleged crime, he is being charged as an adult because of the age of the victim. He faces three counts, including aggravated criminal sexual assault, one count of unlawful restraint.

Originally, bond was set by a state judge at $150,000 but Vallejo's family posted the cash. So, Vallejo was released by the state, but soon after, was taken into custody by federal agents for illegally entering the country three years ago.

While in federal custody, Vallejo asked a federal immigration judge to deport him. The request was granted during a Jan. 4 deportation hearing in Chicago.

But before Vallejo was sent back over the border, federal Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials alerted prosecutors in McHenry County, Ill., and that agency took custody of him.

"It's kind of terrifying to know that someone who has violated a four-year-old, sexually violated, would be washed from the system all of the sudden, he would escape from our country here and it'd be over," said state attorney Lou Bianchi.

Bianchi said a number of things could be added to courtrooms to give immigration judges tools to determine if someone before them has criminal charges pending, which could decide whether or not they stay in the United States to face charges.

"If they have a monitor, at least someone in the courtroom is watching the monitor and all of the sudden it would flash up on the screen that this man is wanted or he's got at least outstanding charges so that the appropriate authority like in this case," Bianchi said. "Our office could be notified so that we could take the proper precautions to make sure that these type of illegal aliens who commit crimes are not deported immediately so that we can prosecute them."

But Vallejo's attorney, Perry Grimaldi, argued in state court that the deportation order should stand, saying, "their law is supreme over the state laws. They are the ones that have taken him into custody. They are the ones that will conduct any further actions."

But a county judge on Jan. 16 ruled against Vallejo, upping his bond from $150,000 to $750,000 to prevent his deportation.

ICE characterizes this case as textbook, stressing that red flags were raised after the immigration judge's deportation order.

But immigration watchdogs say laws must be changed to ensure immigration judges are informed of pending criminal charges. Currently, these federal judges don't take criminal charges into account, unless that's the reason for the illegal immigrant's deportation hearing.

"The system should work in a way that the only people who go before an immigration judge who have committed some sort of crime has already served their time for that crime," said Jack Martin, special projects director for the Federation for American Immigration Reform. "In other words, they should not heave people coming before them that are involved in another judicial proceeding until that proceedings is completed."

Martin said the number of cases of this type is increasing with the illegal immigrant population in the United States; case loads of this type are growing by about 500,000 a year, and there are currently between 11 and 13 million — with some estimates saying as many as 20 million — people in the United States illegally.

Susan Eastwood, spokeswoman for the Justice Department's executive office for immigration review, told FOX News that immigration courts will not consider any crimes allegedly committed by an illegal immigrant, unless they are related to the immigration case at hand.

"Our judges do not take into account pending criminal charged against a defendant," Eastwood said. "The judges must stay fair and balanced on a case. A criminal case and a deportation hearing are separate trials. Immigration judges do not do criminal trials."

Now that he'll be in the United States for awhile, Vallejo has requested a jury trial. His next court date is scheduled for March 2.

WASHINGTON Jan 22, 2007 (AP)— The Bush administration is taking heat from lawmakers for the harm done to a company during last month's largest-ever immigration raid.

Immigration officials on Dec. 12 arrested 1,297 illegal workers at Swift & Co. meatpacking plants in Texas, Colorado, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska and Utah.

After a closed-door meeting Monday with Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff, senators from the affected states said the raid exposed flaws in the federal government and in a program designed to help employers screen for illegal immigrants.

Among the concerns, senators reported, were that agencies can't share information about stolen identities and that programs designed to catch illegal immigrants allow many lawbreakers to slip through the cracks.

"I can't think of a system that would be better designed to fail," Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, said.

Chertoff acknowledged some of the problems, and said his department's programs are not "the perfect cure." Senators said they wanted Chertoff to enforce the laws, but they needed to assure companies that working with the government would not ultimately hurt them.

Swift participated in a program called Basic Pilot, which screens employees for illegal Social Security numbers. The system doesn't snag stolen Social Security numbers or numbers that are being used in multiple locations.

Although the government took no action against Swift in the Dec. 12 raids, the Greeley, Colo., meat processor was forced to temporarily halt operations. The raids could cost the company an estimated $30 million.

"We want employers to use Basic Pilot," said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. "But we need to have a clear understanding with the business community. I think it's very unclear now."

The senators said they planned to introduce legislation to fix some of the problems.

For example, they hope to change the law to allow the Social Security Administration to tell the Homeland Security Department when a Social Security number is being used more than once.

Since the arrests, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has announced the indictments of 148 illegal immigrants, who used other peoples' Social Security numbers and other personal information to get jobs at Swift. Local prosecutors are bringing state charges against the immigrants, including 80 in Cache County, Utah, and 18 in Weld County, Colo.

Judge Closes Lawsuit After US Federal Officials Account For Detainees In Immigration Raid (FINDLAW/AP)

By Judith Kohler, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 23, 2007

(AP) - DENVER-A judge closed a lawsuit against the federal government Monday after federal officials disclosed the whereabouts and status of 262 workers arrested during last month's largest-ever immigration raid at Swift & Co. meatpacking plant in Greeley, Colorado.

Attorneys for the United Food and Commercial Workers Union, which filed the suit, said it should not have taken a lawsuit to get the information. The lawsuit alleged the U.S. government had violated the Greeley workers' constitutional right to due process.

The people arrested in Greeley were among 1,297 illegal workers at Swift & Co. meatpacking plants in six U.S. states who were taken into custody on Dec. 12, most on illegal immigration charges. The union lawsuit did not cover workers in the other states.

U.S. District Judge John Kane terminated the lawsuit after union and federal lawyers agreed that all the arrested workers had been accounted for and given a chance to seek bond.

The government released the information to the union last week under orders from Kane.

A total of 74 of the Greeley workers remained in federal custody in Denver and El Paso, Texas, and 75 voluntarily returned to Mexico, according to federal officials. Another 18 face state identity-theft charges in Weld County, Colorado, where the Greeley Swift plant is located.

Kane said his jurisdiction was limited to whether workers' basic legal rights were protected and did not extend to the propriety of the raid itself. He said he saw no evidence that the detainees' rights were violated.

John Bowen, attorney for the union group, said the bond hearings should have been held within 48 hours of the raid, but the last one for the Swift employees did not take place until Friday.

"It should not have taken more than a month, by any stretch of the imagination," he added.

Immigration officials did not immediately answer a request for comment to The Associated Press

Immigration and Customs Enforcement agents raided Swift plants in Greeley; Grand Island, Nebraska; Cactus, Texas; Hyrum, Utah; Marshalltown, Iowa; and Worthington, Minnesota.

ICE officials said they were cracking down on an indentity-theft scheme, but union spokesman Dave Minshall called the arrests "a brutal immigration raid, pure and simple."

Former Shelby Tax Preparer Pleads Guilty In State Court (SHELSTAR)

By Pete DeLea

Shelby (NC) Star, January 23, 2007

RALEIGH — Former Shelby tax preparer Jerry O. Adams III, who still faces federal charges on defrauding the U.S. Department of Treasury of more than $3.8 million, pleaded guilty to failing to file and pay the state individual income tax last week in state court.

Judge K. Dean Black issued Adams a 45-day suspended sentence and placed him on supervised probation for two years. The sentence will be reduced to unsupervised probation after he pays $3,675 in court costs and restitution to the state.

"It's the department's responsibility to make sure everyone pays their fair share of taxes," said Kim Brooks, director of public affairs for the Department of Revenue. "That's what we did here."

Adams said he's innocent but wanted a quick resolution. He said he's working on a settlement on the federal charges.

"I didn't owe it. I settled this because I want this to be done with," said Adams. "I'm glad to get this over with and I want to move on with my life."

He said the state case started when the U.S. Internal Revenue Service audited him. He said the audit showed he owed more money than he originally stated. He said they then passed the information on to the N.C. Department of Revenue.

"They audited my paperwork and they said, 'If you owe them more money, you owe us more money,'" Adams said. "They didn't give me an opportunity to present my receipts."

In the federal case, the U.S. Department of Justice claims that Adams, along with Demetria S. Adams, prepared tax returns that understated wages and overstated credits, which resulted in excessive refunds.

The suit against the couple states they defrauded the government of $3.8 million in more than 1,600 tax returns filed between 2004 and 2005 through businesses called First Choice Tax Service, Precise Tax and D&S Tax Service in Charlotte and Shelby.

A July 2 trial date has been scheduled in U.S. District Court in front of Judge Dennis Howell, said Andrew Ames, a Justice Department spokesman.

As part of an agreement with the federal government, Adams said he's no longer allowed to prepare tax returns and has been doing paralegal work since the federal case was filed in May.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Speech To Showcase Domestic Agenda (AP)

By Ben Feller

AP, January 23, 2007

President Bush will tell Americans Tuesday night he has important plans for health care, education and other kitchen table topics that have little to do with Iraq. Yet if the state of the union is strong, so is the nation's skepticism that he can deliver.

For the first time, Bush will give his State of the Union address with Democrats in power and looking over his shoulder — literally, with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi seated right behind him. Most people have no confidence that Bush and a Democratic Congress can solve problems together, a troubling sentiment that has only deepened since the November election, an Associated Press-AOL News poll finds.

The 9 p.m. EST speech is a chance for Bush to pull his domestic agenda out from the shadow of the Iraq war, if only briefly. So Bush will focus on issues he hopes will appeal to mainstream America — and to Democrats on Capitol Hill, shifting pressure onto them to govern.

"He's got to be convincing, so that the American people believe that he's serious about working in a bipartisan way," said Charlie Black, a longtime Republican strategist and informal White House adviser. "If there's one headline they'd like to have out of this, that would be it."

The president is expected to address:

· Health care: Bush will propose a tax deduction of $7,500 for individuals and $15,000 for families regardless of whether they buy their own health insurance or receive medical coverage at work. Health care insurance would be considered taxable income, and people with more generous policies could face tax increases unless they change plans. The administration says its plan will help people who buy insurance individually rather than through their employers. The administration says the tax deductions will allow more Americans to buy insurance.

· Energy: Bush is expected to call for a sharp escalation of corn-based ethanol as a gasoline blend. He also may seek the power to raise fuel economy standards for passenger cars, probably as part of a plan to offer financial incentives for increasing alternative fuels. The auto industry has resisted upgraded mileage requirements and stressed a need for vehicles fueled by alternatives such as ethanol, diesel and eventually hydrogen. Bush asked for the same authority last year. Some Democrats worry the plan would give transportation officials overly broad authority to change the system and note the measure would not have any impact on current gas prices.

· Education: Bush will push for Congress to renew his education law, No Child Left Behind, which expires this year. Democrats have already signaled their intention to work with him but will expect him to go along with increases in spending. The law pushes schools that receive federal poverty aid to show yearly progress or face sanctions, including allowing students to transfer or demand extra tutoring.

Bush will also push for an immigration strategy that includes more than tougher border security.

Meanwhile, bitter feelings over the war stand in the way of the principal goal of the speech — a bipartisan agenda.

Just about everything Bush wants to do is dependent on a Congress in which even some Republicans are resisting his ideas. Within a day of his speech, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is likely to vote on a resolution condemning his move to send more troops to Iraq.

No matter the emphasis on domestic issues, Bush cannot skirt the war, and he has no intention of trying.

Without rehashing the Iraq speech he gave two weeks ago, Bush will defend his stand that Iraq is part of a war on terror that will make Americans safer. That contention will come during a foreign policy passage in which Bush will also tout U.S. humanitarian efforts abroad.

Since Bush announced his latest Iraq plan, the White House has pointed to signs of progress by the Iraqi government on both political and security fronts. Yet U.S. forces and Iraqi civilians have also endured some of the heaviest, bloodiest attacks of the war.

Coming after his Iraq speech, which had an enormous buildup, Bush's sixth State of the Union approaches with an anticlimactic feel. The Democrats and Republicans who want his job are already making headlines even though the 2008 election is still 22 months away.

With that in mind, Bush's aides took steps to keep the speech concise and relevant. Topics that might have made the cut in other years — such as recent advancements in cancer research and a drop in cancer-related deaths — have been set aside, often for separate events.

Bush Speech To Go Beyond War Policy (CHIT)

By Mark Silva

Chicago Tribune, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Planning a State of the Union address Tuesday night heavy on health care, energy and education, President Bush will attempt to get beyond a raging debate over the war in Iraq as he faces a new Democratic-controlled Congress for the first time.

Yet, with mounting U.S. casualties in Iraq and a majority of Americans voicing disapproval with the nation's direction, criticism is likely to remain fixed on the president's war policy while congressional leaders attempt to swiftly discredit some of his new domestic initiatives, such as a tax deduction for health insurance to offer more people coverage.

The president, who plans to confront war critics in a speech starting at 8 p.m. CST and running longer than 40 minutes, also plans to spell out what the White House calls "bold proposals" on health care, energy independence, global warming and immigration.

This includes a proposal for a new standard tax deduction for people with health insurance. It is likely to attract ready controversy as it offers health coverage for perhaps just 3 million of the 47 million Americans now uninsured, while asking an estimated 30 million taxpayers now insured through their workplace to pay higher taxes as employer-paid health benefits become taxable.

As Bush presses an ambitious domestic agenda for the remaining two years of his presidency, he will find himself facing a hostile new audience with a Democratic-controlled Congress unwilling to accept his stance on the war and ready to relegate him to lame-duck status as 2008 presidential campaigns get underway.

"It's a tough order," said John Mueller, professor of political science at Ohio State University, who doubts the president can get beyond the war with this address because the war is the No 1 concern on Americans' minds heading into the speech.

"This has become so dominant," he said. "What's frustrating, from the president's standpoint, is there is nothing even close."

With 63 percent of Americans surveyed in the latest Gallup Poll voicing disapproval with the nation's direction, and only 35 percent satisfied, Gallup also has found a correlation with the war. The vast majority of those who oppose the war are dissatisfied with the way things are going in the U.S.—82 percent—while those who support the war are largely satisfied with the nation's direction—67 percent.

The president, who devoted a nationally televised speech to his war policy two weeks ago, will once again stress the urgency of the challenge that the U.S. faces in Iraq and his formula for success. But he also will attempt to focus the public and a Democratic Congress on a domestic agenda that the parties can pursue together.

"The president is going to offer some bold proposals that Congress could, in fact, enact, and in the process make itself look good and, more importantly, do the people's business," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Monday.

"When you have these big issues—health care is a big issue, energy is a big issue, education is a big issue, immigration is a big issue… it's worth spending a little more time to walk through how the president analyzes the problem," Snow said, "and how he proposes to try to address them, and to reach out to members of Congress and say, 'We can do this. We can work together on these things.'"

Foremost among the president's proposals is a plan to promote health care—a plan Democratic leaders already have started attacking as "a tax on working families" before Bush details it.

Bush will propose:

A new standard tax deduction for anyone with health insurance, exempting the first $7,500 of an individual's income and the first $15,000 of a family's income from income or payroll tax.

A new tax on the health benefits that workers receive from employers and also on the share of premiums that employees now pay before taxes—subjecting to taxation the money that companies and employees contribute to employees' insurance plans.

With the average cost of a family health care plan at work expected to be $13,600 in 2009, when this proposal could start, 80 percent of all workers now insured through work stand to benefit from the proposed new standard tax deduction, while 20 percent of those insured at work stand to face higher taxes.

A tax shift promising lower taxes for about 120 million taxpayers now insured through work and higher taxes for about 30 million people who have more "generous," costly policies at work.

Offering a new tax break for people who purchase insurance on their own, and enabling many who lack insurance now to afford it. A "conservative" estimate by the White House suggests that "upwards of 3 million" of the 47 million now uninsured might gain coverage under this plan.

There are "winners and losers" in the plan, said Jason Furman, an expert on tax policy at the Brookings Institution.

"It is great that the president has come along and identified that our existing health care system is inadequate. And he is giving more of an incentive for people who lack insurance to get insurance," Furman said. "But then, unfortunately, when you get to the details, some of these things have to be improved."

From the government's standpoint, in terms of the money collected from taxpayers, the plan is "revenue-neutral" over a 10-year period, according to Katherine Baicker of the White House's Council of Economic Advisers. But it's a "revenue-loser" in the first few years, and a money-maker in the later years of the cycle.

The plan "levels the playing field" for people now purchasing insurance on their own, Baicker said, offering the same standard tax deduction for insurance that people covered at work stand to get.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid already has pounced on the plan as "a tax hike on working families." The health care premiums that employees pay at work have risen dramatically, his office noted, while wages have not.

Yet the president's plan offers coverage for more Americans without increasing the government's long-range costs, said Mark McClellan, who served as director of Medicare and Medicaid services in the Bush administration and is a visiting senior fellow at Brookings and the American Enterprise Institute.

"This is overall budget-neutral, from the standpoint of the federal government," said McClellan, acknowledging that higher taxes for some people pose "the challenging part of the proposal." But, while averting higher costs for the government, he said, "I think this is a serious contribution to getting more people insured."

For State Of The Union 2007, A Leaner Agenda (CSM)

By Linda Feldmann

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120523

When President Bush takes to the airwaves Tuesday night to deliver his sixth State of the Union address, the metamessage of the evening will be: "I am still relevant."

Of course, as commander in chief during wartime, Mr. Bush is central. But as he seeks to show that he is not consumed by the Iraq war and its high-profile retooling, this year's annual message to Congress takes on added significance. In an effort to grab public attention, he is promising a different type of State of the Union – not the usual laundry list of items from the forthcoming budget, but a more focused look at a few key initiatives, most of them domestic.

The irony is that, for the first time, Bush will be speaking to a Congress in which both chambers are controlled by the opposition. For him to implement any proposals, he must find the common ground with Democrats that has been so talked about since November. Even when Republicans controlled Congress, there were no guarantees; Bush's 2005 plan to partially privatize Social Security failed to get off the ground.

This year, the most extensively previewed plan centers on a tax reform aimed at making health insurance more affordable to low-income people. The proposal would also reduce the tax break for more expensive health plans. In addition, Bush's speech will focus on energy, education, immigration, and the war on terror.

But will anyone be listening?

Just two weeks ago, Bush delivered a major address announcing the "new way forward" in Iraq, including a plan to add more than 20,000 US troops to try to bring some stability to Baghdad and areas where insurgents are believed to be operating. The speech did little to move polling numbers on Iraq and the Bush presidency, both stuck below 50 percent. In recent days Bush has said he will address the criticism of his plan – including from fellow Republicans – in the State of the Union speech.

A dissatisfied public

The president's job approval ratings have been mired mostly in the 30s for the past year, putting him in a league with some of the least popular US presidents of the 20th century, including Richard Nixon, Jimmy Carter, and Harry Truman.

Public satisfaction with the direction of the country has fared even worse. In the latest Gallup poll, released Monday, 35 percent reported they are satisfied "with the way things are going in the United States at this time" versus 63 percent dissatisfied. That number is better it was last month (30 percent) but about where it was one year ago.

Some presidential scholars are skeptical that Bush will really limit his penultimate State of the Union to just a few well-chosen ideas.

"I can't think of a point since his first run for governor in Texas where he didn't have a shopping list, where he wasn't thinking or acting on the notion that, unlike his dad [the first President Bush], he had the vision thing," says Fred Greenstein, a professor emeritus at Princeton University in New Jersey.

After all, a president who sets his sights modestly risks the dreaded label "lame duck." But after six years in office, most two-term presidents have already rolled out their biggest initiatives. The second half of second terms are more about completing unfinished business rather than starting something new. And it is debatable whether the bully pulpit is all it's cracked up to be, especially for an unpopular president.

"You've got a president who people know after six years, [and] you've got a dominant issue [Iraq] that people think they know after four years. So it's not like there's a lot of malleability there," says George Edwards, a political scientist at Texas A&M University and author of the book "On Deaf Ears: The Limits of the Bully Pulpit."

Bush now must also compete for attention with the rapidly expanding field of politicians who want to replace him in two years – including Democratic front-runner Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who announced her candidacy right before this year's State of the Union on purpose, her campaign says.

And in another moment of irony, one of Bush's central themes Tuesday night will be the rising cost of healthcare – the policy issue that Senator Clinton became infamous for as first lady when she headed up her husband's ill-fated healthcare reform effort.

Bush's health insurance plan

Tuesday night, Bush will propose that low-income people be given a tax break to help them afford health insurance. On the higher end of the scale, workers enrolled in more expensive plans would be taxed on coverage that exceeds a set limit. Some Democrats have already rejected the plan, calling it a tax increase on the middle class.

In his Saturday radio address, Bush focused on the relief his plan would provide to lower-income people:

"The current tax code encourages home ownership by allowing you to deduct the interest on your mortgage from your taxes. We can reform the tax code so that it provides a similar incentive for you to buy health insurance. So in my State of the Union Address next Tuesday, I will propose a tax reform designed to help make basic private health insurance more affordable – whether you get it through your job or on your own."

Leaner State Of The Union Aims For Common Ground (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

President Bush will reach out to Democrats in tonight's State of the Union address, pursuing common ground with his political adversaries on issues such as immigration, education and energy policy.

But viewers tuning in at 9 p.m. will see a different picture: Just over his shoulder on the television screen will be House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, leader of the Democrats, who likely won't applaud the president's initiatives.

And some Republicans in the chamber may also sit on their hands to show displeasure as Mr. Bush seeks to draw support from a Democratic-led Congress for the first time in his presidency.

Mr. Bush plans a broad and thematic speech that will placate Republicans while seeking a central ground with Democrats, who along with a majority of Americans oppose Mr. Bush's strategy to deploy another 21,000 U.S. troops to Iraq.

"The president will need to focus on domestic policy issues that are widely recognized to be important and on which he can see some possibility of working with the new Democratic majority," said Cal Jillson, professor of political science at Southern Methodist University in Dallas.

The White House has made clear the speech will focus on five issues -- the global war on terrorism, health care, education, immigration and energy -- instead of a laundry list of policy initiatives used in previous addresses.

Mr. Bush, as he did nearly two weeks ago in a prime-time address to the nation, will lay out his case for his new Iraq strategy, but he'll move quickly to topics that polls show Americans care most about, especially health care and education.

"Americans want a [health care] system that's going to be more patient-friendly and that's going to meet their needs," White House press secretary Tony Snow said yesterday. "The president will talk about that. Education, always important ... Immigration has been an issue of considerable concern within this country."

"In other words, the president is going to address the areas that are foremost concern for Americans," Mr. Snow said. "When you have a Democratic Congress that came in two weeks ago saying, we want to get things done, we've got some offers that they're going to be pretty good for them."

Democrats, though, appear ready to oppose Mr. Bush at every turn. On Saturday, shortly after Mr. Bush proposed expanding health care coverage by putting incentives into the tax code for individuals to buy their own, Democratic leaders immediately opposed the plan.

Republican strategist Charlie Black, who works closely with the president, said Mr. Bush will not bend over backwards to win Democratic support. While he will seek to lay out an achievable bipartisan plan, "he will demonstrate that he is not a lame duck, that he is willing to tackle big issues."

Still, compounding the president's problems is the 2008 campaign for his job has already begun, and Democrats could well spend the next two years opposing Mr. Bush's plans.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, said over the weekend as she announced her presidential candidacy that she "will spend [the next] two years doing everything in my power to limit the damage George W. Bush can do."

In his speech tonight, Mr. Bush will give Democrats that opportunity with immigration, which many Americans see as the nation's No. 1 issue. He will repeat his call from last year for comprehensive immigration reform. While the Republican-controlled Congress would not approve the president's proposal to create a guest-worker program and put more than 10 million illegal aliens on a path to citizenship, Democrats just might.

Mr. Bush also will seek to renew his bipartisan friendship with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, who he teamed with to win overwhelming approval in Congress for the No Child Left Behind Act.

The act comes up for renewal this year, and some Republicans fear the president may cut a deal with majority Democrats, offering more money if Democrats agree to include more requirements for the high school level.

Mr. Kennedy, chairman of the Senate education panel, has said the White House failed to fight to adequately fund the massive federal program.

Bush, At Low Point In Polls, Will Push Domestic Agenda (NYT)

By Jim Rutenberg And Robert Pear

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — Carrying some of the worst public approval ratings of any president in a generation, President Bush is heading into his State of the Union address on Tuesday night seeking to revitalize his domestic agenda but facing stiff resistance over the initiatives the White House has previewed so far.

Administration officials said Monday that among Mr. Bush's proposals would be a plan to help states provide health care coverage to people who lack insurance by diverting federal aid from hospitals, especially public institutions. The provision is likely to draw loud criticism from municipalities across the nation and will significantly affect the New York City Health and Hospitals Corporation, the nation's largest municipal health care system.

Officials said Mr. Bush's speech would include proposals to address the nation's energy needs and global warming, partly by promoting the use and development of alternative fuels. He is also expected to renew his call for an overhaul of immigration law and to propose altering tax policies to help the uninsured.

The president's advisers said they hoped Mr. Bush's address would re-energize his domestic agenda by striking a bipartisan and ambitious tone as he faces further isolation on his Iraq policy.

"The power of the ideas requires people to take notice and take seriously important domestic initiatives," said Dan Bartlett, the White House counselor. "There will be key signals to the American people that despite disagreements over the war, other work can be done."

Mr. Bartlett said a major theme of the address would be that "divided government does not mean we cannot govern."

But the initial response to Mr. Bush's health care plans has not been positive, on Capitol Hill or among constituencies including employers and labor unions. And with the president's political authority diminished and the new Democratic majority in Congress emboldened, the fate of his domestic agenda, and his ability to forge compromises on his terms, is in question.

Behind the president on the podium will be not Representative J. Dennis Hastert, the former speaker and Mr. Bush's stalwart Republican ally, but Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, with whom Mr. Bush traded insults throughout the 2006 campaign.

Giving the Democratic rebuttal will be Senator Jim Webb, Democrat of Virginia, whose son is serving in Iraq and who reported having a tense exchange with Mr. Bush at the Congressional Christmas party. The audience in the House chamber is expected to include the actor Michael J. Fox, who has become the face of the movement to overcome Mr. Bush's objections and increase federal financing for stem cell research.

The chamber will include an increasing number of Republicans who are questioning or breaking ranks with Mr. Bush on the war and other issues, as Senator John W. Warner of Virginia, the former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, did Monday in criticizing the president's decision to send more troops to Iraq.

Mr. Bush also faces an increasingly skeptical public, one that has given him some of his lowest marks in several recent polls.

According to a CBS News poll conducted Thursday through Sunday, 28 percent of Americans approve of the way the president is handling his job, and more than twice as many, 64 percent, disapprove. It is the lowest approval rating the president has received in a CBS News poll, though it is statistically little different from the rating of 30 percent he received earlier this month.

Only Jimmy Carter has received a lower approval rating, 26 percent, in 1979, in surveys conducted by CBS News or its polling partner, The New York Times. In a Gallup poll conducted in August 1974, just before his resignation, Richard M. Nixon had a 24 percent approval rating.

In a new ABC News/Washington Post poll made public on Monday, only 33 percent approved of Mr. Bush's job performance, and 65 disapproved, tying the record for his worst marks in that poll.

Asked about the new batch of low ratings, Mr. Bush's spokesman, Tony Snow, attributed them to discouragement over Iraq that could be overcome at home.

"George W. Bush as a president," Mr. Snow said, "is not somebody who is going to cease to be bold because there has been — because right now people are concerned about the progress of the war. Instead he understands his obligation as commander in chief is to go ahead and address forthrightly big problems and come up with solutions that not only are going to have political appeal, but they're also going to be effective in making life better for Americans."

On health care, Mr. Bush is trying to drive the debate through plans that would not cost the federal government additional money at a time when the White House is committed to showing a plan to balance the budget. This weekend, the administration sketched out a proposal under which people whose health care programs exceed a certain value would face a higher tax bill, with the revenue going to tax incentives to encourage the purchase of health coverage by lower-income people.

Two leaders of fiscally conservative advocacy groups, Grover Norquist of Americans for Tax Reform and Pat Toomey of the Club for Growth, endorsed Mr. Bush's plans. But in separate interviews, each expressed concern that Congressional Democrats would approve a plan that put greater emphasis on tax increases.

Labor leaders were outspoken in opposing the plan. "This is a wrongheaded, crazy proposal," said Gerald M. Shea, assistant to the president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. "It would throw into turmoil the employment-based system of health insurance, and it would impose a new tax on the middle class."

Several public health officials reacted with alarm to Mr. Bush's plan to encourage states to take Medicaid money now earmarked for public hospitals and use it for state programs to cover the uninsured. The Bush administration proposes cutting

Medicaid payments to public hospitals and other "safety net" providers by $3.9 billion over the next five years. Preliminary estimates suggest that 40 percent of the savings would come at the expense of the New York City Health and Hospitals Corporation, which operates 11 hospitals, 4 nursing homes and more than 80 community clinics.

Kenneth E. Raske, president of the Greater New York Hospital Association, called the proposal "an absolute disaster for New York."

Deborah Bachrach, a deputy commissioner in the New York State Health Department, said it would affect hospitals "that serve some of the lowest-income, most vulnerable patients."

Defending the proposal, Michael O. Leavitt, the secretary of health and human services, said: "We want to be able to redirect federal payments away from institutions and to needy individuals. Rather than perpetually paying bills for the uninsured, it's better to help them buy health insurance."

White House officials outlined the health care proposals ahead of the address to make way on Tuesday for a new emphasis on energy policy initiatives.

White House aides met Monday with two lawmakers who have pressed for the promotion and development of alternative fuels, Senator Tom Harkin, Democrat of Iowa, and Senator Richard G. Lugar, Republican of Indiana.

A Senate aide briefed on the meeting said the senators were told that the plan would be "very ambitious" in terms of increasing the development and use of alternative energy sources. They were also told that the plan would address "the use side," which could indicate a move to improve fuel standards, the aide said.

The new initiatives will require a political push by Mr. Bush, who will begin touring the nation to promote his policies on Wednesday.

Bush To Face Skeptical Congress (WP)

By Peter Baker And Jon Cohen

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

President Bush plans to reach out to the opposition in his State of the Union address tonight with new and recycled proposals on health care, energy, immigration and education, but the uproar over his decision to send more U.S. troops to Iraq has eclipsed potential consensus on domestic policy.

As he addresses a Congress controlled entirely by Democrats for the first time since he took office, Bush faces deep skepticism inside the chamber, even within the House Republican leadership, which yesterday made proposals intended "to hold the Bush administration . . . accountable" for the progress of his latest Iraq plan.

The doubt on Capitol Hill reflects the continuing erosion of Bush's public support across the country. His approval rating is at the lowest level of his presidency, according to a new Washington Post-ABC News poll, and only twice in the past six decades has a president delivered his annual speech to the nation in a weaker condition in the polls -- Harry S. Truman in the midst of the Korean War in 1952 and Richard M. Nixon in the throes of Watergate in 1974.

For the first time, majorities of Americans say Bush cannot be trusted in a crisis, has not made the country safer and should withdraw U.S. forces from Iraq to avoid further casualties rather than leave them until civil order is restored. And, in a sign of intensifying opposition, a majority -- 51 percent -- for the first time expressed strong disapproval of Bush's performance, compared with 17 percent who strongly approved.

"The world changed significantly on Election Day, and the only people who were surprised were them," GOP pollster Tony Fabrizio said of Bush and his aides. Now, he added, "they've backed themselves into a tough corner, and the problem is his continued insistence for the troop increase, which flies in the face of what 70 percent of Americans want, makes him look . . . like [he's saying], 'I'll listen to you, but I'll do what I want anyway.' "

The poll indicates that Bush has made no headway in selling his decision to bolster troop levels in Iraq by 21,500, with 65 percent now opposing it, compared with 61 percent the night of his Jan. 10 nationally televised address. Three in five Americans trust congressional Democrats more than Bush to deal with Iraq, and the same proportion want Congress to try to block his troop-increase plan.

Bush's overall approval rating of 33 percent matches the lowest it has been in Post-ABC polls since he became president, and 71 percent say the country is seriously off track, the highest such expression of national pessimism in more than a decade. By contrast, newly installed House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) is enjoying a honeymoon, with 54 percent approving her handling of the job.

While Bush will devote about half of tonight's 40-minute-plus speech to Iraq, the broader battle with Islamic radicals and other foreign policy matters, advisers said they understand that only sustained and visible progress on the ground in Iraq might change American minds about the war. The best Bush can hope for tonight, they said, is to prevent a wholesale defection by Republicans and buy enough time for his plan to work.

"He knows there's great skepticism," said a senior White House official who spoke on the condition of anonymity to discuss the speech before its delivery. "But in spite of that, he believes there's much to be done if we can work together."

Aides said Bush will not directly engage in a debate over congressional efforts to block the troop increase. But in private briefings for administration allies yesterday, White House Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove said Bush will challenge Congress to put up its own plan if it does not like his "new way forward," according to people who were briefed.

Past presidents who found themselves facing an opposition Congress tried to tack to the middle after suffering midterm retreats. "This president, based on his speech last week, is taking the opposite approach," said Michael Waldman, a speechwriter for President Bill Clinton who heads New York University's Brennan Center for Justice. "The 2006 election was as close to a referendum on a president and issue as you get in our constitutional system. So for the president to move to escalate, it's very dramatic."

While recognizing differences over Iraq, Bush does aim to make progress with Democrats on domestic policy. The four main issues he will emphasize -- health care, immigration, energy and education -- are closer to Democratic priorities than issues in some past State of the Union addresses. And Bush tried to send a signal on the eve of the speech by accepting an invitation to address the House Democratic retreat in Williamsburg on Feb. 3.

"They're going to focus on issues and themes where they think they can get bipartisan cooperation," said Cesar Conda, former domestic policy adviser to Vice President Cheney. "It's a big difference from before, when he had a Republican Congress and the big issues would have been making the tax cuts permanent and reforming the tax code. It's a change in tone and focus. He's got to deal with the reality of a Democratic Congress."

Some of Bush's domestic discussion will sound familiar. He plans to repeat his call to overhaul immigration laws and allow illegal immigrants to become guest workers, an idea that may find more favor among Democrats than it did with Republicans last year. He plans to call for the extension of his No Child Left Behind education program, with modifications to make it more flexible, but will not ask Congress to expand it to high school as he did in the past.

The White House has previewed two new health-care proposals that will be in the speech. The first would make employer-provided health-care benefits taxable income after a deduction of $15,000 for families and $7,500 for singles. Officials said the plan would increase taxes for 30 million families whose benefits are worth more than the deduction but would provide a tax break to the vast majority of families with employer coverage as well as to 17 million people who purchase insurance on their own. The program would begin in 2009 and cost the government during its first years of operation but pay for itself by 2018, they said.

Bush also wants to redirect spending from Medicare, Medicaid and other federal programs toward new grants to help states ensure that everyone has access to affordable basic health insurance, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said yesterday. Leavitt did not specify a cost but said the new program would spur efforts already underway in states such as Massachusetts and California to provide coverage to people without health insurance.

The main uncertainty is what Bush will say about energy and the environment. Amid much talk about climate change and energy security, the president and his aides have promised unspecified "bold" ideas. Officials have ruled out binding caps on emissions of greenhouse gases, despite support among Democrats and some corporate executives who came to Washington yesterday. But they told allies that Bush will advance ideas for greatly expanding ethanol as an alternative to oil, and some insiders expect changes in fuel efficiency standards for vehicles.

President Faces Skeptical Public (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush tonight gets another shot at persuading Americans to support his Iraq war strategy and domestic agenda. His problem: Much of the public has stopped listening to him.

IN THE POLLS

· Graphic: Bush's approval ratings across multiple polls1

· See poll results2 (Adobe Acrobat required)

A new Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll on the eve of Mr. Bush's State of the Union address underscores the extent to which he has lost the nation's ear. Just 22% of Americans say they want the president to set policy for the country, 27% express confidence in his goals, and 28% approve his handling of the Iraq war.

Only one third of Americans rate Mr. Bush highly for being "honest and straightforward." That is down from half at the start of his second term two years ago. Two-thirds say his performance in office is unlikely to get better in his last two years as president.

"What he faces is an extremely skeptical audience," says Democratic pollster Peter Hart, who helps conduct the Journal/NBC poll. The findings, adds his Republican counterpart Bill McInturff, suggest "little capacity for movement on his major policy initiatives, especially Iraq."

Mr. Bush hopes to overcome that skepticism with a series of eye-catching ideas on domestic policy, particularly on health care and energy. His health-care plan -- outlined over the weekend -- focuses on overhauling the tax code to make health insurance more accessible to people not covered through employers. His energy plan likely will feature a big proposed increase in the use of alternative fuels like ethanol and a revamping of fuel-efficiency standards for passenger cars, as well as greater acknowledgment of the problem of global warming.

Still, the president has had a tough time breaking through. This month Mr. Bush spoke to the nation outlining plans to increase U.S. troop strength in Iraq, and the poll shows he failed to shift public opinion in his direction. Just one in four Americans calls it "an acceptable outcome" to increase U.S. troops now and keep them in Iraq until that nation becomes a stable democracy.

One reason: Majorities of men and women, of whites and nonwhites, of all ages, income groups and regions of the country, say the president's new Iraq strategy will make "very little difference" or none at all in securing Iraq. Though Mr. Bush has steadfastly resisted any timetable for U.S. withdrawal from Iraq, a 65% majority wants U.S. troops to leave within the next year.

"America has come to a public judgment on Iraq: Wrap it up," Mr. Hart says. The telephone survey of 1,007 adults was conducted Jan. 17-20 and has a margin of error of plus or minus 3.1 percentage points.

The president -- despite an overall approval rating standing at just 35%, while 60% disapprove -- has offered no indication of bending to that judgment. Instead, he has reiterated his intention to proceed in the face of opposition not only from Democrats, now the majority in Congress, but from an increasing number of his fellow Republicans. The survey shows Mr. Bush and his Republican allies on solid ground with rank-and-file Americans on at least one point: opposition to any legislative blocking of funds for U.S. troops in Iraq.

So while a 65% majority of Americans say the president should abandon his planned troop increase if Congress passes a nonbinding resolution against it, Americans oppose by 52%-41% congressional attempts to stop Mr. Bush by cutting off funds. Democratic lawmakers have been juggling that issue: Leaders insist they won't stop funding troops in the field, but some senators and House members seek restrictions such as caps on the number of troops in Iraq.

Both Journal/NBC pollsters say Mr. Bush may be able to improve his standing by accommodating his reduced stature and the loss of his Republican congressional majorities with a revamped policy agenda. To some degree, the White House has signaled plans to attempt just that.

Tonight, the president will tout a health-care initiative designed to expand coverage with new deductions for Americans seeking insurance on their own, financed by taxes on some generous employer provided health plans. That emphasis tracks the findings in the Journal/NBC poll showing health costs as Americans' foremost economic concern, and the number of Americans without health insurance as atop respondents' list of disturbing conditions in the country -- ahead of declining morals, illegal immigration, sub-par schools or outsize CEO compensation.

Mr. Bush's higher target for renewable fuels jibes with Democrats' stated aims. A U.S. diplomat held out hope that the higher renewable fuels standard also would create a steady demand for agricultural products that will keep prices high and hold down U.S. subsidies, thereby helping satisfy international demands in the Doha round of trade talks.

Many of the new White House domestic initiatives have features that appeal to Democrats, yet the Journal/NBC poll makes clear that Americans have little expectation that Mr. Bush will work effectively with his political adversaries on Capitol Hill. Just 37% expect the president to "strike the right balance" in dealing with the Democratic Congress, while 50% predict he will be "too inflexible."

The survey underscored the message of last November's midterm elections: that Americans are increasingly open to Democratic leadership. A 57% majority wants Congress rather than the White House setting policy for the country; by 42% to 15%, Americans say Democrats could bring "the right kind of change" to the country rather than the wrong kind, though 39% don't expect much change either way.

In the broadest gauge of the two parties' images, Americans rate Democrats favorably, 42%-30%, while Republicans are rated negatively, 44%-33%. On specific issues, Americans say they prefer the Democratic approach by a double-digit margin on issues such as Social Security, energy, and the federal deficit.

Florida Legislators Split On Bush's Effectiveness (FLTODAY)

By Larry Wheeler

Florida Today, January 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120529

Florida lawmakers differ on whether President Bush heads into his sixth State of the Union address in a position to dictate the terms of his final two years in office or so weakened by events that it doesn't much matter what he says.

"This is the president of the United States, the most powerful man in the world," said Rep. Allen Boyd, Jr., a Tallahassee Democrat. "But his political capital is certainly not what it was two years ago. That creates some different dynamics for him."

The once-swaggering Bush has admitted he made mistakes in Iraq.

His policies and low approval ratings contributed to the Republicans' loss of Congress in last year's elections.

Bush's plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq was met with broad public skepticism and outright opposition from some in his own party.

A lot has not gone right for Bush, which puts him on the defensive as he delivers his annual address Tuesday night to a joint session of Congress.

"It's going to be a challenge," said Rep. Tom Feeney, a conservative Republican whose district includes part of Florida's Space Coast. "A new, freshly elected president can establish an agenda. But in the last quarter of an eight-year term with the country in a war that has not gone according to plan and your poll numbers in tough shape . . . you are basically responding, as opposed to creating an agenda."

Feeney made it clear he supports Bush and his troop increase if the troops sent to fight insurgents disrupt the lines of support coming over the border from Iran and Syria.

Despite the prevailing political winds, some rank-and-file Florida conservatives remain supportive of the president.

Rep. Jeff Miller, a Republican who represents the Pensacola Bay Area, home to many active duty and retired military, praised Bush's troop "surge"strategy and anticipated hearing more about it from Bush during the State of the Union address.

"I imagine the last thing the insurgents expected to hear from President Bush after the November elections was an increase or a troop surge," said Miller, who has not wavered in his support for the president. "It shows a clear resolve that the United States is serious."

Sen. Mel Martinez, an Orlando Republican, believes Bush's troop surge strategy has put the president on the offensive.

"This is the best way for him to continue to be relevant over the next two years," Martinez said.

Last week, Martinez was elected general chairman of the Republican Party by the Republican National Committee. Bush handpicked Martinez for the post, which will make the Cuban-American senator the voice of the GOP.

Florida's senior senator, Orlando Democrat Bill Nelson, declined to speculate on whether Bush will speak to the nation Tuesday from a weakened position or one of renewed vigor.

"I don't know the answer to that right now," Nelson said after emerging from a White House briefing with National Security Advisor Stephen Hadley. "The war has not been going successfully. It is my hope that it will, but in order for that to occur, the (Iraqi) government has got to start reaching out and brining Sunni and Shiite together."

State Of The Union From Rostrum To Reality: How Past Pledges Played Out (WSJ)

By Megan Ballinger

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

The Constitution requires presidents to deliver their appraisal of the nation's health and well-being to Congress once a year, and President Bush will give the third address of his second term Tuesday night, touting accomplishments thus far in his presidency and laying out his agenda to the American people.

The Wall Street Journal Online took a look back at some of the vows -- both memorable and now-obscure -- that President Bush has made in his State of the Union addresses, to see whether they made it from the rostrum to reality.

2006: Iraq, energy, health care

On Iraq: "Fellow citizens, we are in this fight to win, and we are winning. The road of victory is the road that will take our troops home. As we make progress on the ground, and Iraqi forces increasingly take the lead, we should be able to further decrease our troop levels."

After perhaps the bloodiest year for both American troops and Iraqis since the 2003 invasion, the strategy in Iraq has shifted dramatically -- as has the language used to discuss the conflict. "Stay the course" is out, while "the way forward" is in.

Support among Americans and their representatives in Congress hit lows as the country spiraled toward a sectarian civil war and kidnappings and killings made daily headlines. Just after the midterm elections, in which voter anger about the war helped Democrats retake control of the House and Senate, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld was pushed out. The Iraq Study Group report, released in December, provided both a searing critique of the administration's policies and a bleak picture of how bad the situation really is. Conceding in an address earlier this month1,"Where mistakes have been made, the responsibility rests with me," Mr. Bush acknowledged a litany of American failures and announced plans to send at least 20,000 more troops to Iraq.

On energy: "America is addicted to oil, which is often imported from unstable parts of the world. The best way to break this addiction is through technology. To change how we power our homes and offices, we will invest more in zero-emission coal-fired plants; revolutionary solar and wind technologies; and clean, safe nuclear energy. We will increase our research in better batteries for hybrid and electric cars, and in pollution-free cars that run on hydrogen."

While Mr. Bush has talked a great deal in recent months about cleaner energies and finding alternatives to oil, he continues to be widely criticized by environmentalists for failing to back his rhetoric with enough government action -- either increasing spending or instituting tougher regulations to cut pollution. His resistance in particular to federal limits on greenhouse gases has left him at odds with some business leaders who have come to endorse stronger federal action. The CEOs of General Motors, Ford Motor and DaimlerChrysler's Chrysler Group pledged after an autumn meeting with Mr. Bush to make 50% of their new vehicles capable of running on alternative fuel by 2012. With Democrats in control of Congress, energy and environmental initiatives are gaining speed. The administration also is pursuing a strategy of encouraging technological innovation -- instead of regulation and mandated caps -- to reduce overall carbon-dioxide emissions. In December, officials announced the awarding of $1 billion in tax credits to nine companies to develop cleaner coal-burning power plants around the U.S.

On health care: "For all Americans, we must confront the rising cost of care… and help people afford the insurance coverage they need. We will strengthen health savings accounts -- by making sure individuals and small business employees can buy insurance with the same advantages that people working for big businesses now get."

Early in 2006, health care was at the top of the president's domestic agenda, as evidenced by a spate of speeches. His health-care proposals included providing bigger tax breaks for health-savings accounts, or HSAs, and making hospitals' and doctors' prices available to consumers. The president has followed through on both. In August, Mr. Bush issued an executive order requiring federal agencies to disclose the quality and cost of care provided to Medicare beneficiaries, federal employees, the military and veterans -- a group that includes one-fourth of all Americans. And in December, he signed a bill that increased the tax-free contributions many people are allowed to make each year to their HSAs. Still, with these changes attracting little attention, the president is expected to propose further and more dramatic changes in his last two years in office, such as a tax code change making it easier for consumers to buy health care on the open market, instead of relying on employers for coverage. * * *

2005: Social Security, peace in the Middle East, and immigration

On Social Security: "We must make Social Security permanently sound, not leave that task for another day. We must not jeopardize our economic strength by increasing payroll taxes."

In his first news conference after his re-election, President Bush declared: "We'll start on Social Security now." And the program was a centerpiece of his first post-reelection State of the Union address. But after a year of hard campaigning, the president acknowledged that reform plans had died. Mr. Bush's vision was that American workers would divert some Social Security payroll taxes to personal retirement accounts, assuming more of the responsibility and risk themselves. Democrats vehemently opposed any privatization, while Mr. Bush's party faced deep divisions of its own. A series of stump speeches across the country in 2005 did little to rally the public, as other crises, both at home and abroad, helped lessen any sense of urgency. When asked in October 2005 how the president could get his plan back on track, one senator responded: "Get the Gulf Coast rebuilt and get the troops out of Iraq." Mr. Bush has said he plans to revive his efforts at a later point in his presidency. With Democrats now in control of Congress, there's speculation that he may have to meet their price for coming to the bargaining table: dropping his goal of letting workers create private retirement accounts. If he doesn't, it is virtually certain that nothing will happen on the issue he has called the top domestic priority of his second term.

On peace in the Middle East: "To promote peace in the broader Middle East, we must confront regimes that continue to harbor terrorists and pursue weapons of mass murder. Syria still allows its territory, and parts of Lebanon, to be used by terrorists who seek to destroy every chance of peace in the region…. Iran remains the world's primary state sponsor of terror, pursuing nuclear weapons..."

In the Middle East, the Bush administration made strides in 2005, though some hot zones remained to be defused and have since become even more volatile. Elections in Egypt, Iraq and Gaza in the year after Mr. Bush's speech were among high points in the process toward democracy in the region, though none was without controversy or smatterings of violence. Pakistan has recently strengthened ties with the U.S., working with American soldiers to hunt al Qaeda fugitives, but a January 2006 deadly airstrike in that nation drew criticism.

Syria and Iran still are trouble spots. The Bush administration has taken a sharp tone with Syria, threatening to bring Damascus before the U.N. Security Council for international censure if the government refuses to cooperate with a probe into the assassination of Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri. But now, in exchange for cooperation on Iraq, Syria may ask the international community to drop the inquiry. Meanwhile, the U.S. is encouraging the other members of the Security Council to impose sanctions on Iran for its refusal to suspend its nuclear programs.

On immigration: "We should not be content with laws that punish hardworking people who want only to provide for their families, and deny businesses willing workers, and invite chaos at our border. It is time for an immigration policy that permits temporary guest workers to fill jobs Americans will not take, that rejects amnesty, that tells us who is entering and leaving our country, and that closes the border to drug dealers and terrorists."

Legislation on immigration has been slow-moving, despite Republicans' hopes that it would give them a boost in the 2006 congressional elections. Throughout 2005 and 2006, Mr. Bush rolled out specifics of his ideas, which include both an expansion of the guest worker program and a renewed emphasis on border security. The administration hoped to get big business in its corner, pushing Congress to pass measures that give more foreign-born workers legal status. On the national security front, the president laid out a series of steps aimed at closing gaps in enforcement, including expansion of a program where Mexicans caught illegally crossing the border are returned to their hometowns instead of just to the other side of the line. Since December 2005, the House and Senate have passed starkly different immigration bills. The Republican-proposed House bill calls for a fence along the border and makes illegal immigration a felony; it currently is a misdemeanor. The Senate bill, which attracted more support from Democrats than Republicans, would let most illegal immigrants stay in the U.S. after paying fines and back taxes. Congressional negotiators never met to iron out their differences, and the issue remains at a stalemate. * * *

2004: Patriot Act and gay marriage

On the Patriot Act: "Key provisions of the Patriot Act are set to expire next year. The terrorist threat will not expire on that schedule. Our law enforcement needs this vital legislation to protect our citizens. You need to renew the Patriot Act."

The Patriot Act was a big issue in the 2004 election season -- and as such, little legislative headway was made in renewing it that year. In late December 2005, facing a Dec. 31 deadline, lawmakers agreed to extend the antiterrorism law for five weeks, setting the new expiration date for 16 provisions of the law for Feb. 3, 2006. Democrats pushed for changes to better protect civil liberties and privacy of average Americans, and furor over White House wiretapping of some U.S. citizens made it seem as if major changes would have to be affected, but in March, 2006, the full Senate voted to renew the Patriot Act, by an 89-10 roll call, with only cosmetic amendments.

On gay marriage: "Activist judges … have begun redefining marriage by court order, without regard for the will of the people and their elected representatives. On an issue of such great consequence, the people's voice must be heard. If judges insist on forcing their arbitrary will upon the people, the only alternative left to the people would be the constitutional process. Our nation must defend the sanctity of marriage."

Gay marriage was a cultural flashpoint of the 2004 election, and these lines were manna for Mr. Bush's socially conservative base. But the issue has received scant attention since then, aside from mentions amid the vetting of Chief Justice John Roberts and fellow justice Samuel Alito. Both men were reluctant to discuss specifics of their stances during Senate hearings, though neither is expected to be supportive of gay marriage. Push for a constitutional amendment, though, seems to have died down: Some prominent Republicans have made it known that they don't support an amendment, and many states have already passed ballot measures limiting the definition of marriage, making the need for a federal amendment less urgent in the eyes of many conservatives. In the 2006 elections, gay-marriage bans passed in seven states, but Arizonans defeated such a ban. * * *

2003: Health care and the environment

On health care: "Health-care reform must begin with Medicare; Medicare is the binding commitment of a caring society. We must renew that commitment by giving seniors access to preventive medicine and new drugs that are transforming health care in America. My budget will commit an additional $400 billion over the next decade to reform and strengthen Medicare."

Congress passed the huge Medicare prescription-drug benefit in 2003 but the legislation represented the biggest expansion of a federal entitlement program in a generation and will be considerably more expensive than originally estimated. The voluntary benefit went into effect on Jan. 1, 2006, covering the prescription-drug expenses of some 11 million low-income elderly and disabled Americans. Although the program's launch was marred by bureaucratic glitches, befuddled senior citizens, frustrated pharmacists and physicians, and experts asserting it should have been set up differently, critics' worst fears haven't materialized. More than 90% of Medicare beneficiaries have drug coverage, and costs are below initial estimates.

On the environment: "I have sent you Clear Skies legislation that mandates a 70% cut in air pollution from power plants over the next 15 years. I have sent you a Healthy Forests Initiative, to help prevent the catastrophic fires that devastate communities, kill wildlife, and burn away millions of acres of treasured forest."

In March 2005, the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee deadlocked in a 9-9 vote and failed to pass Mr. Bush's "Clear Skies" on to the full Senate. Since then, the president has called a few times for its renewal, but action has been slow. Some Republicans in the business community have tried to distance themselves from efforts to roll back clean-air rules and the Endangered Species Act. Meanwhile, liberal critics have mocked the Clear Skies plan, calling it patronage for Bush campaign fundraisers in the energy business and a loosening of pollution regulations. The Healthy Forests Act passed in 2003. * * *

2002: Defense and trade

On defense: "We will work closely with our coalition to deny terrorists and their state sponsors the materials, technology, and expertise to make and deliver weapons of mass destruction. We will develop and deploy effective missile defenses to protect America and our allies from sudden attack."

The Bush administration decided to invade Iraq in the spring of 2003 because of perceived threat represented by Saddam Hussein's stockpiles of weapons of mass destruction. But those weapons never materialized, and U.S. troops remain in Iraq despite three successful elections there in 2005. Libya voluntarily disarmed and a black-market ring for nuclear materials headed up by a former top Pakistani scientist was broken up, but other successes have proved harder to come by. As Iran refuses to abandon its nuclear program, the U.S. is pushing to isolate Iran's economy, but Tehran shows no signs of backing down. The U.S. also remains wary of North Korea's nuclear intentions. Missile defense is still a touchy subject. Many critics don't see the need for it, calling the program a vestige of the Cold War that should be mothballed to beef up spending on other more pressing defense and homeland-security needs.

On trade: "Good jobs depend on expanded trade. Selling into new markets creates new jobs, so I ask Congress to finally approve trade-promotion authority."

Though Mr. Bush won back trade-promotion authority, which gives the president greater power in negotiating agreements, his record on trade has been mixed. A package of steel tariffs designed to protect U.S. producers from foreign competitors drew criticism both inside and outside the administration and was eventually rolled back. The generous subsidies the U.S. gives its farmers have proved to be a big sticking point in international trade talks. Meanwhile, the president has sent mixed signals on the question of offshoring. During the presidential campaign, he proclaimed his eagerness to protect American jobs and muzzled a top economic adviser who suggested that the outsourcing of jobs overseas was a long-term net positive for the U.S. But he also has repeatedly called for open markets. * * *

2001: Education, taxes and faith

On education: "Children should be tested on basic reading and math skills every year between grades three and eight. Measuring is the only way to know whether all our children are learning. And I want to know, because I refuse to leave any child behind in America."

The president's No Child Left Behind plan, which relies heavily on standardized testing to measure the performance of both students and schools, became law in 2002. The legislation mandated that annual report cards be issued for schools, and that those that don't measure up provide supplemental services like tutoring programs. Parents of children at underperforming schools also have the right to transfer their children to a better school in their district. States and school districts have greater flexibility in how they spend education funds. In 2005, Mr. Bush announced a $1.5 billion "intervention fund" to improve high-school learning and graduation rates, and to extend No Child Left Behind standardized testing to high-school students.

On estate taxes: "It's not fair to tax the same earnings twice -- once when you earn them, and again when you die -- so we must repeal the death tax."

The "death tax" -- or federal estate tax -- has been a perennial target of Republican ire. The president has been successful in reducing the estate tax, but total repeal is unlikely, especially with Democrats now controlling Congress. The White House can't count on lobbying muscle from the super-rich: Many of the very wealthiest Americans whose families would benefit greatly from the vanquishing of the estate tax don't support repeal, including investment guru Warren Buffett, who says untaxed inheritances would create an "aristocracy of wealth." In 2006, a bill that paired raising the minimum wage with a cut in the estate tax passed the House, but stalled in the Senate.

On faith-based initiatives: "My budget adopts a hopeful new approach to help the poor and the disadvantaged. We must encourage and support the work of charities and faith-based and community groups that offer help and love one person at a time."

Mr. Bush's emphasis on "faith-based initiatives" was one of the major flashpoints of his first 100 days in office. Many civil libertarians and even some religious leaders called his plans a breach of the church-state divide, while conservatives embraced the idea of farming out expensive social programs to churches. John DiIulio Jr., an early leader of the president's faith program, argued in an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal that failure to support faith-based initiatives in the war on poverty was tantamount to ignoring the 14th Amendment's equal-protection clause. Congress scuttled Mr. Bush's most ambitious faith-based plans, but the president did open a "compassion capital fund" to bankroll some initiatives.

Fenty Won't Sit With Laura Bush At Speech (WP)

By Elissa Silverman

DOJ_NMG_0120533

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty has declined a White House invitation to sit with first lady Laura Bush at tonight's State of the Union address, deciding to attend the event as a guest of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

Fenty spokeswoman Carrie Brooks confirmed yesterday that the city's new mayor will sit in the gallery along with others invited by Pelosi (D-Calif.), who recently became speaker after Democrats took control of the House of Representatives.

" 'Pelosi asked us first,' " Fenty said, according to Brooks.

Although former mayor Anthony A. Williams, like Fenty, is a Democrat, Williams sat with the wife of Republican President Bush. Presidents often acknowledge guests in the VIP box during the address, and Williams was often captured on television as the cameras panned to the seats around the first lady.

During his campaign for mayor, however, Fenty pledged that he would not sit as a guest of the White House because the president had not supported the city's quest for voting representation in Congress. "He committed during the campaign not to sit in the first lady's box," Brooks said.

Fenty has the made voting rights a top priority of his administration, beginning with a call for D.C. statehood in his inaugural address.

He has lobbied Pelosi to support a bill co-sponsored by Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D-D.C.) and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) that would give the District a voting representative in the House.

Fenty will be joined by Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley (D) and his wife, Judge Katie Curran O'Malley, also invited by Pelosi, a Baltimore native. Fenty and the O'Malleys will also attend a reception in Pelosi's office suite before the address.

Fenty To Attend Speech As Pelosi's Guest (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

D.C. Mayor Adrian M. Fenty will attend tonight's State of the Union presidential address as a guest of new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, a departure from his predecessor's tradition of attending as the guest of first lady Laura Bush.

Mr. Fenty, a Democrat, had promised to watch the address from outside the first lady's viewing box at the U.S. Capitol to protest a lack of congressional voting rights for the District.

During his two terms as mayor, Anthony A. Williams, a Democrat, attended the address nearly every year as a guest of Mrs. Bush or of Hillary Rodham Clinton when she was first lady.

"I view it as an invitation to the mayor in his capacity as mayor of the District, as opposed to a personal invitation," Mr. Williams said. "The District should be represented in the halls of Congress for the State of the Union. That's how I always saw it."

It was not clear yesterday whether Mrs. Bush had extended an invitation to Mr. Fenty.

Officials in Mrs. Bush's White House press office said the list of those invited to attend the speech with the first lady would not be released until today, and Fenty officials could not confirm whether Mrs. Bush had invited the new mayor.

Pelosi spokesman Drew Hammill said Mr. Fenty would attend as a guest of the House's new speaker, a California Democrat.

Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Fenty have met to discuss voting rights and other D.C. issues that will come before Congress.

Mrs. Pelosi and Mr. Fenty "met shortly after her election as speaker to discuss a number of issues with respect to the District," Mr. Hammill said. "They came out of that meeting agreeing to work closely together on the District's priorities."

An invitation to watch the address with the first lady is part recent tradition, part honor for the District's chief executive.

Nelson F. Rimensnyder, a historian and former research director for the House Committee on the District of Columbia, said the practice of inviting guests to the address took on a grander meaning during the administration of President Reagan, who often singled out his invitees for honor during the speech.

"My recollection is it's a more recent thing, the mayors' being regularly invited to sit in on the State of the Union," Mr. Rimensnyder said. "Particularly of course, Tony Williams was invited all the time."

D.C. Council member Marion Barry could not recall yesterday whether he was invited or had attended the annual address while he was mayor, his spokesman said.

Mr. Fenty's attendance as Mrs. Pelosi's guest does represent a contrast between himself and Mr. Williams.

The former mayor has been criticized for not being more aggressive in advancing D.C. voting rights and not mobilizing more energetic efforts for the cause, although he did advocate for the issue during speeches both home and abroad.

Mr. Fenty said in his Jan. 3 inaugural address that "our goal is to become the 51st state." He has met with members of Congress about D.C. voting rights and is spearheading several initiatives, such as a lobbying day in February and a march in April, to further highlight the cause.

Mr. Fenty also has pledged to aggressively push for passage of the D.C. Voting Rights Act, a measure introduced by Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, a Democrat who serves as the District's nonvoting representative in Congress, and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III, Virginia Republican, that would give the District a House vote and also add a seat in the House for Utah.

Pelosi Lures Cameras to the Speaker's Box

The party's not over! Newly minted House Speaker Nancy Pelosi will not only sit behind President Bush at tonight's State of the Union address, but she's filling the normally staid speaker's box with a cluster of political stars.

Many of Pelosi's guests, who will sit in 21 balcony seats, will be past and present celebs of the Democratic Party: former speakers Jim Wright and Tom Foley, Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and Washington's Adrian Fenty. Pelosi also invited two of the more influential 9/11 widows, Carrie Lemack and Mary Fetchet, and the wives of the Joint Chiefs of Staff chairman and vice chairman, Lynne Pace and Cindy Giambastiani.

Ronald Reagan began the tradition of inviting special guests, who sat with the first lady and were introduced at key moments in the address. Last year, an injured Iraq war veteran, Air Force Sgt. Jamie Dana (with her dog and former military partner, Rex), sat with Laura Bush. The speaker's box, by contrast, hardly merited a glance -- except in 1997, when conservatives blasted Newt Gingrich for inviting Jesse Jackson to sit in his box.

This is the second time this month Pelosi made the seats a camera magnet: Richard Gere and Tony Bennett sat there for her Jan. 4 swearing-in ceremony. No word who else might pop up, but Lynne Cheney-- who sat in the speaker's box in the past few years -- will move on over to the first lady's this year.The Million-Dollar Set, With Reason to Celebrate

If you're a young, talented actor-director trolling for a patron who loves the theater -- well, there was only one party to crash Saturday night: the "Happy Ever After Gala" at Signature Theatre's new digs in Arlington. (Signature's Artistic Director Eric Schaeffer was your basic starving artist 17 years ago.) The black-tie bash celebrated the company's new space, new production of Stephen Sondheim's"Into the Woods" and folks who made it all possible, especially the big-three couples who throw serious bucks to the arts in Washington.

Maxine Isaacs and Jim Johnson (major donors to the Kennedy Center) gave the first $1 million for the new quarters, so the Max Theatre is named after her. Gilbert and Jaylee Mead (who recently gave $35 million to Arena Stage) also gave $1 million, and their names grace the theater lobby. And Arlene and Robert Kogod (they donated $25 million for the new glass roof on the Old Patent Office Building) wrote a check for $3 million, and both the entrance lobby and smaller Ark Theatre bear their monikers. Unlike MCI . . . er, Verizon Center, these names won't change.THIS JUST IN . . .

Sen. Jim Webb To Rebut State Of The Union (CSM)

By Gail Russell Chaddock

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2007

When President Bush gave his 2006 State of the Union speech, Jim Webb hadn't yet decided to run for the US Senate. But he had no doubts about the war in Iraq, which he called "the greatest strategic blunder in modern times."

Tuesday night, Senator Webb is giving the Democratic response to this year's State of the Union – an unusually high profile for a freshman. But no Democrat in the Congress is more primed to talk on the No. 1 issue in congressional politics: the endgame in Iraq.

"We have never clearly defined what a win is – never, not since 2002," says Webb, on a brisk walk through the Capitol basement after President Bush announced an increase of 21,500 troops in Iraq. One of them will be Webb's son, Jimmy, whose Marine unit has just been extended for an additional 60 days in Iraq.

A decorated combat marine, Webb knows – and can articulate – the human face of war with an authority that is rare on Capitol Hill. As a company commander in the An Hoa Basin during the Vietnam War – the setting of his first of six bestselling novels, "Fields of Fire" – he was awarded the Navy Cross for exceptional heroism, three medals and two purple hearts. He dedicated that 1978 book to "the 100,000 Marines who became casualties in Vietnam. And for the others who became casualties upon their return."

As a law student at Georgetown University Law Center, Webb represented and later cleared the name of a marine convicted of war crimes in Vietnam, three years after his suicide. With the House Committee on Veterans Affairs from 1977 to 1981, he became the first Vietnam veteran to serve as a committee counsel on Capitol Hill. In 1987, President Reagan appointed Webb to be secretary of the Navy, but he resigned in 1988 over deep budget cuts that the Congress mandated for the Navy.

"The fact that he's a longtime Republican, until his recent conversion, plus his war-hero status, plus a strong association with Ronald Reagan, plus the fact that he delivered the Senate to the Democrats on the issue of Iraq – it makes him the logical choice for the Democrats," says Larry Sabato, a political scientist at the University of Virginia.

Democratic leaders who tapped Webb for his prime-time assignment describe him as "a new voice in a new Congress." "He's also a combat veteran who understands personally how important it is to find a new direction in Iraq and begin to bring the war to a close," said Senate majority leader Harry Reid.

Once a reluctant campaigner

A reluctant campaigner, Webb was once the first person out the door at a campaign event in Arlington, Va., that he was headlining. But he is settling into his role in the Senate, where he often sits through oversight hearings on the war from start to finish – a practice typically rare for anyone but the committee chairman.

"I'm impressed. He was the only one who stayed the whole time... Senator Webb and [Chairman Joseph] Biden," says Marjorie Lasky, a war protester from Berkeley, Calif., who sat near the front row of recent Senate hearings. "I hope he stays right on top of this war."

For Webb, the key to getting out of Iraq is for the Bush administration to "aggressively deal with the situation in a regional context," he says. "If we do that, we get our combat troops out, and we can still address the war against international terrorism. We can help increase the stability of the region, and we can deal with our strategic interests elsewhere. That's how you define a win."

Webb's tough questions

His committee assignments on the Senate Armed Services Committee and Foreign Relations Committee give him a platform to raise these issues, even though his position at the bottom of the seniority rankings usually leaves him the last to speak.

At a Jan. 11 hearing of the Foreign Relations Committee, he challenged Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to "more actively engage" in diplomatic efforts in the Middle East. "There are many, including myself, who warned that invading and occupying Iraq would in fact empower Iran, and that has become a reality," he said. Then, he asked: "Is it the position of this administration that it possesses the authority to take unilateral action against Iran in the absence of a direct threat without congressional approval?" Ms. Rice said that she would answer in writing.

Aides say he does much of his own research to prepare for hearings and develops his own questions. He generally reads at least four hours a day, aides say. "That's what he hated the most about campaigning – losing time to read," says Webb spokeswoman Jessica Smith.

Aides say he is drafting his own response to the State of the Union, working mainly in the evenings, although Democratic leaders will have a say in the final language.

While he's not one of those senators who seeks television lights – or print journalists, for that matter – like a heat seeking missile, he is clearly warming to the job. "It's a great time to be in the Senate," he says.

Ramrod straight and typically no- nonsense, Webb had a brief, much-reported skirmish with President Bush at a White House reception last year. When Mr. Bush asked after his son, Webb replied: "I'd like to get them out of Iraq, Mr. President." Pressed again, "How's your boy?", Webb said: "That's between me and my boy, Mr. President."

Bush's Speech To Push Health Insurance Plan (USAT)

By Richard Wolf And David Jackson

USA Today, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush will use Tuesday night's State of the Union address to begin a new effort to reduce the number of Americans without health insurance and try to capitalize on state innovations.

Bush's plan would financially reward states that make basic private policies more widely available. Already, more than a dozen states from Massachusetts to California have proposed expanding private health insurance, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt said Monday.

The president's plan would not involve any new federal money. It would redirect some of the $30 billion the government spends annually to care for people without health insurance who show up at hospitals and emergency rooms.

The administration expects opposition from Democrats, particularly those who favor a system of government-subsidized health insurance. "I have not seen anything in health care to which there was not objection," Leavitt said.

There are 47 million Americans without health insurance. Groups representing business and consumers last week endorsed a renewed effort to get them covered. "There is real, tangible movement toward that objective right now, for the first time," Leavitt said.

A number of states have taken steps recently to cover more uninsured residents, particularly children. They include Massachusetts, California, Illinois, Pennsylvania, New York, Arkansas, Indiana, Michigan, Texas, New Jersey, Missouri, Washington, Oregon, Louisiana, Tennessee, Connecticut and Vermont.

Democrats such as Rep. Pete Stark of California have questioned another Bush plan to offer standard deductions for health insurance — $7,500 for individuals, $15,000 for families — while subjecting employer-paid health insurance to income taxes. Rep. Jim McCrery of Louisiana, top Republican on the House Ways and Means Committee, has fielded complaints from some Republicans who call the plan a tax increase.

White House officials said the proposed changes to the tax code represent "reform," not tax hikes. "We think about it as tax reform that levels the playing field and provides a basic, standard benefit to all Americans," White House spokesman Tony Fratto said.

Of all taxpayers who get health insurance from their employers, about 20% face the prospect of paying higher taxes. They can adjust their health coverage.

"This is revenue-neutral tax reform," said Katherine Baicker of the Council of Economic Advisers. "There are always going to be some winners and losers, but the people who might initially be losers have options."

Bush's Health Plan: Tax Breaks To Uninsured (MH)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Miami Herald, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush will propose deep tax breaks for Americans who purchase their own medical insurance and would finance the plan with an unprecedented tax on a portion of high-priced healthcare plans that workers receive from their employers, according to the White House.

The initiative, which the president briefly previewed in his radio address Saturday, has a dual purpose: It would create a financial incentive for the estimated 46 million to 48 million Americans who lack health insurance to buy it. And it would rein in the soaring cost of health insurance by encouraging workers in high-priced plans to seek more modest coverage.

"Today, the tax code unfairly penalizes people who do not get health insurance through their job," Bush said. ``It unwisely encourages workers to choose overly expensive, gold-plated plans. The result is that insurance premiums rise and many Americans cannot afford the coverage they need."

The proposal, which Bush plans to fully unveil in Tuesday's State of the Union address, marks a sharp departure for a president who has been criticized for advocating tax cuts that disproportionately benefit higher-income Americans.

Administration officials familiar with the plan say it reflects the new political order in Washington, where Democrats now control both chambers of Congress.

They refuse to characterize the plan as a tax increase because it raises no new money for the federal government.

Instead, it would add a new tax on employer-provided healthcare plans worth more than $15,000 to subsidize those who buy modestly priced plans out of their pockets.

In addition, they say, the plan is consistent with Bush's idea of increasing access to health insurance through the private market while encouraging people to be more cost conscious as they purchase medical-care coverage.

In his speech Tuesday night, the president will also propose increasing the federal assistance to states that make private healthcare plans available to low-income or chronically unhealthy people who are uninsured.

The administration hopes to provide waivers under Medicaid -- the government health insurance program for the poor that is jointly funded by the federal government and the states -- to allow states to redirect money from hospitals and nursing homes to individuals to help them buy health insurance.

Some states already are moving to offer healthcare coverage to the uninsured. In California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger recently announced a plan to provide coverage to about 6.5 million people, including many recent immigrants, who are uninsured. If the plan is approved by the state legislature, California would become the fourth state -- along with Massachusetts, Vermont and Maine -- to offer near universal health insurance.

Taken together, Bush's proposals are his most ambitious attempt to address the healthcare crisis. In the past, Bush had pushed for limited tax breaks to help people buy health insurance, but those initiatives never gained traction. He has also advocated health savings accounts, consumer-driven plans with higher deductibles and lower premiums than those in traditional insurance.

The new tax measure would attempt to roughly equalize the benefits of people who have health insurance, regardless of whether they buy it or receive it from employers.

NEW TAX RULES

Currently, the 17 million Americans covered by health plans that they purchased out of pocket receive no federal tax break for the expenditure.

Meanwhile, the estimated 150 million people covered by employer-provided health insurance are not taxed on the value of their health insurance, regardless of how much it is worth. The average employer-provided family health insurance plan costs $11,500 a year, administration officials said -- three times what it cost 19 years ago.

Under Bush's proposal, workers who receive employer-provided health insurance would have to pay a tax on the cost of their benefit above $15,000, the threshold he proposes for the tax break.

For instance, if a person's health insurance costs $16,000, he would pay a tax on the $1,000 difference. People with families who buy low-cost policies, meanwhile, would have their taxable income reduced by $15,000, regardless of the cost of the plans and whether they itemize deductions on their tax returns. The deduction would be $7,500 for single individuals. The deduction, to be indexed to account for inflation, would also be extended to those with employer-provided plans, to be offset by the cost of their coverage.

"This is a huge incentive for the uninsured to get coverage, but, also, the vast majority of people with employer-provided coverage will benefit as well," a senior administration official said. The Bush administration estimates that 80 percent of people with employer-provided plans would see their tax liability fall because the deduction would be larger than the value of their insurance plans.

The idea of ending the taxpayer subsidy for what some in the health industry call "Cadillac health insurance" policies and using the savings to subsidize insurance for those who do not have it has been around for at least two decades, experts said.

Underlying the idea is the belief that the current tax structure essentially adds to the inflationary pressure on healthcare by subsidizing expensive healthcare plans, making coverage even more unaffordable for those who do not have it.

BIPARTISAN APPEAL

But now may be an interesting moment to resurrect the idea because the new Democratic Congress has vowed not to initiate any new programs that cannot pay for themselves.

Moreover, the idea of imposing a tax on those with generous coverage to help those without it has a progressive cast that could appeal to Democrats.

"It is being proposed by a Republican, but it's kind of a Democrat idea," said Robert Laszewski, a health policy consultant. ``It should be something that will interest a lot of Democrats."

Still, some leading Democrats are skeptical of the plan. "It is good that the president is finally talking about healthcare," said Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., chairman of the Senate committee that oversees healthcare matters. ``I question, however, why the president thinks the way to solve this problem is through the tax code."

Bush Insurance Plan Gets Cold Reception (AP)

By Kevin Freking

AP, January 23, 2007

President Bush's proposed tax deduction for health insurance appears to be shaping up as a tough sell in the Democratic Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0120538

Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif., said Monday that the tax changes, which Bush is expected to promote in Tuesday night's State of the Union address, would encourage employers to stop providing health insurance.

"Under the guise of tax breaks, the president is pursuing a policy designed to destroy the employer-based health care system through which 160 million people receive coverage," the lawmaker said.

Stark, who oversees a key House Ways and Means subcommittee, said he would not consider holding hearings on the proposal, which includes a trade-off. Contributions from employers toward health insurance would begin to be treated as taxable income. At the same time, a standard deduction for taxpayers with health insurance would be set at $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals.

The White House says that 80 percent of workers with health insurance through their jobs would see a tax cut as a result of the change. But about 20 percent would see a tax increase — those workers whose health insurance cost more than the standard deduction.

The change in tax policy is one of two major health proposals announced by Bush last weekend. The other would take some federal money now going to hospitals and other facilities and give it to states for programs to reduce the number of uninsured.

Insurers said the tax proposal would mostly help the nearly 17 million people who buy coverage through the individual or small group market. Their ranks include real estate agents, consultants and employees of small businesses that don't offer health coverage. Also benefiting would be those in newer industries where the workers tend to be younger and the health coverage is more basic, such as technology.

Meanwhile, many state employees, teachers, and older workers in such established industries as automobile and steel manufacturing could see their expenses go up, said Karen Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans, the insurers' trade group.

The trade group has not yet taken a position on the president's proposal. However, the insurers like the president's focus on health care going into the year.

"With the president coming forward and making health care such a major issue on his priority list, I think progress is definitely possible," Ignagni said. "We're going to see views and positions from all sides. We see that as a very promising thing. More and more people will come to the view that we've reached a tipping point."

President's Speech Will Stay Close To Home (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — As President Bush prepares to deliver his first State of the Union address to a Democratic-controlled Congress tonight, he may be at the lowest point in his six-year presidency.

Yet on domestic policy, at least, the president may have an opportunity to revive his fortunes on several fronts, including healthcare, immigration and energy policy.

What that would take is a willingness by the president to work for compromises on Capitol Hill, even at the risk of displeasing the GOP's conservative base. And it would take a Democratic leadership willing to do the same with its base.

In past years, Bush has devoted roughly half his speech to national security and the "war on terror." But with his approval ratings well below 40% — largely a result of Americans' dissatisfaction over the Iraq war — this year he is expected to give greater emphasis to domestic policy, where he has the most opportunity to find common ground with Democrats.

In 2001, Bush did reach out to opposition lawmakers in the months immediately after his election, securing passage of the No Child Left Behind education law that remains a hallmark of his domestic record. White House officials are suggesting that, despite increasing partisanship since then, Bush is once again open to compromise.

"He understands his obligation ... is to go ahead forthrightly [on] big problems and come up with solutions that not only are going to have political appeal, but they're also going to be effective in making life better for Americans," White House spokesman Tony Snow said Monday.

"When you have a Democratic Congress that came in two weeks ago saying, 'We want to get things done' — we've got some offers that [are] going to be pretty good for them."

Both sides are expected to use the speech to send signals to the other — the president with his words, and the Democrats with their applause, or lack thereof.

Forging compromises and persuading Democrats to join him in the effort will not be easy. Some analysts think it's too late for Bush to regain the confidence of Democrats — or of much of the nation.

DOJ_NMG_0120539

"People don't have confidence in him or his trustworthiness, and both of those undermine his ability to bounce back," said George C. Edwards III, a presidential scholar at Texas A&M University. "This is the lowest point in his presidency, absolutely. It's almost the time of desperation."

Bush's approval rating averaged 37% over the last year, according to the Gallup Poll — one of the lowest yearly approval ratings of any president since the organization started collecting such data during the Truman administration. A Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll released Monday put Bush's approval rating at 35%.

Those low ratings, combined with the "thumping" that Republicans took at the polls in November, mean that the president has much less political capital this year, said Thomas E. Mann, who studies White House-congressional relations at the Brookings Institution, a centrist think tank.

"The president is in an exceedingly weak position," Mann said. "He is not in a position to advance his agenda if it is any way controversial in the country or conflicts with the views of Democrats."

Bush is scheduled to deliver his speech before a joint session of Congress at 6 p.m.

A narrower focus

Some lawmakers are concerned that the shift in political fortunes — and years of pent-up Democratic frustration with GOP hardball tactics — could lead to a less-than-decorous atmosphere in the House chamber during the speech.

"I hope we won't act like children," said Senate Assistant Minority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.). "The Democrats in the House, if they're not appropriately considerate of the president of the United States, then that will agitate those of us on our side, and then we'll respond in kind, and then the American people will turn us off."

Democrats, however strongly they are feeling their oats at the moment, say they do not intend to be disruptive.

"We've always been respectful of the president, and I would assume that would continue," said Sen. Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.). "This is really his night to give us his view, and I think people generally make their views known through applause and non-applause."

White House aides said that instead of the traditional laundry list of subjects — in which the president gives at least a brief plug for the favored programs of every Cabinet department — Bush plans to focus on a few key issues.

"I just think some of the old State of the Union formulas have kind of run their course," Snow said.

This year, the speech comes just 10 days after the president delivered a prime-time address to the nation on the subject of national security, and aides say he does not intend to repeat himself. For instance, at a time of increasing tension between the Bush administration and Iran, foreign governments are likely to listen carefully to what the president says about that country and about Syria, another neighbor of Iraq.

Aside from foreign policy, aides say, Bush will concentrate his remarks on four domestic policy areas: energy, healthcare, immigration and education.

On healthcare, Bush is expected to talk in more depth about an idea he floated over the weekend: that the tax code should put a limit on how much of workers' health insurance premiums are tax deductible. The deduction cap would affect more generous healthcare plans, particularly those provided to highly paid employees and some union members.

The administration argues that while some Americans would have to pay taxes on some of their employer-provided insurance, that would make it easier for uninsured workers and the self-employed to buy coverage on the open market. The idea is opposed by the administration's major business allies, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

Bush is also expected to promote health savings accounts — as he has for years — which let workers avoid taxes on dollars they set aside to pay medical expenses.

Democrats have complained that health savings accounts primarily benefit upper-income workers, but they might be open to an expansion of the existing program if it were combined with other steps they favor.

On energy, Bush will mention global warming along with the country's "addiction" to foreign oil — a major theme of last year's address — and propose developing new technologies as the way to combat them.

"Energy and environmental policy are linked up," Snow said. "The way you do it is you encourage innovation.... Carrots work better than sticks."

In particular, Bush is expected to renew his support for a $2-billion program to spur development of alternative fuels and other technologies designed to reduce pollution from fossil fuels.

Many Democrats support development of new, environmentally friendly energy technology, though they differ with Bush on specifics. Environmental groups are demanding stronger action on global warming.

"Small steps at this point will not address the problem very significantly and we cannot accept them," said Frances Beinecke, president of the Natural Resources Defense Council.

Immigration divides GOP

On immigration, aides say Bush will reiterate his support for "comprehensive" immigration overhaul, but it remains to be seen whether he will specify what that means.

In the last two years, Bush has used his annual address to Congress to sketch out core elements — better border security, improved enforcement at workplaces and a guest-worker program for temporary workers. But so far he has not taken a firm position on the problem at the heart of the immigration debate: the fate of the 12 million illegal immigrants already in the country.

That issue has divided the GOP, with House Republicans adopting a hard-line stance that may have contributed to GOP losses in November.

That's why immigration legislation has a better chance of passing with Congress in Democratic hands, and lawmakers are preparing to broach the issue again.

On education, aides say the president intends to press for the reauthorization of his signature No Child Left Behind Act, which faces expiration if not renewed this year.

Congressional sources say that the bill will probably undergo some revision but that the Democrats and Republicans who signed on to it five years ago remain committed to its core principles: more testing of students and accountability standards for schools in an effort to improve achievement levels of disadvantaged students.

Beyond that, there is little consensus on where Bush could take his education agenda. Last year he expressed support for extending No Child Left Behind to secondary schools, but Democrats and Republicans say they want to work out the kinks at the elementary-school level before applying the idea to high schools.

In the end, it may not be proposals that determine the success or failure of the showcase address. Instead, it may simply be whether Bush avoids losing additional ground with the public and Congress.

"At six years, people think they know him," presidential historian Edwards said. "The idea that there is some magic phrasing or some magic policy that will give him a big boost and people will regain confidence in him — it's not going to happen."

Bush Wants States To Plan Coverage Of Uninsured (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush's top healthcare official on Monday proposed a strategy for covering the uninsured that would offer incentives to each state to develop its own plan for expanding access, but stopped short of guaranteeing universal protection.

With Bush expected to address concern about rising premiums and shrinking coverage tonight in his State of the Union speech, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt offered governors greater leeway in how they use federal healthcare money for the poor if they would take the lead on offering help to the estimated 47 million now uninsured.

"The president will make clear he believes the federal government should not run healthcare," Leavitt told reporters. "He wants to partner with states." Leavitt said he expected a dozen or more states to pursue health reform efforts this year.

The Bush approach adds to a growing list of proposals for expanding medical insurance coverage and dealing with other aspects of healthcare. Like the others, it is likely to fuel the coming debate on the issue in Congress and on the campaign trail.

Hospital groups warned that the administration's proposal could undermine existing programs by redirecting federal funds. And on Capitol Hill, some leading Democrats grew more outspoken in their criticism of Bush's emerging healthcare strategy — a sign it may not get very far in Congress.

Leavitt, in a session with reporters, outlined what he called an "affordable choices initiative," which he said was the second major piece of the administration's plan, along with a proposal to tax high-value medical insurance provided by employers to some workers.

Under the initiative, the federal government could reallocate as much as $40 billion a year that now goes to hospitals and other providers that treat large numbers of uninsured and low-income patients, he said.

Funds would instead be used to provide basic health insurance coverage for low-income people, who could then see their own doctors and perhaps avoid costly hospitalizations. "Rather than perpetually paying the bills of uninsured people, it would be better to use part of the money to help them get an insurance policy," Leavitt said.

Over the weekend, the president unveiled the first part of his plan — a tax deduction that would make insurance more affordable for people who don't have employer-sponsored coverage. The proposal would be financed by taxing people with the richest health plans, those with premiums of more than $15,000 a year for family coverage, or $7,500 for individuals. Revenue from the tax would be used to cover deductions given to middle-class workers, many of them self-employed, to buy coverage.

DOJ_NMG_0120541

And the chairman of the House Ways and Means health subcommittee, Rep. Pete Stark (D-Fremont), accused Bush of "pursuing a policy designed to destroy the employer-based healthcare system through which 160 million people receive coverage."

Some middle-of-the-road Democrats also questioned Bush's plan.

"I am concerned about how the administration's proposal will affect a middle-class person who's lucky enough to have a good healthcare package," said Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.). "The proposal involves a lot of pieces, and its hard to calculate how they all fit together." Wyden has a health reform plan of his own.

White House officials said the Democrats were overreacting. About 80% of employer-provided polices have annual premiums under the $15,000 and $7,500 taxable thresholds, according to administration figures.

The tax changes, designed to take effect in 2009, would result in an estimated 5 million people gaining coverage, White House officials said. No estimate of gains in coverage could be made for the other part of the administration's package, because it would depend on the states.

States would set up insurance-purchasing pools, decide who is eligible for subsidized coverage, and determine a basic benefits package, Leavitt said. They may well have to invest additional state funds, he noted.

In exchange, Washington would provide the states with greater flexibility over how to spend federal dollars now allocated to provide healthcare for the poor and uninsured. Leavitt did not promise additional federal money, and some congressional aides predicted cuts in healthcare spending as part of the budget Bush will send to Congress next month.

But hospital groups said the idea comes with a catch. Many states don't pay enough to cover care for poor people who have Medicaid coverage, so hospitals depend on the federal payments to make ends meet.

"This is literally taking money away from the poor," said Peters Willson, vice president for public policy with the National Assn. of Children's Hospitals. "You are taking money

Bush Wants States To Plan Coverage Of Uninsured (LAT)

By Ricardo Alonso-zaldivar

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush's top healthcare official on Monday proposed a strategy for covering the uninsured that would offer incentives to each state to develop its own plan for expanding access, but stopped short of guaranteeing universal protection.

With Bush expected to address concern about rising premiums and shrinking coverage tonight in his State of the Union speech, Health and Human Services Secretary Mike Leavitt offered governors greater leeway in how they use federal healthcare money for the poor if they would take the lead on offering help to the estimated 47 million now uninsured.

"The president will make clear he believes the federal government should not run healthcare," Leavitt told reporters. "He wants to partner with states." Leavitt said he expected a dozen or more states to pursue health reform efforts this year.

The Bush approach adds to a growing list of proposals for expanding medical insurance coverage and dealing with other aspects of healthcare. Like the others, it is likely to fuel the coming debate on the issue in Congress and on the campaign trail.

Hospital groups warned that the administration's proposal could undermine existing programs by redirecting federal funds. And on Capitol Hill, some leading Democrats grew more outspoken in their criticism of Bush's emerging healthcare strategy — a sign it may not get very far in Congress.

Leavitt, in a session with reporters, outlined what he called an "affordable choices initiative," which he said was the second major piece of the administration's plan, along with a proposal to tax high-value medical insurance provided by employers to some workers.

Under the initiative, the federal government could reallocate as much as $40 billion a year that now goes to hospitals and other providers that treat large numbers of uninsured and low-income patients, he said.

Funds would instead be used to provide basic health insurance coverage for low-income people, who could then see their own doctors and perhaps avoid costly hospitalizations. "Rather than perpetually paying the bills of uninsured people, it would be better to use part of the money to help them get an insurance policy," Leavitt said.

Over the weekend, the president unveiled the first part of his plan — a tax deduction that would make insurance more affordable for people who don't have employer-sponsored coverage. The proposal would be financed by taxing people with the richest health plans, those with premiums of more than $15,000 a year for family coverage, or $7,500 for individuals. Revenue from the tax would be used to cover deductions given to middle-class workers, many of them self-employed, to buy coverage.

Monday, the office of Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) issued a press release saying that part of Bush's plan "amounts to a tax increase for the middle class."

And the chairman of the House Ways and Means health subcommittee, Rep. Pete Stark (D-Fremont), accused Bush of "pursuing a policy designed to destroy the employer-based healthcare system through which 160 million people receive coverage."

"You are taking money away from children covered by Medicaid, and you could throw the safety institutions we are counting on being there for everybody into financial jeopardy."

A Healthy Initiative (WP)

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

THIS TIME last year, President Bush's main health policy proposal was to expand tax-sheltered health savings accounts. In the days leading up to tonight's State of the Union address, he has signaled a welcome shift in policy. Expanded tax shelters for health savings accounts would have drained billions of dollars from the budget, and the shelters would have mainly benefited the affluent. Their legitimate goals -- to correct the tax bias against people who don't work for big companies and to discipline health costs -- would be far better advanced by Mr. Bush's new initiative, which is budget-neutral and progressive.

At present, people who get health insurance from employers pay no tax on the value of the benefit. Someone with a marginal tax rate of 35 percent and a generous insurance policy worth $20,000 a year gets a $7,000 tax break. But people who buy insurance on the individual market must usually do so with post-tax dollars, so their tax break is normally zero. The administration proposes to eliminate that unfairness by giving salaried workers and freelancers the same tax deduction.

The reform would also remove the tax incentive to buy excessive insurance. Currently, the more generous your health plan, the more tax subsidies you capture; the person in the example above would get a tax break worth only $3,500 if he chose a more restricted insurance plan worth $10,000 annually. Generous insurance plans, which impose few restrictions on visits to specialists or on possibly redundant tests, inflate demand for medical services and push up prices for everyone; they help explain why the United States spends almost twice as large a share of its economy on health care as do most rich economies. By giving all insurance buyers a standard deduction, irrespective of the type of health coverage they choose, Mr. Bush would restrain medical costs and promote fairness. Because richer people tend to have more expensive insurance, the reform would slightly increase tax rates for people in the top fifth of the income distribution while slightly reducing tax rates for others, according to the White House.

There are weaknesses in the president's proposal. Rather than embracing tax deductions, which are most valuable to people in high tax brackets, Mr. Bush could have made his proposal even more progressive by recommending a refundable tax credit that would be worth the same to everyone. Moreover, there's a danger that ending the tax privilege for employer-provided insurance will cause companies to discontinue coverage, driving more buyers into the individual market, where it's hard to buy insurance at a reasonable price, especially if you already have a medical problem. The administration promises to support state efforts to redeploy federal Medicaid dollars in ways that would make the individual insurance market work better. But success here will depend on the states, and the details are sketchy.

Despite these caveats, the president is right to go after the existing system of tax subsidies for health care. Like the deductions for mortgage interest, these subsidies are regressive and have perverse consequences. Mr. Bush has kicked off a needed discussion.

Bush's Health Plan Unaffordable, Says Advocacy Group (NHR)

By Mary E. O'Leary

New Haven Register, January 23, 2007

President Bush's plan to make health insurance affordable for more people is getting a thumbs down from one advocacy group, which has more faith in the efforts of individual states to tackle the problem.

Bush, in his radio address this weekend, talked of his plan to tax employee health benefits that exceed a certain value, while extending a tax credit across the board to those with and without insurance. He will elaborate further tonight in his State of the Union address.

Janet Davenport, spokeswoman for the Universal Health Care Foundation, said the fact that the president is addressing the issue recognizes there is a problem.

"We need health care reform on the national agenda, but we need the right plan," she said, and based on reports to date, Bush's proposal does not appear to be "in the best interest of middle-class and low-income families, in fact ... it could actually be harmful."

There are 47 million Americans without health insurance, 407,000 of whom reside in Connecticut.

The Bush plan would allow a $15,000 tax deduction for a family with employer-based health insurance and the same deduction for those who lack coverage. If health insurance costs more than that, the individual would pay taxes on the difference.

One analysis said this would mean a tax increase for about 20 percent of workers.

Americans covered by employee plans, estimated by the U.S. Census Bureau at 175 million, don't pay taxes on health insurance benefits, estimated to cost an average of $11,500.

Davenport, however, said most of the uninsured in the state are low-wage workers, whose employers don't offer health insurance, or they can't afford the premium.

"Either way, it is just plain unaffordable," she said.

Davenport said individuals and families who can't afford insurance are in low-tax brackets and making premiums tax-deductible "would be virtually meaningless." She said while it is hopeful the issue is again on the national agenda, Connecticut has an opportunity to move forward before the federal government.

The foundation hired an outside consultant this year to do an extensive economic analysis of alternative universal plans for Connecticut as to cost containment and the effect on economic growth.

The best plan was a single-payer model run by the state, but a second one, with a state pool that used competing private insurance firms, also saved money and boosted the gross domestic product.

Davenport said she wants to see such an analysis of Bush's plan. She said a viable plan that is not only global, but sustainable is needed.

A coalition of business and union groups last week demanded government action because rising health costs put American businesses at a disadvantage globally.

Andrew Stern, president of the Service Employees International Union, Monday said he was happy Bush had joined the discussion.

"But, I am concerned that the president's tax proposal is more about shifting responsibility, rather than sharing the responsibility of our health care system. We should be making sure that everyone has good coverage, not punishing those who already do," he said.

A spokeswoman for the Connecticut Business and Industry Association said its analysts wanted to wait for further details before commenting on Bush's proposal.

Interest Lacking In Health Accounts (AR)

By Jodie Snyder

Arizona Republic, January 23, 2007

In his State of the Union address last January, President Bush spotlighted health savings accounts, saying that patients paying $1,000 deductibles rather than $20 co-pays would help control runaway health care costs.

Since then, Congress has tweaked health savings accounts, but enrollment in them hasn't really budged and few people know the facts about them.

In comparing 2005 enrollment numbers with 2006 figures, Kaiser Family Foundation, a Washington, D.C.-based health care policy group, found no statistical difference between the two.

advertisement

Health savings accounts are pools of tax-free money that employers or employees can contribute to. The accounts can be used to help with out-of-pocket medical expenses, and unlike flexible spending accounts, they can be rolled over to the next year. They are usually paired with high-deductible insurance policies to create consumer-driven health plans.

Bush and other advocates said that health savings accounts can make people think twice about going to the doctor and getting prescriptions, and that turning patients into better consumers could slow rising health care costs.

Employers also may like them because they generally have lower premiums than typical managed-care contracts, they argued.

"It (the acceptance) certainly hasn't been a tidal wave," said Gary Claxton, Kaiser vice president. "When you look at the total costs, the savings from these plans may not be enough to overcome consumer concerns about higher cost sharing."

Bush is not expected to talk about the accounts in tonight's address. Instead, his focus is expected to be on offering tax deductions to people who buy their own health insurance and possibly levying a tax on people who get hefty health benefits from their employer.

It took almost a year after Bush's last State of the Union address to get Congress to pass changes to make the health savings accounts more attractive.

One significant change was to allow employers to make a one-time transfer from the employee's flexible spending accounts to health savings accounts. Another important change was to allow employees to roll over their money into retirement accounts after they take a penalty for withdrawing the money, said Patricia Larsen, principal of the Phoenix office of Mercer Health and Benefits.

Other highlights include raising limits to $2,850 for an individual and $5,650 for a family. Previous limits on contributions had been tied to the size of the deductible.

Larsen said she believes the changes will help create more interest in the accounts as time passes.

Kaiser estimates that about 4 percent of employees are covered by high-deductible plans with a savings option, such as health savings accounts. Only 4 percent of companies that offer other types of health insurance say that they are "very likely" to adopt high-deductible plans/health savings accounts plans.

A recent survey by the Employee Benefits Research Institute, a Washington, D.C., public policy group, indicated that people enrolled in high-deductible plans continue to be less satisfied with their health plan than people in more comprehensive health plans. They are also less likely to recommend the plan.

Employees need to hear more about the plans and understand how they work, said Mike Cody, vice president of Lovitt and Touche, a Phoenix insurance brokerage.

"When people see that $2,000 deductible, they freak out. They don't understand it," Cody said.

One of the most frequent criticisms is that people don't know how to find out what a medical procedure is going to cost. It's hard to do comparison shopping when a doctor tells you have a suspicious mole that should be checked out, Cody said.

"You just want it to get taken care of."

Sandy Abalos, who owns Abalos and Associates, a Phoenix accounting firm, said she believes it's worth educating people about the accounts.

Abalos started using health savings accounts a couple of years ago. She said her employees have been happy with them.

Abalos took the money she saved on premiums and used it to fund up to 75 percent of her employees' deductibles.

She also works with a preferred provider organization network so that people can get reduced rates from network physicians.

The plan came in handy when Abalos had to pay for her daughter's braces.

The company has no dental plan but Abalos was able to dip into her account to pay for them.

"I think these are great. I just wish more people knew about them," she said.

Bush Hails Abortion Foes At Annual Rally (AP)

AP, January 23, 2007

President Bush marked the 34th anniversary of the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision Monday, telling thousands of abortion foes he shares their goal of seeing "the day when every child is welcomed in life and protected into law."

Bush also signaled his unchanged opposition to a key goal of the Democrats who now control Congress: broadening embryonic stem-cell research.

"Our challenge is to make sure that science serves the cause of humanity instead of the other way around," the president said in a telephone call piped over loudspeakers to a Washington rally of opponents of abortion rights. "I have made clear to the Congress, we must pursue medical advances in the name of life, not at the expense of it."

Bush calls the rally each year, usually from distant locations. This year, he extended his weekend stay at the Camp David presidential retreat in the Maryland mountains to phone the participants from there.

Bush last year vetoed a bill bolstering embryonic stem cell research that advocates say shows promise for numerous medical cures. Earlier this month, the House passed such a bill again, though by a margin short of what would be required to overturn another veto from the president.

With abortion foes in a more defensive posture now that Democrats gained control of Capitol Hill, Bush urged them to do more than look toward legislative victories.

"We've all got to remember that a true culture of life cannot be built by changing laws alone. We've all got to work hard to change hearts," he said. "The sanctity of life is written in the life of all men and women. And so I think, go forth with confidence that a cause rooted in human dignity and appealing to the best instincts of our citizens cannot fail."

Thousands of abortion foes from around the country gathered on the National Mall at midday for speeches. Several thousand later made their way to the Supreme Court, where they waved signs and chanted.

Police said there were no arrests during either protest.

The court is considering an abortion case now, dealing with the first nationwide restrictions on an abortion procedure since the landmark 1973 case.

The Bush administration is asking the court to uphold a law he signed in 2003 banning a procedure opponents call partial-birth abortion. It takes place most often in the middle-third of pregnancy.

The law calls it gruesome, inhumane and never medically necessary. Abortion-rights advocates argue that such abortions sometimes are the safest for women.

Thousands Of Abortion Opponents Rally On Mall (NYT)

By Sarah Abruzzese

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — They marched down Seventh Street on Monday chanting, singing and eventually flooding onto the Mall to show disapproval on the 34th anniversary of the Roe v. Wade decision that legalized abortion.

In his annual call to the thousands of abortion opponents at the March for Life, President Bush, who delivered a telephone message from Camp David, said, “We believe every human life has value, and we pray for the day when every child is welcome in life and protected into law.”

The president told the group, “We’re making progress,” citing legislation that allows a person charged with killing a pregnant woman to be also charged with harming or killing a fetus.

Mr. Bush mentioned his signing the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act of 2003, which is before the Supreme Court in a case to be decided this term.

Senator Sam Brownback, the Kansas Republican who announced his presidential bid over the weekend, had supporters fan out over the Mall to pass out pamphlets proclaiming him as “proudly pro-life” and “a champion of our values.”

After the Mall rally, the demonstrators marched up Constitution Avenue to the Supreme Court.

This is the first anti-abortion march here since the Democrats took control of Congress. The change is “challenging us to fight harder,” said Natalie Campbell, 18, who was at the rally with her father and their church group from Kokomo, Ind.

Joe Konopa, 19, who traveled here with more than 60 people from three churches in the Kokomo area, said, “They are picking up on the fact that more and more Americans, especially the young, are against abortion.”

Gail Babalonis of Hooversville, Pa., said which party was in control did not matter.

“The last eight years have been pro-life, and the only thing they got accomplished is the ban on partial birth abortions,” Ms. Babalonis said.

Abortion Foes To Renew Efforts (WP)

By Michael Alison Chandler And Michelle Boorstein

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Tens of thousands of abortion opponents marched through melting snow on the Mall yesterday and vowed to work harder -- since Democrats have taken control of the Capitol -- to overturn the Roe v. Wade Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion in 1973.

Demonstrators' hopes were buoyed a year ago at the annual March for Life by two new appointments to the Supreme Court. Now, with Democrats in power in both houses of Congress, abortion foes find themselves without allies in some key positions for the first time in more than a decade.

"Pro-lifers aren't going to pack up and go home because of the 2006 elections," said Karen Cross, political director of the National Right to Life Committee, at a news conference before the march. "Indeed, we will redouble our efforts and continue working until every unborn child is protected."

Democratic leaders have said they prefer what they consider a less combative approach in preparing legislation on the abortion issue. Several bills are circulating that would change the focus of the abortion debate to pregnancy prevention, through such measures as improved access to contraception.

Democrats say their goal is to find a political compromise, an approach echoed yesterday by some abortion rights advocates.

"We wish those people who are coming in town for a great adventure one day a year would join with us to put forth a prevention-first agenda that would significantly reduce the need for abortion," said Jatrice Martel Gaiter, president and chief executive of Planned Parenthood of Metropolitan Washington.

Some abortion opponents said a compromise might not be realistic.

"The pro-abortionists say you legally can kill an unborn child for any reason. We say the child should live. Where is the middle ground?" said Wanda Franz, president of the National Right to Life Committee.

Teenagers made up the majority of demonstrators yesterday who poured out of buses from across the country, wearing matching colored scarves or carrying posters with statements such as "Face It Abortion Kills."

"It's amazing!" said Annie Forsthoefel, 17, after an overnight trip with a church youth group from Cincinnati. She and her friends wore matching fleece headbands that said "PRO-LIFE." She said she had wanted to come to the march for the last three years. "How can you not love a baby? It seems unnatural," she said.

The young people joined older abortion opponents, some holding rosaries or draped in blankets depicting the Virgin Mary. Some said they make the pilgrimage every year. Organizers could not be reached for a crowd estimate, and police said they no longer provide such numbers.

About 100 abortion opponents had demonstrated Sunday morning in front of the Planned Parenthood abortion clinic on 16th Street NW, and dozens more gathered there yesterday.

The crowd on the Mall cheered when President Bush spoke to the protesters through a loudspeaker from Camp David, thanking those gathered for their help "to build a culture of life." Bush reminded demonstrators about progress his administration has made in the antiabortion movement, including supporting parental notification laws, funding crisis pregnancy centers and signing into law a ban on partial-birth abortions that the Supreme Court is expected to rule on this year.

The rally mirrored similar demonstrations in state capitals and was the culmination of a weekend of events in Washington, including a series of workshops and seminars, a youth rally and Mass that filled Verizon Center and a conference at which antiabortion bloggers discussed potential 2008 presidential candidates.

As the sun set in front of the Supreme Court at the end of the march, a group of women took to the microphone, one after another, holding black signs that said: "I regret my abortion."

Cindy Rose, 49, of Saginaw, Mich., told the lingering demonstrators about abortions she had in 1979 and 1981.

Rose said the guilt over her abortions killed her relationships and pushed her to alcohol and drugs. "One night I asked God to please forgive me," she said. "Abortion is a lie and not a solution."

As the women spoke, some in English and some in Spanish, their words were interrupted by about 100 abortion rights advocates linking arms and holding signs saying: "Trust women."

"Tonight I'm going to speak for my generation," said Susan Scanlan, chairwoman of the National Council of Women's Organizations. "Younger women do not share our memories of women going to grimy apartments. I took such a trip with a college roommate in 1968."

As Scanlon spoke, a chorus of abortion opponents rose in volume chanting Hail Marys.

Staff writer Shailagh Murray contributed to this report.

Pro-lifers March By The Thousands (WT)

By Tarron Lively And Arlo Wagner

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

Tens of thousands of people converged on the District yesterday to participate in the March for Life and to attend Masses in recognition of the 34th anniversary of the landmark Supreme Court decision in the Roe v. Wade case.

The march began at about 2 p.m. on the Mall and moved east past the U.S. Capitol and Supreme Court building in Northeast.

President Bush sent a message of support. In a telephone call broadcast over loudspeakers, he told the marchers that he shares their goal of seeing "the day when every child is welcomed in life and protected into law."

The court's decision overturned state laws barring abortion.

Mr. Bush calls the rally each year, usually from distant locations. This year, he extended his weekend stay at Camp David in Maryland to make the call. He phoned last year from Manhattan, Kan.

Students, members of religious groups, families and children slogged through mud and toted signs with messages such as "Abortion kills" and "Justice for all, born and preborn."

The Rev. Luke J. Robinson, pastor of Quinn Chapel A.M.E. Church in Frederick, Md., asked what would have happened had Martin Luther King been aborted, then described the process in detail.

"I know it sounds horrible, but abortion is horrible," he said, his voice thundering across the Mall. "It is a murderous and bloody business."

Before the march, a sea of teens, parents and clergy filled the Verizon Center downtown for a Mass and rally organized by the Archdiocese of Washington.

Washington Archbishop Donald W. Wuerl, who was joined by cardinals, bishops and priests from across the United States, said the Mass was to celebrate "the value and dignity of human life."

"The church is very much alive and pro-life," he said to cheers and applause.

The Rev. William D. Byrne, the chaplain at the University of Maryland Catholic Student Center and the archdiocese's director of campus ministry, delivered the homily and urged participants to "get on board with God's plan."

"Abortions happen not because of choice, but because people feel they have no choice," he said. "A plan will save a life -- not just the baby's."

Kevin O'Neill, 53, and Bill Stumf, 57, both of Titusville, Pa., came with a large group from the congregation of the Diocese of Erie.

Their group was made up largely of teens, including Mr. O'Neill's 16-year-old daughter, Erin. The message was not lost on the youths, Mr. O'Neill said.

Father Byrne delivered "a very good homily," he said. "He got the point across."

The archdiocese conducted its first rally marking the anniversary in 1995. As participation grew, the rallies were held in several places throughout the region until 2004, when they moved to the Verizon Center.

Simultaneous rallies were held yesterday at DAR (Daughters of the American Revolution) Constitution Hall and the Cathedral of St. Matthew the Apostle to handle the overflow at the Verizon Center.

Terry Fortier, 57, of Gaithersburg, joined the march with three of her four adopted children, leading them in chanting, "I was adopted, not aborted."

Attending her 20th march, Mrs. Fortier marveled at the turnout.

"There is a bigger number of people then there has ever been," she said as the march snaked toward Capitol Hill.

"It's nice to see people who care," said her son Eric, 17.

The Metropolitan Police Department closed several streets and activated the Joint Operations Command Center and its network of downtown surveillance cameras to monitor the activities. Officer Kenny Bryson, an agency spokesman, said late yesterday afternoon that no arrests or incidents had been reported.

Cheryl Rash and Debbie Siegel, both 17, came with a group from the Archdiocese of Philadelphia. They shared the president's view of protecting unborn children.

"I decided since babies can't speak for themselves, I'd be here to speak for them," Cheryl said.

Debbie said she has been against abortion all her life.

"I've looked at it outside of religion," she said. "Just because you can't see doesn't mean you have to kill it."

Brownback, Hunter Vow To Overturn Roe (AP)

By Sam Hananel

AP, January 23, 2007

Two of the Republicans' most conservative presidential hopefuls promised anti-abortion activists on Monday that if elected, they would work to overturn the Supreme Court decision legalizing the procedure.

Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback and California Rep. Duncan Hunter addressed the annual March for Life marking the anniversary of the 1973 Roe v. Wade ruling.

"We recognize a tragedy of life in Roe v. Wade, but that tragedy will not always stand," Brownback told thousands of cheering abortion foes at an afternoon rally.

Brownback, who formally launched his presidential bid on Saturday, spoke about adopting his daughter, Jenna, from a Chinese orphanage.

DOJ_NMG_0120548

"I mention her because some woman in China, who I probably will never meet, fought for her life," Brownback said. "Somebody fought for her life. You are fighting for somebody's life.

Hunter, who has established a presidential exploratory committee, told the crowd he and his wife would begin to campaign in earnest this Thursday in South Carolina, one of the earliest primary states.

"If we have a judicial applicant, a judicial nominee who can look at a sonogram of an unborn child and not see the value of human life ... if I should become president of the United States, he will not receive a judicial appointment," Hunter said.

Both lawmakers are viewed as long shots to win the nomination over better-known candidates like Arizona Sen. John McCain and former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani. But each is aiming to corner the party's social conservative base, which considers abortion a key issue.

Brownback later hosted a reception on Capitol Hill for about 200 of the activists.

Brownback Finds Plenty Of Supporters At March Against Abortion (BRAH/MCT)

By Matt Stearns

The Bradenton Herald, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - Thousands of people marched against abortion here Monday. More than a few of them also marched for Sam Brownback.

Brownback, the conservative Kansas Republican senator, announced his bid for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination Saturday in his home state. Monday's march was his first major public appearance since.

He was feeling the love.

Dozens of blue "Brownback for President" posters dotted the National Mall, where marchers gathered before proceeding to the Supreme Court. Well-wishers approached to urge him on. A gaggle of photographers recorded virtually his entire participation. (He was one of the few politicians to march the entire way; most others gave speeches beforehand and then split on this toe-numbingly cold, damp day.)

"God bless you, Sam! You are the next president, in the name of Jesus!" shouted a voice near the onstage microphone after Brownback's speech.

A surprising response for an underfunded politician mired at 1 or 2 percent in national polls? Not in this crowd. To many marchers, Brownback isn't an asterisk, he's a hero. And that's what gives Brownback hope that his grassroots-oriented campaign could take the establishment by surprise.

Brownback so far is the only Republican presidential hopeful who appeals strongly to the party's social conservative wing, and his candidacy is a test of how influential that wing of the party remains.

Speaking to reporters at a Capitol Hill reception his campaign hosted (it had to rent an overflow room to handle the crowd), Brownback unleashed a volley of facts and figures: In Iowa, 70 percent of Republican caucus-goers describe themselves as "pro-life," and 40 percent of them wouldn't support a candidate who wasn't opposed to abortion, Brownback said.

"This is where the heart of my base, and where the heart of the base of the Republican Party, lies," Brownback said. "When a proper voter contact is made, I think we'll be in great shape in this campaign."

And what of Arizona Sen. John McCain and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, two Republican front-runners? Neither was at the march. (The only other possible Republican presidential candidate who appeared was California Rep. Duncan Hunter, who's an even longer shot than Brownback. Hunter vowed to make all potential judicial appointees watch a sonogram.)

McCain opposes abortion except in some circumstances, but he's had difficulty persuading religious conservatives to support him. That remained true Monday. Some dismissed him as "not pro-life" or "unimpressive." Whitty Whitesell of Plymouth, Mich., allowed that McCain was "a war hero and wonderful example" but said Brownback "stands for life."

Romney took a beating from a flier that featured pictures of him and Democratic Massachusetts Sen. John Kerry. The brochure was titled "Pro-Life Students Against Flip-Floppers from Massachusetts" and highlighted Romney's past support for Roe v. Wade. (Romney says he opposes abortion.) Cheryl Sinclair of Smithtown, N.Y., who said abortion was her No. 1 issue, called Romney "back and forth" before she even saw the flier.

Brownback wouldn't trash McCain or Romney, but he did say, "I don't think so, no," when he was asked whether any other Republican candidate could match his record on fighting abortion.

Still, even some in the crowd holding Brownback signs didn't know much about the man from Kansas.

"All I know is he's pro-life and they were passing out signs," said 17-year-old Laura Marshall of Livonia, Mich.

Some knew less.

"Who's Brownback?" a young man asked his mother. "I think he's from Nebraska," she responded.

But at this point, Brownback and his supporters are running more on faith than anything else.

"Pray for the campaign and we'll get it done in 2008," Brownback told the crowd at his reception.

DOJ_NMG_0120549

Patricia Pitkus Bainbridge of Rockford, Ill., was among those listening. She'd never given a penny to a politician until Brownback came along. She has talked up Brownback to friends and is unperturbed by those who say he can't win.

"I believe God can raise people up who He wants to raise up," Bainbridge said. "I believe God is raising him up."

Deficit Halved 2 Years Early (USAT)

By Rob Portman

USA Today, January 23, 2007

Three years ago, President Bush established the goal of cutting the federal budget deficit by half in five years, without raising taxes. At the time, many — including USA TODAY— expressed skepticism. But it was achieved last year, three years ahead of schedule. Now is the time to build on that success and work with Congress to balance the budget in the next five years.

On Feb. 5, the president will propose the customary five-year budget, showing declining deficits every year and a surplus in 2012.

Getting to balance requires both keeping the economy strong and keeping federal spending under control.

Key to the first is continuing pro-growth policies — including tax relief — that have helped fuel our robust economy. Since the president's tax relief became fully effective in 2003, we've seen a dramatic increase in business investment, more thanseven million new jobs created and higher wages for American workers. This stronger economy has also generated record revenues over the past two years, cutting our deficit by more than$150 billion. This is why it is so important to balance the budget without raising taxes and not put our economy at risk.

Key to the second condition is setting budget priorities and stopping unnecessary orwasteful spending. Fiscal restraint while investing in our national security is equally important to a balanced budget.

The president's budget will demonstrate how balance can be achieved by using cautious economic and revenue projections in line with forecasts by outside experts. On spending, the president will propose realistic restraint, while increasing funding for the global war on terror, including all costs of Iraq and Afghanistan over the next two years.

In demonstrating how we can balance the budget in the next five years, the president will continue to call for bipartisan solutions to the longer term challenges posed by unsustainable growth in important entitlement programs. In fact, a key reason to pursue a balanced budget now is to position us better for that future challenge.

A balanced budget is good for the American taxpayer and for our economy. There's plenty of work to be done, but I am optimistic we can do it — across party lines — as the American people expect and deserve.

Bush Seeks Balanced Budget, 6 Years And $3 Trillion Late (USAT)

USA Today, January 23, 2007

In his State of the Union address tonight, President Bush is expected to call for a balanced budget by 2012. In other words, after turning the Clinton-era surpluses into six straight years of deficits and putting the nation almost $3 trillion deeper into debt, he now wants to see the budget balanced after he leaves office, just as the demographic tidal wave of baby boomer retirements begins to inundate the federal ledgers in red ink. Call us party poopers, but that hardly seems reason to break out the champagne.

At least the president is posturing on fiscal issues. With Democrats doing the same, it seems the deficit is heating up as a political issue, which is a good thing.

Mustering the political will to fix the problem is another matter, as Bush's plan attests. The president is not calling for a major new look at health spending. He is not scaling back his tax cuts. He is not prepping the nation for the tough choices that lie ahead or making any himself. In fact he is not expected to offer any specifics tonight.

In reality, his call is little more than an observation. If the economy continues to grow, if spending in Iraq begins to wind down, if the nation averts another Katrina or 9/11, then, presto! The budget will drift toward the break-even point with only modest fiscal restraint — most of which would fall to the next president and future Congresses.

But this surplus-as-destiny approach has a big problem. Bush's break-even point comes about the time baby boomers start to retire in droves. Their retirement, combined with surging health care costs and increased life expectancies will push spending on Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security off the charts. Already those programs account for 40% of all government spending.

In 2012, for instance, the Social Security surplus — the amount by which Social Security tax receipts exceed Social Security spending, masking the true size of the federal defict — will be about $64 billion. Just three years later, it will have plummeted to just $12 billion on its way to a deficit in 2017.At the same time, Medicare spending will increase by $158 billion, to $817 billion.

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke summed up the situation last Thursday when he told a Senate committee that any short-term improvement in the fiscal outlook should be seen as "the calm before the storm." That storm will strike nearly everyone in the form of reduced benefits, rising taxes or both.

Now is not the time to ballyhoo the potential for a balanced budget in 2012. It is time to address health care costs, which rise by 10% to 15% in most years. It is also the time to fix Social Security and enact polices that encourage people to work longer.

The speech we'd like to hear would have a more urgent tone. The president would acknowledge that his tax cuts, the war in Iraq and the new Medicare drug plan have worsened the deficit in the short run, while reminding people that core problems would have existed anyway. He would agree to revisit his tax cuts in return for progress in controlling spending. And he would not shirk from the duty of laying out the challenges that lieahead. His speech might begin:

"Distinguished members of Congress, we face critical choices. If we do not act, our nation will face a financial crisis and a diminished quality of life for generations. …"

If there is good news, it is that Bush still wants to tackle Social Security. All in all, however, we hear too much bravado and too little concern; too much about the short term and too little about the long.

When Washington truly addresses the looming fiscal crisis, we'll uncork the bubbly.

U. Of Dallas Drops Bush Library Bid (AP)

By Angela K. Brown

AP, January 23, 2007

The University of Dallas withdrew its bid for George W. Bush's presidential library Monday, citing the library site selection committee's exclusive talks with nearby Southern Methodist University.

Last month SMU emerged as the apparent winner for the library with the announcement of the negotiations, putting it ahead of the other two finalists, the University of Dallas and Baylor University in Waco.

University of Dallas officials said Monday that the school wanted to release some of the partners that had committed to the project, including the city of Irving's promise of $50 million in hotel tax revenues. The 3,000-student Catholic university also wanted to be free to develop the site it had set aside for the library, a sprawling 300 wooded acres with the Trinity River running through it.

"Our decision to withdraw from the selection process is not a loss for our university; this is not a failure. Instead, we think this is a tremendous success story for us," President Frank Lazarus said. "This process has propelled us into the national stage and our university is now characterized by a new vision for a very bright future."

President Bush said on Thursday that he was "leaning heavily toward SMU" and was close to a decision. First lady Laura Bush attended the 11,000-student, private university. The Bushes are Methodists.

A final decision is expected within months.

Bush Officials Meet New Democrats (HILL)

By Jim Snyder

The Hill, January 23, 2007

The White House reached out to Democrats last week in advance of President Bush's planned attendance at a party retreat later this month.

Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and Office of Management and Budget Director Rob Portman met members of the New Democrat Coalition (NDC) on Capitol Hill.

NDC chairwoman Ellen Tauscher (D-Calif.) said the meeting grew out of a phone conversation Paulson initiated with her over the holiday break.

She described the exchange on the Hill as a "meet-and-greet" event that lasted an hour. The two administration officials talked about trade and budget issues without getting into specifics, she said.

"We talked about how we are moderate Democrats, interested in progressive public policies and committed to … widening the winner's circle," Tauscher said.

Tauscher said she welcomed the outreach but remained skeptical as to whether Bush "understood the message of the election," which was the public's desire for a new direction in the war in Iraq.

The meeting was not the first between the White House and the NDC, whose ranks grew after the election. Bush invited seven members of the NDC and a group of fiscal conservatives, the Blue Dogs, to the White House after midterms.

Surprises From Gates's 1996 Memoir (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks
The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Of all the presidents he worked for, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates is particularly supportive of one -- but it isn't, as might be expected, Ronald Reagan, the first President Bush or even Gerald R. Ford.

Rather, in his memoirs, the new Pentagon chief leaps repeatedly to the defense of Jimmy Carter, the sole Democrat for whom he worked, who was often seen as weak on the Soviet Union and taken by surprise when it invaded Afghanistan in December 1979.

Gates's 1996 book, "From the Shadows," is now being combed for insights into the new defense secretary's thinking, how he might run the Pentagon and what he's had to say about his past bosses.

When it comes to Carter, it isn't that Gates, a career Sovietologist who rose to become CIA director, is a closet dove. Rather, he thinks Carter was far tougher on Moscow than is generally recognized.

"I believe the Soviets saw a very different Jimmy Carter than did most Americans by 1980, different and more hostile and threatening," Gates writes. In both conventional weaponry and in the nuclear arena, he argues, Carter would "provide a strong foundation for Ronald Reagan to build upon." By contrast, Gates describes the first president for whom he worked, Richard Nixon, as "by far the most liberal" of the group. (Gates also shows a bit of dovish ankle, revealing that before leaving the CIA to work in the Nixon White House, he marched in a May 1970 antiwar demonstration.)

Most of all, writes Gates, who was the national intelligence officer for the Soviet Union at the time, Carter's emphasis on human rights cast a spotlight on the Soviets' greatest vulnerability. The rights theme, Gates says, made Carter "the first president during the Cold War to challenge publicly and consistently the legitimacy of Soviet rule at home." In his view, these were "the first steps" toward the beginning of the end of the Soviet Union.

Gates even defends Carter's handling of Afghanistan, reporting that the president and his advisers reacted far earlier than is generally understood, most notably by authorizing covert aid to Afghan insurgents.

The 604-page book contains a few other hints at how Gates might operate at the Pentagon during the last two years of the Bush administration.

Â· He might seek to borrow from the proposals and tactics of the administration's opponents. Some of the most effective U.S. officials he has seen, he says, were Henry A. Kissinger, Zbigniew Brzezinski and George P. Shultz, whom he describes as "basically hawks who drew extensively on the ideas and initiatives of the doves."

Â· He appears more inclined than his predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld, to try to enlist the support of the Pentagon bureaucracy for his policies. Reviewing the record of one CIA director, Adm. Stansfield Turner, he concludes that, "in nearly every case, his failure to build a substantial internal constituency for his changes led to the reversal of his initiatives very quickly after his departure."

Â· He doesn't make policy disagreements personal. He writes warmly about his former boss Brent Scowcroft, who was national security adviser under George H.W. Bush (and also under Ford) but has been considered something of a turncoat by the current president for opposing the invasion of Iraq. "I never argued as much with any person," he recalls. "I never got more frustrated at times with any person. But when I became DCI [director of central intelligence] and left the White House, I considered Brent Scowcroft my closest friend in the world."

Analysis: Dems Oppose Modest Veto Plan (AP)

By Andrew Taylor
AP, January 23, 2007

The Senate is moving toward its first vote in more than a decade on the line-item veto, and it's remarkable how much has changed — particularly the positions of many of the major players.

At issue is a watered-down GOP measure that would allow a president to scrutinize spending bills he signs into law for questionable items and then submit cuts, or rescissions, to Congress for a vote. Unlike the current system, Congress couldn't simply ignore the cuts — if both Houses voted to approve them, they'd go into effect.

Put forward by Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., it's far weaker than the line-item veto power a GOP-dominated Congress gave President Clinton in 1996. Under that bill, before it was struck down by the Supreme Court in 1998, Clinton's line-item vetoes automatically went into effect unless overturned by a two-thirds vote of both House and Senate.

Still, debate on Gregg's plan already has whipped up passions. Most adamant in opposition is Appropriations Committee Chairman Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va., who assaulted the idea last week and again Monday as an attack on Congress' control over the federal purse strings.

"Make no mistake, this line-item veto authority would grant tremendous — and dangerous — new power to the president," Byrd said. "He would have unchecked authority to imperil congressional power over the purse, a power that the constitutional framers felt was absolutely vital to reining in an overzealous president."

But in seeking to derail Gregg's bill, Byrd is effectively filibustering a version of the line-item veto that is similar to one he backed 12 years ago.

That measure, written by then-Minority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., was offered as an alternative to a GOP version requiring a two-thirds vote to override presidential line-item vetoes. Thirty-seven Senate Democrats voted for the proposition, including 20 Democrats still serving. Among them: Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada and Budget Committee Chairman Kent Conrad of North Dakota.

Nineteen Democrats, including liberal stalwarts like Edward Kennedy and John Kerry of Massachusetts, voted for the stronger GOP version; 11 are still in the Senate.

Daschle's plan, Byrd said at the time, "does not result in any shift of power from the legislative branch to the executive. It is clear cut. It gives the president the opportunity to get a vote."

Gregg mirrored those arguments Monday and said Democrats should join him if they want to be consistent with their previous votes.

"This basically gives no power to the Executive Branch other than to ask the Congress to take another look ... and vote again," Gregg said. "So one would presume that folks who voted for the line-item veto back in 1995, unless they've changed their view, would be supportive."

You might imagine Gregg's a big fan of the watered-down line-item veto. He's not. He told reporters last summer that it would have "very little impact" on the budget deficit.

And as chairman of the Budget Committee last year, Gregg rebuffed pleas from GOP leaders and the Bush White House to move a comparable plan through his committee as a stand-alone bill. He instead embedded his line-item plan in a much more controversial bill to overhaul the budget process — which died without reaching the floor.

Among Democrats, Kerry still backs the idea. So do Sens. Joe Lieberman, I-Conn., Evan Bayh, D-Ind., Tom Carper, D-Del., and Ben Nelson, D-Neb., among others. But since Gregg's "Second Look at Wasteful Spending" plan is being offered as an amendment to a bill to increase the minimum wage, some of those Democrats are likely to oppose it. A vote is expected Wednesday.

Old-school Republicans such as Ted Stevens of Alaska and Pete Domenici of New Mexico have also changed their minds on the line-item veto after Clinton used it to kill military construction projects.

The idea behind the line-item veto is that wasteful "pork barrel" spending would be vulnerable since Congress might vote to reject such items once they were no longer protected by their inclusion in bigger bills that the president had little choice but to sign.

Senate's Wage Bill Still Exempts Samoa (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

The Democrat-controlled Senate took up a bill yesterday that would raise the minimum wage across the United States and its territories but exempt American Samoa, where tuna canneries pay workers $3.26 an hour.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi told reporters less than two weeks ago that she would close the loophole after coming under criticism from Republicans for what they termed a "fishy favor" to StarKist Tuna. StarKist has lobbied for years against raising the minimum wage in American Samoa, and its parent, Del Monte Corp., is based in Mrs. Pelosi's San Francisco district.

"I have asked the education and labor committee as they go forward with the legislation to make sure that all of the territories have to comply with U.S. law on the minimum wage," Mrs. Pelosi said earlier this month.

The House, however, passed the minimum-wage bill with the American Samoa exemption. And yesterday, Senate Democrats were moving ahead with the original legislation, which for the first time would enforce the minimum wage on the Northern Mariana Islands, another territory in the Pacific with a similarly low minimum wage.

That bill is co-sponsored by several dozen Democrats, including Sens. Dianne Feinstein and Barbara Boxer of California.

In addition to San Francisco-based StarKist, San Diego-based Chicken of the Sea also has a cannery in American Samoa. Together, the California companies employ about 75 percent of the Samoan work force.

Democrats said they are imposing the wage increase on the Northern Marianas -- a proposal long blocked by former Majority Leader Tom DeLay, Texas Republican -- because of the harsh labor conditions there.

Delegate Eni F.H. Faleomavaega, a nonvoting Democrat representing American Samoa, opposes extending the minimum wage to that territory.

DOJ_NMG_0120553

A "decrease in production or departure of one or both of the two canneries in American Samoa could devastate the local economy, resulting in massive layoffs and insurmountable financial difficulties," he said, echoing the arguments of conservatives against applying the wage to poorer regions of the U.S.

"The truth is the global tuna industry is so competitive that it is no longer possible for the federal government to demand mainland minimum-wage rates for American Samoa without causing the collapse of our economy and making us welfare wards of the federal government," Mr. Faleomavaega said.

Emanuel Makes Nice With GOP Foes (CHIT)

By Jill Zuckman

Chicago Tribune, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- In a private, upstairs room at the Monocle, a storied meeting place for lawmakers, lobbyists and the like, a dinner of unlikely companions took place Monday night.

A high-ranking member of the House Democratic leadership broke bread with nine Republican congressmen, hoping to heal the rifts of the last election and possibly find common ground for future legislative endeavors.

The impresario was as improbable as the guest list—Rep. Rahm Emanuel (D-Ill.), chairman of the House Democratic Caucus and the architect of the Democratic effort to throw Republicans out of the majority last year. The renowned political street-fighter shelved the shiv for a salad fork, putting on his best manners for an evening of crab cakes, steak and red wine.

After mercilessly attacking the GOP for close to two years for what he called incompetence and blind allegiance to the failed policies of a failed president, Emanuel acknowledged that he has some work to do in re-establishing a sense of trust on the other side of the aisle.

"None of the people on the [dinner] list I ever went after, but it's a chilling thing," said Emanuel. "Their colleagues like their jobs, and my job was to take their jobs."

Those in attendance included several notable moderates, such as Reps. Mike Castle of Delaware, Jo Ann Emerson of Missouri and Fred Upton of Michigan, along with a couple of conservatives—all chosen by Rep. Ray LaHood (R-Ill.), co-host of the get-together.

It's far too soon to know if the make-nice dinner will have any long-term yield, but Washington is so riven that even a shared meal could be seen as modest progress.

"The perceptions are that the polarizations and the divisions in this country are beyond repair," said Rep. Zach Wamp (R-Tenn.), a Southern conservative who attended. "I know in my heart that's not true."

LaHood organized the dinner with the understanding that Republicans could ask Emanuel anything they want.

"I don't know that this has ever been done before," said LaHood, a past sponsor of four bipartisan retreats that fell by the wayside several years ago as the atmosphere in Washington became increasingly poisonous, with an ever-widening rift between the parties.

After 12 years of Republican rule, Democrats say they want to reach across the aisle, treat the minority fairly and work together for the common good. Of course, that's what Newt Gingrich said, too, when he became House Speaker in 1995.

Instead, Republicans pursued a policy of only bringing bills to the floor that could win "a majority of the majority," a strategy that effectively shut out Democrats from participating in the business of writing laws.

Now Democrats say they want to do things differently.

But many Republicans have already pointed out that the Democratic majority shut them out as Democrats fast-tracked six major pieces of legislation through the House floor in the first two weeks of the new session of Congress.

"We're short-circuiting democracy here," complained Republican Leader John Boehner (R-Ohio). "We're being silenced in this process."

Not all Republicans feel quite the same sense of outrage as their leader, noting that the Democrats were simply doing what Republicans had done for years.

"I have a hard time waxing too indignant given the way we handled matters here," said Rep. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.). He and Rep. Mike Pence (R-Ind.) are organizing a group of fiscal conservatives to have dinner with Emanuel, too. "We look a little whiny," said Flake.

Emanuel, however, inspires a special brand of suspicion given his aggressive effort to attack Republicans and take their jobs away.

"I think there are some members of Congress who probably would never trust Congressman Emanuel," said Rep. Thomas Reynolds (R-N.Y.), who played defense to Emanuel's offense last year as chairman of the National Republican Congressional Committee.

"There might be better members on the Democratic side to achieve that bipartisanship," he said. "We'll have to see."

DOJ_NMG_0120554

Even so, Emanuel has a record of working with Republicans to further the issues he cares about, from the Great Lakes Restoration Act with Rep. Mark Kirk (R-Ill.) to the re-importation of prescription drugs with Emerson and Rep. Gil Gutknecht (R-Minn.).

When moderate Republicans needed a regular meeting space, Emanuel provided it for them after their own leaders declined. And he spearheaded an invitation to President Bush to address Democrats at their upcoming retreat in Williamsburg, Va., which the president accepted.

"I really don't think of him as a partisan, but as a colleague," said Emerson, who has worked with Emanuel on prescription drug and health care issues over the years.

Her constituents, she said, want to see Republicans and Democrats working together for the common good. And in the final years of the Republican majority, she said, little was accomplished as Republicans insisted on going it alone.

"I'm embarrassed to walk into a Rotary Club meeting to give the luncheon speech and say we haven't done anything," Emerson said. "We can always meet in the middle as long as nobody is trying to zap the other in the next election."

It is a sentiment echoed by Wamp, who voted for four of the Democrats' first pieces of legislation this year and hopes Emanuel will help resurrect the bipartisan retreats of old.

He doesn't hold Emanuel responsible, either, for Republicans losing the majority.

"The majority party grew arrogant," Wamp said. "I don't blame them for us losing. I blame us for us losing."

Lawmakers from Illinois have a long tradition of working together in a bipartisan manner, dating back to former Democratic Sen. Alan Dixon and former House Republican Leader Bob Michel. The entire delegation regularly lunches together to talk about issues of local concern.

Both Emanuel and LaHood said the dinner grew out of their own close friendship that evolved from an easy working relationship. Following the meal, the pair planned to split the tab between them.

"Here Rahm is of the Jewish faith and I am an Arab-American," LaHood noted. "Maybe between the two of us, if they put us in charge of the Israeli-Palestinian negotiations, perhaps he and I could get it settled."

New Coalition Aims To Keep Dems In Check (AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn

AP, January 23, 2007

Democratic lawmakers who stray too far from the party line could find themselves facing primary opponents financed by unions, trial lawyers and political activists eager to put the new congressional majority to the test.

After two weeks of near perfect unity, congressional Democrats now move into more divisive territory that will test party discipline on such issues as the war in Iraq, worker rights and health care.

Anti-war activists led by groups such as MoveOn.org and Win Without War have already mobilized, pressuring Democrats and Republicans to denounce President Bush's troop boosting plan for Iraq. But they also want tougher action, arguing that the elections that put Democrats in power were a referendum on the war.

This week, an influential group of organizers from labor and the liberal movement are banding together to hold Democrats in line on populist issues such as expanded health care, trade restrictions and worker protections.

"The idea is that this election was a watershed," said Steve Rosenthal, one of the main organizers of the new labor coalition. "There is a great opportunity to begin moving America in a new direction of economic populism and fairness."

The coalition has organized two entities — a lobbying wing called They Work For Us and a campaign arm called Working for Us PAC — that will target lawmakers who don't support their agenda of raising wages, increasing jobs, providing more affordable health care and preventing job losses to foreign countries.

"Our PAC will encourage Democrats to act like Democrats — and if they don't — they better get out of the way," Rosenthal wrote in a memorandum describing the organization.

Outside pressure on Democrats is a sensitive issue within the party caucus. Democrats acknowledge the need for party discipline, but also recognize the different blocs that make up the party. Voters last November elected new Democrats from liberal, moderate and conservative districts. These Democrats won in a variety of regions and often defy tidy ideological descriptions.

"Instilling party discipline in our party is simply harder than in the Republican Party," said Simon Rosenberg, head of the New Democrat Network. "We are a more diverse party than they are."

Rosenthal said his coalition won't target Democrats with moderate or conservative constituencies. As an example, he cited Heath Shuler, a former NFL quarterback who won a previously Republican seat in North Carolina. He ran as an opponent of abortion and gun control. But he voiced opposition to the North American Free Trade Agreement, a Clinton presidency deal long decried by organized labor.

"We're not trying to force people to the left of their districts," Rosenthal said. "We want to make sure that Democrats primarily represent their districts."

But They Work for Us is also naming lawmakers who coalition members say have defied their agenda and are out of step with their districts. Among them are Democratic Reps. Ellen Tauscher of California, Henry Cuellar of Texas and Al Wynn of Maryland.

Tauscher spokesman Kevin Lawlor said such attention is undeserved.

"Rep. Tauscher and her 63 New Dem colleagues were in lockstep with Speaker Pelosi and the Democratic Leadership throughout the first 100 hours" of the new congressional session, Lawlor said. "Rep. Tauscher was elected with 67 percent of the total vote last November, a number that far exceeds top-of-the ticket Democrats in her district."

In the first two weeks of this congressional session, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California pushed through a new package of ethics rules and popular legislation raising the minimum wage, expanding embryonic stem cell research, lowering student loan rates, requiring the government to negotiate Medicare drug prices and ending oil company subsidies. They all passed with unanimous or near unanimous support from Democrats and from Republicans as well.

"We're going to look for those issues that have a consensus within the caucus," said Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., the new chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, the political arm of the House Democrats.

But Democrats also have vowed to go beyond those votes. And it is the details of further legislation that could put the party divisions on display.

"There will be good days and there will be bad days," said Rep. Rahm Emanuel, D-Ill., who is credited for writing the script for the House Democratic victories last year. "You have the energy of the new members and the experience of the more senior members and you have to combine the two."

The war is likely to be the first test.

In the Senate, Democrats are trying to rally Republicans to their side on a nonbinding resolution opposing Bush's plan to increase troops in Iraq. The House would likely follow. Anti-war groups, however, see this is as a beginning, not an end.

"What the leadership is saying is, 'Look, we're going to take this in steps,'" said former Rep. Tom Andrews, D-Maine, head of the anti-war groups Win Without War. "The first step is going to be a nonbinding resolution. That leaves people wondering, 'OK, what is the next step?

A coalition of anti-war groups is primarily pressuring Republicans to oppose the president's new plan in Iraq. But it is also mobilizing voters to contact lawmakers from both parties to emphasize opposition to the war as well.

"If Democrats fail on that core issue," Andrews said, "all other issues are going to be much more difficult."

GOP Pushes For Stricter Ethics Reform (WT)

By S.a. Miller

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

The debates on a House bill that would nix federal pensions for convicted lawmakers and a Senate measure to cut pork spending underscored how scandal-scarred Republicans are backing broader ethics reforms than the new Democratic majority is.

"We did have colleagues who violated the trust of the Congress and the public. We have to fix it," said Rep. Lee Terry, a Nebraska Republican whose pension-reform bill was sidelined by Democratic leaders in favor of a weaker bill. "When one of our own breaks the rules, we don't rally around them."

The House yesterday started considering a bill by Rep. Nancy Boyda, Kansas Democrat, that denies federal pensions to members of Congress convicted of bribery, perjury and conspiracy offenses related to the lawmaker's office. A vote could come as soon as today.

Separate bills by Mr. Terry and Rep. Mark Steven Kirk, Illinois Republican, would have withheld the pension from lawmakers convicted of a longer list of felonies, including some unrelated to abuse of office -- ranging from white-collar embezzlement crimes to political crimes such as securing campaign contributions by intimidation.

The Democratic bill had a shorter list of pension-losing crimes because the leadership promised "this bill can be passed and enacted into law as soon as possible," said Shanan Guinn, spokeswoman for Mrs. Boyda.

Meanwhile, Senate Democrats fought to defeat a Republican measure that would authorize the president to remove earmarks -- and send them back to Congress for a second look and another vote. Earmarks, or pork, are provisions in a bill to fund specific projects, often used by members of Congress to pay for pet projects in their home districts or states.

Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, said through a spokesman that earmark reform was just a ruse to pass a "line-item veto."

"It would be used to attack Social Security, Medicare and other items for those with the greatest need," spokesman Jim Manley said.

Under the proposal, the power to revise spending bills differs from a line-item veto in that either the House or Senate can reject it with a simple majority vote. Congress passed a true line-item veto in 1996, which would have required a two-thirds majority in both chambers to override. The Supreme Court declared the veto unconstitutional two years later.

Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, called it a common-sense approach to fiscal responsibility.

"Americans are watching, and we are committed to ensuring that this common-sense reform gets the vote it deserves," he said. "Fiscal responsibility is not just an Election Day issue. If we are serious about reform, we must take the steps necessary to connect fiscal rhetoric with fiscal reality."

A vote on the amendment could come as soon as tomorrow.

Mr. McConnell co-sponsored the amendment with Sen. Judd Gregg, New Hampshire Republican.

The amendment was originally attached to an ethics reform bill and nearly doomed that legislation when Sen. Robert C. Byrd, West Virginia Democrat, single-handedly blocked a deal to give Republicans the vote they demanded. The ethics bill passed 96-2 Thursday after both sides agreed to debate the earmark provision with the minimum-wage bill.

On the Senate floor yesterday, Mr. Byrd said revision authority was "a piece of garbage" and argued that Congress should not abdicate the "power of the purse" to the executive branch.

Other Republican-proposed ethics reforms have met resistance.

Last week, Senate Democrats initially balked at a Republican-backed measure to disclose all earmarks as opposed to just a sliver of the earmarks, as the majority proposed. In the face of criticism, Mr. Reid changed course and embraced the bill after delaying a final vote when the proposal unexpectedly survived a procedural vote to kill it.

The Senate voted 98-0 to adopt the measure as an amendment to ethics legislation, with 38 Democrats and seven Republicans switching their votes to support the measure they had opposed.

Similarly, pension reform was not originally part of the agenda for House Democrats. They adopted the cause after the Senate passed it and Mr. Terry and Mr. Kirk introduced their bills.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer then assigned the bill to Mrs. Boyda, a freshman from a vulnerable district who made a strong issue of campaigning against Washington corruption.

Mr. Hoyer was restrained in his praise for Mrs. Boyda's bill, saying that it "could be better, but it is timely" and that Congress needs "to do the right thing" on ethics.

Neither the Boyda bill nor the Republican proposals would be retroactive. Pensions will still go to convicted felons such as former Republican congressman Bob Ney, who was sentenced Friday to 30 months in prison for bribery involving disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. When Ney turns 62 in 2016, he will be eligible for an estimated $29,000 annual pension.

Senate Jet Rule Would Cost Others, Too (USAT)

By Fredreka Schouten

USA Today, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — The Senate's plan to require members traveling aboard plush private jets to pay full charter fares also would force changes in travel by all presidential candidates.

Under the Senate-passed ethics bill, senators extended their new rules for reimbursement of such travel to any candidate seeking federal office. That means anyone running for Congress or president would have to pay jet owners the charter cost of travel on the planes.

Currently, lawmakers flying aboard such jets — often owned or leased by businesses and labor unions — pay the equivalent of a first-class ticket using campaign funds or their office accounts if the trip is for official business.

For example, a lawmaker would pay about $800, equivalent to a first-class ticket, for a corporate jet trip between Washington and Los Angeles. The cost of a 12-seat Gulfstream: $31,450. Under the new rules, a senator or candidate would pay either all or part of that charter cost, depending on the number of lawmakers and aides on the jet.

"The companies don't just fly us around out of the goodness of their hearts," said Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., a likely 2008 presidential candidate. Obama stopped using private jets at the lower rate last year.

House ethics rules, approved earlier this month, ban all corporate jet travel. The Senate measure exempts senators who have their own planes or whose spouses own them. The two measures must be reconciled by Congress.

Travel aboard private planes has long been a favored perk for members of Congress and presidential candidates. The practice came under scrutiny during the investigation of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who paid for trips by members on private jets.

Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney, a likely GOP presidential candidate, said he would pay the higher charter rate if the Senate rule becomes law. Romney "travels commercial unless there are the time constraints of a loaded schedule," aide Kevin Madden said. As governor, Romney faced criticism for a 2005 California trip on a Pfizer jet.

As a senator, Democrat John Edwards spent more than $325,000 in campaign money on private planes, mostly while he ran for the White House in 2004, according to PoliticalMoneyLine, which analyzes campaign data. That was the most of any senator in 2001-05. Edwards spokeswoman Andrea Purse declined to comment.

The six senators who have taken steps to formally run for president supported the travel rule.

Revealing The Bundlers (WP)

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

REP. CHRIS Van Hollen (D-Md.) has a new job, but he's sticking with an old idea that could make it more complicated. Mr. Van Hollen's new job is to lead the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, meaning that he's responsible for helping House Democrats retain their majority and for coming up with the campaign cash to make that happen. That's where his old idea -- and the potential complication -- come in.

Last year, as the House Judiciary Committee was debating lobbying reform, Mr. Van Hollen offered an amendment that would have required lobbyists to report not just the campaign contributions they give directly to lawmakers but also the campaign checks they "bundle," or solicit for or deliver to lawmakers. Astonishingly, this proposal passed the Judiciary Committee by a vote of 28 to 4. Less astonishingly, the provision had disappeared from the final version of the bill when it was brought up for debate on the House floor.

Now, with Democrats in charge of the House and Mr. Van Hollen ensconced at the campaign committee, the obvious temptation would be to let the matter drop. After all, good relations with lobbyists -- and a steady stream of cash from K Street -- are essential to the fundraising of both parties. Shining a light on the role of these lobbyists might not be particularly comfortable for those on either side of the transaction. To his credit, Mr. Van Hollen, along with Rep. Martin T. Meehan (D-Mass.), plans to introduce a measure today that would require such disclosure. It mirrors the language of a bundling provision included in the ethics and lobbying legislation the Senate passed last week.

Mr. Van Hollen discounts the notion that his proposal could make his campaign committee job harder. "The rule will apply to everybody equally. The politics of it is probably a wash," he told us. "In terms of the public good, it's the right thing to do. The entire purpose of this is to begin to break that nexus between lawmaking, on the one hand, and the practice of bundling that lobbyists use to enhance their influence in that process."

For the first time, lobbyists would be required to list the fundraisers that they or their clients hosted and the amounts that were raised. They would have to provide a good-faith estimate of the total contributions they "collected or arranged" for individual candidates or political committees. In other words, they would have to provide the kind of information that is well known to those on the inside of the process but is obscured from outsiders. Mr. Van Hollen is right to insist that the bundlers be brought to light.

FEDERAL DIARY: Many Managers Resist The Call For More Telecommuting (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Concerns over employee productivity and a lack of control over employee activities make it difficult for federal managers to support telecommuting, according to a survey released yesterday.

But federal managers also think telecommuting improves "work-life balance" for employees, and makes their agencies more competitive in hiring and keeping employees, the survey found.

The survey was sponsored by the Telework Exchange, which brings federal officials and technology professionals together to promote telecommuting, and the Federal Managers Association, which represents the interests of nearly 200,000 supervisors and managers across government. The survey was underwritten by Tandberg, a company that makes software for video, voice and other data.

Darryl Perkinson, president of the managers association, called the survey "pretty accurate and reflective" of opinions held by federal managers, even though a relatively small number, 214, responded.

Perkinson acknowledged that allowing federal employees to work from home raises difficult questions and is not appropriate for some occupations. He added, "I don't think we need to give up on telework," especially if it could be a job perk that helps the government attract top-notch job applicants or lure back retirees interested in working part time or on projects.

Bush administration officials and some members of Congress, such as Rep. Frank R. Wolf (R-Va.), have urged federal agencies to allow employees to work from home at least one day a week or at the 14 telework centers in this region sponsored by the General Services Administration. They think telecommuting can ease traffic congestion and pollution in the region and also help agencies get their work done in the event of a natural disaster or a crisis that forces office shutdowns.

The most recent data show that only 19 percent of eligible federal workers can be considered telecommuters, and managerial resistance is seen as the reason for what some officials consider to be a relatively low participation rate, given the size of the government.

Federal managers were asked in the survey whether they think their agencies support telecommuting: 35 percent said yes, 47 percent said no and 18 percent were unsure.

Regardless of their involvement in telecommuting programs, almost three-quarters of respondents cited two common concerns: fear of losing control over employees and loss of productivity.

That stands in contrast with the common perception that lack of funding and security issues keep managers from embracing telework. Last year, a survey of 200 federal technology officials found that nearly 40 percent worried about security breaches involving telecommuters. The technology officials listed concerns about remote access to systems, violation of employee privacy and disruption of agency operations.

But the survey of federal managers showed that managers who are most involved in telecommuting -- and telecommute themselves -- hold more favorable attitudes than their colleagues: 21 percent of managers who telecommute said they were concerned about security issues, compared with 43 percent of managers who have no telecommuters in their office.

Still, federal managers in the survey said telecommuting programs can affect productivity by making it more challenging to communicate with employees. Thirty-two percent cited the lack of face-to-face contact with employees as a problem, and 22 percent cited the inability to sit around a table with employees as a disadvantage.

The mangers also said they do not see e-mail and voice messages as a substitute for face-to-face contact, with 61 percent saying they had misinterpreted e-mail and 43 percent saying they had misunderstood a phone message from co-workers.GSA Increases Mileage Rate

The General Services Administration announced yesterday that the standard mileage reimbursement rate for federal employees who use their cars for official business will be increased to 48.5 cents per mile, a 4-cent increase over the current rate. The new rate becomes effective Feb. 1, the GSA said, noting that it mirrors the rate adjustment approved by the Internal Revenue Service last year.

Et Tu, George? (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

Maybe George W. Bush is the education president after all. Whatever one thinks of his No Child Left Behind initiative, he has made the classics powerfully resonant today.

So for those schoolchildren and university students out there struggling through “Moby-Dick” or the “Aeneid,” take heart! They’re not just about white whales or Trojan wanderers — they’re also about President Bush and Iraq.

Forget the Vietnam analogy that critics of the Iraq war usually toss out. A more trenchant analysis of Iraq-style adventures appears in the histories of Thucydides, written 2,400 years ago.

Great Athenian diplomats of the day, like Nicias, warned against military involvement in Sicily, calling it “a war that does not concern us,” according to Thucydides. But smooth-talking neocons of the day, like the brilliant Alcibiades, said in effect that the Sicilians would welcome the Athenians with flowers. He promised that they would be treated not as occupiers but as liberators.

“We shall have many barbarians ... join us,” Alcibiades declared, and he argued that the enemy would be easily defeated “rabble.” “Never were the Peloponnesians more hopeless against us,” he told the crowds.

So the Athenians rallied around the flag and dispatched a huge force. But as Thucydides notes, they had suffered a grievous intelligence failure: they did not get the support they had counted on, and the enemy was far larger and more organized than they had anticipated. The war went badly, and eventually Athens was forced to confront two options: withdraw or escalate.

The Athenians, deciding that defeat was not an option, went with the “surge.” They dispatched an additional 70-odd ships and 5,000 troops.

The result was a catastrophic defeat. Thousands of Athenians were killed far from home, and others were sold into slavery. The Athenian navy was destroyed, and the double-or-nothing gambit meant that other nonaligned states sided with the Athenians’ enemy, Sparta.

Within a few years, Athenian democracy had collapsed, and Athens, the great city-state of the ancient world, had been conquered by Sparta.

DOJ_NMG_0120559

President Bush has lent a new thrill to readers of Virgil's account of the adventures of Aeneas from Troy to Rome. A marvelous new translation of the "Aeneid," by Robert Fagles, has just been published, and critics (and Professor Fagles himself) have noted its relevance: Virgil is suddenly newsy.

That's because this is a tale of war and empire, and a constant subtext is how easy it is to be uncivilized when promoting civilization.

Aeneas is an exponent of reason who at the end of the book confronts an enemy who pleads with him to "go no further down the road of hatred." Aeneas sees that the enemy is wearing the sword-belt of his slain friend, and reason dissolves into fury: "Blazing with wrath," he plants his iron sword "hilt-deep in his enemy's heart." In war, moderation is the first casualty.

Yet the single best guide to Mr. Bush's presidency may be "Moby-Dick." Melville's book is, of course, about much more than Captain Ahab's pursuit of the white whale — a "nameless, inscrutable, unearthly" symbol of all that is dark and unknown in the world.

Rather, it is an allegory about the cost of obsession. Ahab has a reasonable goal, capturing a whale, yet he allows this quest to overwhelm him and erode his sense of perspective and balance. Ignoring warnings, refusing to admit error, Ahab abandons all rules and limits in his quest.

Ahab finally throws his pipe overboard; he will enjoy no pleasures until he gets that whale. The fanaticism becomes self-destructive, eventually destroying Ahab and his ship.

To me at least, Melville captures the trajectory of the Bush years. It begins with a president who started out after 9/11 with immense support at home and abroad and a genuine mandate to fight terrorism. But then Mr. Bush became obsessed by his responsibility to prevent another terror attack.

This was an eminently worthy goal, but Mr. Bush abandoned traditional rules and boundaries — like bans on torture and indefinite detentions — and eventually blundered into Iraq. And in a way that Melville could have foretold, the compulsive search for security ended up creating insecurity.

Melville's lesson is that even a heroic quest can be destructive when we abandon all sense of limits. And at a time when we hear the siren calls of moral clarity, the classics almost invariably emphasize the importance of moral nuance, an appreciation for complexity, the need for humility.

So, students, study those classics. They are timeless — and in the days of the Iraq war and Guantánamo, they have never been more timely.

US Productivity Growth Lowest For A Decade (FT)

By Chris Giles In London

Financial Times, January 23, 2007

The US economy last year recorded its lowest rate of labour productivity growth in more than a decade, with growth in output per hour worked falling behind the EU and Japan. The fall casts further doubt on the ability of the Federal Reserve to cut interest rates as the US economy slows.

Research to be published on Tuesday by the Conference Board, the international business organisation, shows that US labour productivity in the whole economy grew by 1.4 per cent in 2006 as slower economic growth was combined with a rapid rise in employment.

Gail Fosler, the chief economist of the Conference Board, told the Financial Times that the fall in productivity growth was unlikely to be cyclical and the result of weaker gains in services' industries, raising "concerns about the long-lasting productivity impact of information and communications technology".

If weak productivity growth continues, she said, "even in a slow growth environment, the US economy will be performing close to its potential", restricting the Fed's ability to cut interest rates.

Better economic figures released this year, alongside emerging signs of a slowdown in US economic potential, has led to tumbling market expectations of a rate cut in recent weeks. Investors now believe that there is only about a 10 per cent chance of a reduction in official interest rates by the May meeting of the Fed's interest rate-setting committee, according to the Federal Reserve Bank of Cleveland.

The US slowdown in whole economy productivity growth over the past three years - to a rate half that in 2002 and 2003 - contrasts with rising productivity growth in Japan, on the back of a surge in manufacturing exports on the Conference Board's internationally comparable figures.

Japan's labour productivity grew by 2.5 per cent in 2006 as manufacturing companies took advantage of new demand from China in addition to its traditional export destinations.

Europe improved its productivity performance considerably last year as it enjoyed its first year of strong economic growth since 2000. However, the improvement in Nordic countries and Germany masked continued weakness in southern Europe, where growth was generated by surging employment rather than an improvement in the efficiency of the economies of Spain, Italy and Portugal.

The Conference Board recorded that productivity growth remained extremely high in emerging countries of China, India and Eastern Europe, as inefficient companies fell away and huge numbers of workers moved from relatively inefficient sectors such as agriculture to manufacturing.

China recorded 9.5 per cent productivity growth in 2006, while India achieved 6.9 per cent and the 12 new EU member states achieved 4.1 per cent growth.

Earnings Growth Fears Push Stocks Down (USAT/BLOOM)

USA Today, January 23, 2007

NEW YORK — Stocks fell Monday, sending the Dow Jones industrial average to its biggest decline in two months, on concern that reduced demand and increased competition will hurt corporate earnings growth.

The Dow slid 88.37 points, or 0.7%, to 12,477.16, its fourth-consecutive decrease since closing at a new high and biggest retreat since Nov. 27. The Standard & Poor's 500 fell 7.55 points, or 0.5%, to 1422.95. The Nasdaq composite lost 20.24 points, or 0.8%, to 2431.07.

Motorola, the world's second-largest mobile-phone maker, fell 55 cents to $18.72 and led technology shares lower after Piper Jaffray said the company's profit margins may be crimped by rivals' products. Boeing dropped $3.03 to $85.60 after Wachovia Securities downgraded the second-largest commercial-jet maker on concern deliveries for new aircraft may be delayed.

The retreat followed reports last week from Intel and IBM that suggested analysts may have to lower earnings estimates. Profits among S&P 500 companies are expected to rise 6.1% in the first quarter, according to analyst projections compiled by Bloomberg, down from a forecast of 7.8% made two months ago.

"We're not going to keep the same pace of earnings that we've seen in the past," says Barry James, chief equity strategist at James Investment Research. "That will eventually pass through the psyche of investors, and we're seeing that with the start of earnings season right now."

Eaton, the second-biggest maker of hydraulic equipment, lost $3.85 to $73.80 and was the biggest loser in the S&P 500 after the company said lower truck production will hurt orders. Pfizer fell 27 cents to $26.95 after the world's largest drugmaker said it will lay off 10,000 workers to reduce costs (story, 1B).

Stocks were also dragged lower as natural gas futures rose to one-month highs on forecasts of colder-than-normal weather for much of the USA (story, 3B). Earlier gains in crude and heating oil futures were erased after midday.

All 10 major industry groups in the S&P 500 declined. A measure of consumer-related stocks fell for the first time in two weeks as concern grew that higher heating costs would limit spending and boost inflation. Federal Reserve Bank of Richmond President Jeffrey Lacker said late last week that inflation is still the "predominant" risk for policymakers because the recent slowing in price increases might be temporary.

P=MV/Q (WSJ)

By Robert D. Mcteer

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

The main question on financial TV lately has been whether the economy will continue to weaken and possibly slip into recession, but allow inflation to decelerate, or whether it will pick up and cause inflation to accelerate. More slack in the economy, or a larger output gap, would reduce inflation; more output, it is presumed, would make inflation worse. While a weaker economy might well reduce inflation, that isn't a necessary condition. Faster growth can also reduce inflation.

While inflation may respond to a reduction in aggregate demand, it would also logically respond to an increase in aggregate supply. In the simple equation of exchange, MV=PQ, so P=MV/Q. In other words, other things equal, prices respond positively to an increase in MV, or aggregate demand, and negatively to an increase in Q, or aggregate supply. This is not rocket science.

But it is a truism rarely articulated. The Phillips Curve is rarely mentioned anymore, but it still pervades the common view that inflation can be tamed only through a weaker economy. Disinflationary growth is not considered an option, probably because we think of output as responding only passively to changes in aggregate demand, so that they rise together or fall together.

That may be the usual case, but it doesn't have to be. Supply-side factors may stimulate output independent of aggregate demand, through shifts in investment, exports or shifts from imports to domestically produced goods. Or animal spirits.

Monetary policy is currently in pause mode as far as interest rates are concerned, but moderate increases in the monetary base must be considered anti-inflationary whether output remains weak, or strengthens, as I expect.

Supply-side economics is out of favor at universities that don't have good football teams. But that's largely because its bar for success has been raised too high. Tax-rate cuts may not fully pay for themselves at current rate levels, but they certainly have gone a long way in that direction, as the recent sharp decline in the budget deficit despite rapid spending growth clearly indicates. Tax-rate cuts that substantially pay for themselves in higher tax revenue are clearly a good thing.

Our economy is remarkably healthy. Inflation has crept above our comfort zone, but current policies are bringing it down without a recession. Monetary policy is just about right, and is being helped in its fight against inflation by other factors: the Internet, globalization, China, India and other new players. Let's not be afraid of growth.

Mr. McTeer is a distinguished fellow of the National Center for Policy Analysis and former president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas.

Class Of '07 Gets Plenty Of Job Offers (WSJ)

By Erin White

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

Employers are diving back into the fountain of youth.

This year is shaping up as the strongest for college recruiting since the downturn earlier this decade, colleges report. Traditionally heavy recruiters, including management consulting firms, investment banks and accounting firms, are intensifying college recruiting efforts. They're also facing more competition from other employers in such fields as technology, consumer products, government and even nonprofits.

Employers plan to hire 17% more graduates from the class of 2007 than they got from the class of 2006, according to the National Association of Colleges and Employers. That would make this year the strongest job market since 2000-2001, the association says. More than half of the surveyed employers said they planned to increase hiring; only 5% planned a decrease. Salaries were forecast to rise 4.6%, according to another survey by the same group.

"We now again have the nice problem of having to help some of our students choose among multiple job offers," says Jack Tinker, director of recruiting at the career office of Connecticut College. Mike Hendel, interim director for the career center at Carleton College in Northfield, Minn., says he, too, is counseling students deciding among "two or three really good offers."

Behind the increased recruiting are a relatively strong economy, growing business demands and heady corporate profits. Employers created about 1.8 million additional jobs in 2006. Average weekly earnings rose 4.5%, compared with a 3.2% increase in 2005.

Some companies are also planning for future work-force needs as the baby boomers' retirement looms. Employers "are finally starting to get the message that [they] really need to do more" with college recruiting as baby boomers age, says Dan Black, director of campus recruiting for the Americas at Ernst & Young LLP.

At New York University, close to 40% of seniors have job offers, which is more at this point in the year than in any year since 1998-99, estimates Trudy Steinfeld, executive director of career development. Salaries are up about 5% to 10% since last year, and companies are offering bigger signing bonuses -- up to $10,000, she says.

At the University of Chicago, 119 companies conducted on-campus interviews with seniors during the fall quarter, compared with 93 a year earlier. Employers posted 180 jobs in that quarter, up from 135 a year before. Recruiting mainstays such as management-consulting and financial-services firms are active at Chicago, but so are nonprofits and public-service groups: About 15 such organizations have expressed interest in an April career fair, compared with none at this time last year, says Meredith Daw, co-director of career advising and planning services.

At a November job fair in Boston, the 12 sponsoring schools turned away at least five employers clamoring for space. At the University of California, Los Angeles, officials squeezed 10 additional employers into a job fair last week that they had initially limited to 100 employers. Many of the companies attended a fall fair but need more recruits.

Christopher Bothur, a Connecticut College senior, in the fall accepted a job in an analyst-training program at Deutsche Bank AG. Earlier, he had spoken briefly with the bank about a possible summer internship, but he spent the summer working for the United Nations in China.

When he returned to school, the bank called him, whisked him to New York for interviews and offered him a position that will include stints in New York, London and China. "The job kind of fell into my lap," he says. Mr. Bothur says his base salary alone will be roughly twice as much as it would have been at the think-tank jobs he was considering.

College career counselors say the tone of campus recruiting doesn't approach the dot-com era frenzy, among employers or students. Students saw older friends and siblings suffer through the downturn earlier this decade, and they understand that the job market could tank again. And while the economy as a whole is strong, sectors such as housing and autos are suffering.

One employer contributing to the rising demand on campuses is accounting and consulting firm Deloitte & Touche. The firm is recruiting about 3,300 seniors for full-time positions in the U.S. this year, up from fewer than 3,100 last year, says Diane Borhani, head of U.S. campus recruiting.

To attract candidates, Deloitte is raising salaries and signing bonuses. Full-time starting base salaries in the U.S. are up about 5% on average to as much as roughly $60,000 in certain markets. Signing bonuses for new college hires in consulting range from $6,000 to $10,000 this year, up from $4,000 to $8,000 last year, Ms. Borhani says.

Employers also hit campuses earlier. Yum Brands Inc., which markets restaurant chains including Taco Bell and KFC, sent students welcome-back postcards and emails in August, the earliest it has ever started campus recruiting efforts. "We tried to be there literally the day that they got to school," says Misty Reich, Yum's vice president of global talent management. Recruiters and senior executives soon followed.

Companies are also trying to make their recruiting efforts more personal. The management consultancy Boston Consulting Group sent more young employees to campus this fall to talk one on one about life at the firm.

Personal outreach went a long way to recruit Wayne Vonder Heide, a 21-year-old senior at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign, who recently accepted a management-training position at Kraft Foods Inc. He interviewed with about a dozen companies last fall, mostly for sales positions. "Just seeing how many jobs are out there was really encouraging," says Mr. Vonder Heide, an advertising major with a business minor. He was confident enough in his prospects that he spurned follow-up interviews with about four companies.

Around Thanksgiving, Kraft offered him a post in Cincinnati. Management trainees contacted him and the company invited him to tour the office there. He met his would-be co-workers; one took him around the city, including neighborhoods popular with young professionals. "I could really see myself getting up every day and going to this office and getting along well with all of these employees," Mr. Vonder Heide says. "That was a deciding factor."

Why Job Churn Is Good (WP)

By Robert M. Kimmitt

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

More than 55 million Americans, or four out of every 10 workers, left their jobs in 2005. And this is good news, because there were over 57 million new hires that same year.

These statistics illustrate a recent and growing trend of dynamism in our job market, especially among younger workers. Data on labor demand in the United States, gathered for the Job Openings and Labor Turnover Survey (JOLTS), show that the 12 months ending in November had the highest average of labor turnover since the U.S. government began tracking this information in 2000. But the data also show that our economy has maintained a consistently strong ratio of new hires to separations. Over the year ending in November, new hires in America exceeded employee separations by an average of 364,000 per month.

Indeed, the data show that each month millions of Americans leave their jobs -- most of them voluntarily -- and millions more are hired. This is what we want: an economy in which people looking to move up have as many opportunities as possible from which to choose. Promoting this dynamism, and the opportunities it creates, should be a focus of our economic policy.

This flexibility of our job market is one key reason the United States successfully competes in an increasingly interconnected global economy. In fact, our workers lead the international marketplace in this trend. Job tenure averages 6.6 years for Americans, compared with an average of 8.2 years for Britons, 10.6 years for Germans, 11.2 years for the French and 12.2 years for the Japanese. Even more striking is that, on average, workers in the United States will have 10 different employers between ages 18 and 38.

This dynamism of our labor force strengthens the U.S. economy because each move to a new employer can involve greater responsibility, greater pay or both. And the time workers spend in search of employment is decreasing. In December, the average duration of a job search was the shortest in more than four years.

Unfortunately, what usually makes headlines is a big company's layoff of workers. What gets less coverage is the 40 months of job growth we have recently enjoyed, the historically low unemployment rate (4.5 percent), record tax revenue and an acceleration in real wage growth over the past year. This is good news for the generation preparing to graduate from high school and college. Unlike their grandparents, who built careers around companies rather than opportunities, members of the class of 2007 will enter the workforce with an understanding that change may be the only constant in their professional careers.

The dynamism of our workforce helps keep the United States competitive because it increases not only the number of jobs available but also the productivity of those holding jobs. U.S. productivity has steadily accelerated over the past three decades, as workers look to improve their standard of living and pursue different opportunities through new employment.

The challenge for policymakers is to keep pace with the dynamism of our economy, since the trend is likely to accelerate in the future. Governments, both federal and state, must build upon and support the institutions that make our country great. One strength is our educational system. Americans seeking to make job changes have a resource not found elsewhere in the world: our nation's community college system, which provides higher education and the chance for workers to retrain at a relatively minimal cost after they enter the workforce.

Government must also ensure that neither fiscal nor regulatory policy impedes the growing dynamism of our economy. For example, job seekers would benefit from the freedom to change employment without having to disrupt their health coverage and their retirement savings plans. Recognizing this, we will work throughout the administration to implement policies that both keep pace with the rapid change in our economy and strengthen our position in the international marketplace.

Consistently Conservative Small-Business Lobby Reaches Out To Democrats (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

The National Federation of Independent Business is a bastion of Republicanism. Its staff has for decades been a farm team for GOP operatives and its campaign giving has been notably one-sided. Of all major lobbying organizations last year, NFIB gave the lowest share of its political action committee money to Democrats, a mere 8 percent.

But with Democrats now in charge on Capitol Hill, NFIB says it's changing. Its new president, Todd A. Stottlemyer, 43, wants to rebrand the nation's premier small-business lobby as "nonpartisan," and to prove his resolve he is talking extensively to Democrats and preparing to donate more to their coffers. "We're trying to reach out," he said. "It doesn't matter if you're an R or a D."

With many lobbying shops scooping up Democrats after last November's elections, Stottlemyer's effort may not seem that newsworthy. But for NFIB, it is huge. Stottlemyer's predecessor, Jack Faris, was viewed as a zealous partisan. A former executive director of the Republican National Finance Committee, Faris stopped talking even to pro-business Democrats in the House after he got involved in a shouting match over dinner with a group of Blue Dogs half a dozen years ago. NFIB, under Faris, also boasted of its role in defeating two of Congress's highest-ranking Democrats, House Speaker Thomas S. Foley (Wash.) and Senate Minority Leader Thomas A. Daschle (S.D.).

Now, however, Stottlemyer and his right-hand man, Executive Vice President Dan Danner, are working to rebuild the bridges that Faris burned. Stottlemyer, who declined to talk about Faris, has met with and offered to cooperate with such prominent Blue Dogs as Reps. Allen Boyd (Fla.) and John Tanner (Tenn.). In the Senate, he has visited moderates such as Blanche Lincoln (Ark.), Ben Nelson (Neb.) and Ken Salazar (Colo.), and asked them to join him on several issues, especially health care.

And in a move that the Faris-led NFIB would never have made, the organization did not list as one of its "key votes" of the year the House Democrats' recent push to increase the minimum wage. Small businesses despise few policies more, yet NFIB decided that the measure's success was preordained and that listing its defeat as a top priority would only antagonize the Democrats it now aspires to court.

One of those is Rep. Albert R. Wynn (Md.). Late last year, NFIB dispatched volunteers and a few of its lobbyists to help his campaign. Wynn is exactly the kind of middle-of-the-roader that NFIB now wants as an ally. He's also African American, and NFIB's long-term survival depends on attracting more minority members.

"We don't agree on everything," Wynn said of his new suitors. "But we've been able to find some common ground."

Boyd, like much of official Washington, remains dubious. "For the last 10 years, the NFIB was a difficult organization to deal with; it didn't play it straight," he said. "We'll have to see over a period of time how it conducts itself." But because of Stottlemyer's entreaties, Boyd said, "I'm a little optimistic." From a Democrat, that is huge.Ethics Gone Wild

As a good deed, the American Heart Association likes to conduct a mini-class in cardiopulmonary resuscitation for House and Senate staffers. It's a very popular course. But this year, new lobbying rules have gotten in the way.

Association lobbyists asked the House ethics committee if they could provide staffers with a box lunch, a CPR kit (consisting of a training DVD and an inflatable mannequin to practice on) and an hour-long lesson. The committee's lawyers said no to the lunch and the kit (as the lobbyists expected) -- and they also nixed the class. Under the new gift ban, it was deemed a thing of value that a lobbying group could no longer provide. The event has been canceled.

Capitol Hill has never been for the faint of heart. Now, even more so.Republican Hires of the Week

Lobbying is still bipartisan despite the Democratic takeover of Congress, with senior Republicans in big demand.

Asa Hutchinson, the former Arkansas congressman and undersecretary of homeland security, has returned to the law firm Venable. Jennifer Millerwise Dyck, former spokeswoman for Bush-Cheney '04 and the CIA, was hired by APCO Worldwide. John R. Russell IV, a former aide to ex-House speaker J. Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), was brought in by Sonnenschein Nath & Rosenthal.

Womble Carlyle Sandridge & Rice added Tim S. McClain, former general counsel of the Veterans Affairs Department, to help its clients "obtain contracts with the VA and related agencies," a firm spokesman said.

Even all-Republican firms are expanding. Barbour Griffith & Rogers hired Stephen G. Rademaker, an ex-aide to former Senate majority leader Bill Frist (R-Tenn.), and Philip D. Zelikow, former counselor to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

Zelikow has for years served as a one-man think tank for Rice, advising her on Iraq and other policies. His role at the lobbying firm is undefined, though he won't be able to represent a foreign government for a year, said Ed Rogers, its chairman. "We'll see what evolves over time," said Rogers, a Zelikow friend.

But being under investigation is an impediment to a lobbying career for anyone, Republican or Democrat. Lundquist, Nethercutt & Griles split with former deputy interior secretary J. Steven Griles, who is the target of a corruption probe connected to disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff.The Gelman Update

Microsoft's deal with the House Democratic leadership is even sweeter than I reported last week. The software giant has loaned Matt Gelman, its chief House lobbyist, to the whip's office.

It turns out that the stint won't be long at all -- just 59 days -- and for a reason. If Gelman were to stay a congressional consultant for 60 days, he would be barred for a year from lobbying the folks he had just assisted.A New Idea

During a recent Web chat on washingtonpost.com, I received a fresh suggestion from out of the blue. Well, actually it came from Indianapolis -- or at least that was the city the correspondent listed.

Here it is: If you want to jam the revolving door between Congress and the outside world -- and discourage K Street from hiring former congressmen as lobbyists -- then deny a congressional pension to any former lawmaker who registers to lobby. A lawmaker can accept public funds in retirement via his pension, or he can make a living extracting public funds for clients as a lobbyist. But he shouldn't be allowed to do both. Whaddya think?

Clinton Dives In Media Waters (WP)

By Anne E. Kornblut

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

With a call to "let the conversation begin," Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) fielded a handful of pre-selected questions from voters on her presidential campaign's Web site last night, speaking into a video camera as she held forth on movies ("Out of Africa" makes her top three), her football-fanatic brothers and her "nice middle-class upbringing in a suburb of Chicago."

The effort to "humanize" Clinton, as her advisers have put it, was in full swing just two days into her presidential campaign.

In a carefully controlled setting where inquiries about affordable tuition and health care counted among the tougher topics, she reminisced, in response to a question about Hurricane Katrina, about walking the streets of New Orleans on visits when she and her husband lived in Arkansas. She acknowledged that her position papers on energy policy were too "wonkish" for a Web chat and said she turns to her daughter, Chelsea, for "advice and support in every way."

The online chat came amid what, for Clinton, is a media blitz at the outset of her campaign for president. She appeared on all three major television networks last night, is scheduled to appear on the morning shows today, and will hold two more online discussions on her Web site tonight and tomorrow. This weekend she will head to Iowa, which she has not visited for several years.

In her first public forays, Clinton made little substantive news. In an ABC News interview, she would not pledge not to raise taxes. But she also equivocated on whether the costs of the war in Iraq would require a tax increase. "We're going to have to make some tough decisions," she told interviewer Charles Gibson. "We also don't want to be straitjacketed."

On CBS, she told anchor Katie Couric that voters who doubt her ability to win should reserve judgment. "I would say: Give me a chance," she said. "As a friend of mine said the other day, I'm the most famous woman that nobody knows."

Dressed in the same pastel jacket for all her appearances, Clinton sat on a sofa against a soft backdrop of bookshelves and a yellow curtain for her Web chat. She was joined by her campaign's blogger, Crystal Patterson, who read viewer questions aloud. Almost all of the inquiries were from women, and nearly one-third were from New York. One question was about the role Chelsea Clinton will play in the campaign (unclear, her mom said).

She hedged on her favorite movie, saying that, as a child, she had loved "The Wizard of Oz," only to discover "Casablanca" in college and law school, watching it so often that she memorized the lines. (Her passion for the Meryl Streep-Robert Redford classic "Out of Africa" came later, she said.) But she was clear about her own conviction that she can become president.

Responding to a questioner identified only as Barbara in Massachusetts, who asked what she should tell people who do not think the country is ready for a woman to be president, Clinton said: "I hope you'll tell them we won't know until we try."

On Web, Voters Question Clinton Directly (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton strived for an Oprah moment yesterday night, the third of her presidential campaign, by sitting in a fake living-room set and fielding questions on a live video Webcast about her vote for the Iraq war (if she had known then), universal health care (still wants it) and her favorite movies ("The Wizard of Oz," "Casablanca" and "Out of Africa").

But will she attain Oprah Winfrey's ratings? Advisers could not say how many people watched and took Mrs. Clinton's measure during the appearance — or whether any of them were anyone other than her diehard lovers and her diehard haters.

Mrs. Clinton's advisers say the Webcast demonstrates her determination to speak directly to voters, in as many ways as new technology allows, instead of dealing only with a news media that has sometimes been intensely skeptical of her actions and motives.

The questions e-mailed from Linda in Pensacola, Fla., and other visitors to the Web site were vetted by Mrs. Clinton's staff and offered or elicited few surprises. Mrs. Clinton sat on a sofa in front of a bookcase looking relaxed as a young aide read questions from a monitor. Her answers suggested various personas that she wants to convey to voters: a hometown girl, a mother, a moviegoer, a churchgoer, a standard-bearer for women and a critic of the war.

She said she was rooting for the Chicago Bears in the Super Bowl, recalling that she grew up in Illinois (a crucial electoral state and the home of Senator Barack Obama, a rival). She spoke lovingly about her daughter, Chelsea.

She described her three favorite movies, linking herself with other Americans who can recite lines from "Casablanca." She told a 14-year-old girl that when she was young she found inspiration by volunteering through her church.

In response to the first question, about what Mrs. Clinton would say to people who wondered whether a woman could be president, she said it was "important that we demonstrate that women are fully capable to serve in the highest levels of government."

With the second question, about whether she regretted her vote on the Iraq war in 2002, the senator repeated her latest explanation, which she also used yesterday night on the network news programs — that if she knew in 2002 what she knows now "I certainly would not have voted" to authorize military action in Iraq.

Clinton In Clear Lead Over Rivals, Says Poll (FT)

By Eoin Callan In Washington

Financial Times, January 23, 2007

Hillary Clinton has launched her race for the White House with a commanding lead over her Democratic rivals for the 2008 presidential candidacy, according to an opinion poll published on Sunday.

The New York senator moved quickly to toughen her stance over the war in Iraq as she sought to sharpen her differences with President George W. Bush and fend off a challenge from Barack Obama, the first-term senator for Illinois and her closest rival.

In a Washington Post poll on Sunday, Mrs Clinton was backed by 41 per cent of Democrats questioned, more than double the 17 per cent rating of Mr Obama.

The former first lady is expected to lead the crucial early rounds of fundraising by the crowded field of Democratic aspirants – joined on Sunday by Bill Richardson, the New Mexico governor – in spite of a problematic record on both foreign and domestic policy.

Mrs Clinton called for withdrawal of US troops from Baghdad and an eventual end to the occupation of Iraq, which she backed in 2002 by voting in favour of a resolution authorising an invasion.

She did not have "faith" in Nouri al-Maliki, the Iraqi prime minister, as she stayed ahead of her Senate colleagues by backing a binding resolution aimed at stemming the flow of funds to Baghdad.

A separate bipartisan resolution that criticises Mr Bush's decision to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq would be non-binding, while Mrs Clinton's resolution would impose a congressional cap on existing US troop levels.

Her greatest liability on domestic policy is seen as her association with failed healthcare reforms under her husband's presidency.

Healthcare is likely to emerge as a defining issue in the 2008 campaign as the costs of healthcare outstrip inflation and US employers pare back health benefits.

The attention on healthcare is unwelcome for presidential contenders in both parties who are confronted by ideological and fiscal dilemmas in formulating policies to address the problem of uninsured Americans.

But the issue is becoming unavoidable and Mr Bush is expected to use his presidential address tomorrow to introduce legislation that would use tax increases for some workers whose health plans cost more than the national average to fund tax breaks for the uninsured.

Reprise Of 'Hillary Care' (HILL)

By Bob Cusack And Jeffrey Young

The Hill, January 23, 2007

Former President Clinton has signaled privately that his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), will include aggressive healthcare proposals in her campaign for the White House, despite the debacle of what critics labeled "Hillary Care" 14 years ago.

In remarks to Democratic operatives last month, the ex-president caused a buzz by strongly defending the substance of his wife's 1990s plan, claiming it was a moderate, private-sector approach grossly mischaracterized by its critics.

The former president's statements, delivered during a Democratic Leadership Council (DLC) conference at the Charles Hotel in Cambridge, Mass., have been interpreted as signaling that candidate Clinton could revive aspects of her 1993-94 approach that was vilified by Republicans and health-industry groups.

President Clinton pointed out to the group of over 100 Democratic strategists the irony of today's debate on the government's negotiation of prescription-drug prices, saying that was part of "their" plan. The one-hour speech was closed to the press and deemed off the record for those who heard it.

He aggressively attacked the "urban myths" of his administration's plan, rejecting the widespread criticism that it was socialized medicine, according to a person in the room.

The indications are that Sen. Clinton's strategy will be to turn healthcare, a political weakness, into a strength.

"The difference is now for Sen. Clinton that she learned a lot from that experience," said Donna Shalala, who served eight years as secretary of Health and Human Services under President Clinton. "The fact is that she's learned a lot about tactics and a lot about getting things done," said Shalala, who is now president of the University of Miami.

A Democratic healthcare consultant said Sen. Clinton will be vulnerable to attacks again but it would not stop her from tackling the issue head-on.

"She could unveil President Bush's healthcare plan and the Republicans would call it a government takeover of healthcare," the consultant remarked. "People are kind of tired of that rhetoric. … [The GOP] would do that for every presidential candidate who has a 'D' by their name."

It would not work, the consultant predicted, because "if there was ever a more skilled communicator than the Clintons, I haven't seen them."

Judy Feder, professor and dean of the Georgetown Public Policy Institute who ran unsuccessfully against Rep. Frank Wolf (R-Va.) last year, said, "It's a much different time than 1994," adding that the environment for major changes to the nation's healthcare system is "not so poisonous."

The former president's prominence in his wife's campaign will, similarly, be an issue; he was the only one on stage with the senator as she delivered her victory speech after winning reelection on Nov. 7.

The former president told DLC officials that healthcare would be the most important domestic-policy matter of the next election. The Clintons have relied on each other's advice throughout their political careers and that will not change during the senator's White House run, political observers say.

Sen. Clinton is a fundraising machine but has not yet articulated a sound-bite friendly message like former Sen. John Edwards's (D-N.C.) "Two Americas" theme. She is unlikely to base that message on foreign affairs because of her vote for the Iraq war in 2002, which is now unpopular in her party. And she does not want her opponents to own healthcare, an area in which Democrats have traditionally enjoyed huge poll leads over Republicans.

She could use the issue to her advantage, a former Clinton administration official said, because she is "extremely knowledgeable about how the system works."

Shalala agreed, saying, "I believe, knowing Mrs. Clinton, the senator, as well as I do … that no candidate understands healthcare as well as she does." Shalala added, "She also understands the politics."

Said the consultant: "You have less credibility if you haven't been involved in these issues and suddenly you are now. … The public generally thinks that she knows a lot about the system … and that she has something very constructive to offer."

The former official added, "Yes, it's political, but she really cares about it."

Clinton must revisit her failed healthcare initiative soon, and her husband's analysis means she will "not be defensive" about it, said an informed source.

"She's going to reject advice to avoid the issue," the consultant said. "Only people in Washington think that people who have tried and not succeeded shouldn't try again."

President Clinton said to DLC attendees that the 1990s plan failed because it was "overwhelmed" by health-insurance industry opposition and its "Harry and Louise" TV ads.

Sen. Clinton may benefit from the fact that business and healthcare sectors have increasingly aligned with organized labor and other Democratically affiliated interests in calling for federal action to address the rising cost of medical care and the growing ranks of uninsured.

Several states are also moving ahead without national healthcare reform. Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R), another presidential contender, forged a deal with the Democratic-controlled legislature to enact near-universal coverage last year. California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) and Pennsylvania Gov. Ed Rendell (D) also recently proposed sweeping reforms.

Presidential candidates from both parties will have to put forward bold healthcare reforms, the former Clinton administration official said, adding, "I think we're going to have a debate for the next two years. … The 2008 election is going to be a referendum on that debate."

In announcing her bid for the White House and upcoming Web chats, Clinton said, "… and let's definitely talk about how every American can have quality, affordable healthcare."

Clinton's first appearance after announcing her candidacy was at a Manhattan clinic Sunday, when she pushed for the expansion of the State Children's Health Insurance Program (SCHIP).

SCHIP authorization expires this year, providing a prime opportunity for presidential candidates to champion the uninsured. Clinton is a member of the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions (HELP) Committee, which will write the SCHIP bill, and has partnered with House Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.), who will oversee the drafting of a companion bill. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), a leading presidential rival, also sits on the HELP Committee.

President Clinton's office, the DLC and Sen. Clinton's campaign did not comment for this article.

Retreat Isn't An Option (WP)

By Liz Cheney

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Sen. Hillary Clinton declared this weekend, " I'm in to win." Anyone who has watched her remarkable trajectory can have no doubt that she'll do whatever it takes to win the presidency. I wish she felt the same way about the war.

In fairness, Clinton, with her proposal for arbitrary caps on troop levels and hemming and hawing about her vote for the war resolution, has company on both sides of the aisle. Sen. Joseph Lieberman is the only national Democrat showing any courage on this issue. We Republicans -- with help from senators such as Chuck Hagel -- seem ready to race the Democrats to the bottom.

I'd like to ask the politicians in both parties who are heading for the hills to stop and reflect on these basic facts:

Â· We are at war. America faces an existential threat. This is not, as Speaker Nancy Pelosi has claimed, a "situation to be solved." It would be nice if we could wake up tomorrow and say, as Sen. Barack Obama suggested at a Jan. 11 hearing, "Enough is enough." Wishing doesn't make it so. We will have to fight these terrorists to the death somewhere, sometime. We can't negotiate with them or "solve" their jihad. If we quit in Iraq now, we must get ready for a harder, longer, more deadly struggle later.

Â· Quitting helps the terrorists. Few politicians want to be known as spokesmen for retreat. Instead we hear such words as "redeployment," "drawdown" or "troop cap." Let's be clear: If we restrict the ability of our troops to fight and win this war, we help the terrorists. Don't take my word for it. Read the plans of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi and Ayman Zawahiri to drive America from Iraq, establish a base for al-Qaeda and spread jihad across the Middle East. The terrorists are counting on us to lose our will and retreat under pressure. We're in danger of proving them right.

Â· Beware the polls. In November the American people expressed serious concerns about Iraq (and about Republican corruption and scandals). They did not say that they want us to lose this war. They did not say that they want us to allow Iraq to become a base for al-Qaeda to conduct global terrorist operations. They did not say that they would rather we fight the terrorists here at home. Until you see a poll that asks those questions, don't use election results as an excuse to retreat.

Â· Retreat from Iraq hurts us in the broader war. We are fighting the war on terrorism with allies across the globe, leaders such as Hamid Karzai in Afghanistan and Pervez Musharraf in Pakistan. Brave activists are also standing with us, fighting for freedom of speech, freedom of religion, the empowerment of women. They risk their lives every day to defeat the forces of terrorism. They can't win without us, and many of them won't continue to fight if they believe we're abandoning them. Politicians urging America to quit in Iraq should explain how we win the war on terrorism once we've scared all of our allies away.

What about Iran? There is no doubt that an American retreat from Iraq will embolden Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, making it even less likely that the Iranian president will bend to the will of the international community and halt his nuclear weapons program.

A member of Lebanon's parliament recently told me that Lebanese Sunnis, Shiites and Christians are lining up with Iran and Syria to fight against Sunnis, Shiites and Christians who want to stand with America. When I asked him why people were lining up with Iran and Syria, he said, "Because they know Iran and Syria aren't going anyplace. We're not so sure about America."

Â· Our soldiers will win if we let them. Read their blogs. Talk to them. They know that free people must fight to defend their freedom. No force on Earth -- especially not an army of terrorists and insurgents -- can defeat our soldiers militarily. American troops will win if we show even one-tenth the courage here at home that they show every day on the battlefield. And by the way, you cannot wish failure on our soldiers' mission and claim, at the same time, to be supporting the troops. It just doesn't compute.

I suppose Hillary Clinton's announcement was a sign of progress. In 2007, a woman can run for president and show the same level of courage and conviction about this war many of her male colleagues have. Steel in the spine? Not so much.

America deserves better. It's time for everyone -- Republicans and Democrats -- to stop trying to find ways for America to quit. Victory is the only option. We must have the fortitude and the courage to do what it takes. In the words of Winston Churchill, we must deserve victory.

We must be in it to win.

Death Knell May Be Near For Public Election Funds (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — The public financing system for presidential campaigns, a post-Watergate initiative hailed for decades as the best way to rid politics of the corrupting influence of money, may have quietly died over the weekend.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York became the first candidate since the program began in 1976 to forgo public financing for both the primary and the general election because of the spending limits that come with the federal money. By declaring her confidence that she could raise far more than the roughly $150 million the system would provide for the 2008 presidential primaries and general election, Mrs. Clinton makes it difficult for other serious candidates to participate in the system without putting themselves at a significant disadvantage.

Officials of the Federal Election Commission and advisers to several campaigns say they expect the two candidates who reach Election Day 2008 will raise more than $500 million apiece. Including money raised by other primary candidates, the total spent on the presidential election could easily exceed $1 billion.

People involved in the Republican primary campaign of Senator John McCain of Arizona say he, too, is beginning to seek private donations for the primary and general elections, albeit with the option of returning them. A longtime proponent of campaign finance change, Mr. McCain has recently removed his name as a co-sponsor of a bill to expand the presidential public financing program.

Former Gov. Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, another Republican primary contender, has already decided to forgo public financing for the primaries. Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, a rival to Mrs. Clinton for the Democratic nomination, declined to comment, as did spokesmen for several other candidates.

In a sense, Mrs. Clinton was merely confirming what many in Washington already knew: that the public financing system has failed to keep pace with the torrents of money flowing toward the presidential elections. In 2004, President Bush and Senator John Kerry, the Democratic candidate, each opted out of the system for the primaries but not the general election. By accepting the public financing, they had to agree not to raise or spend any private money for the period after their nominating conventions.

But when Mr. Bush raised some $270 million, and Mr. Kerry about $235 million, it became clear that major-party candidates could raise far more from private donors than from the public system.

“The 2008 race will be the longest and most expensive presidential election in American history,” said Michael E. Toner, chairman of the Federal Election Commission. “Top-tier candidates are going to have to raise $100 million by the end of 2007 to be a serious candidate.” He added: “We are looking at a $100 million entry fee.”

The turn away from public financing is the twilight of a system once welcomed as a new era of clean government.

In 1986, a decade after the first publicly financed presidential election, a bipartisan commission headed by Robert Strauss, the former Democratic Party chief, and Melvin R. Laird, the secretary of defense under President Richard M. Nixon, concluded:

"Public financing of presidential elections has clearly proved its worth in opening up the process, reducing the influence of individuals and groups, and virtually ending corruption in presidential election finance."

Formed to curb candidates' dependence on big donors without running afoul of Supreme Court rulings protecting political spending as a form of free speech, the system provides taxpayer money for candidates who voluntarily agree to abide by spending limits.

Any primary candidate who raises an initial $100,000 in small donations receives federal money to match the first $250 of each donation. For 2008, candidates could receive matching grants of as much as $25 million for the primary season, grants of about $15 million for a nominating convention and grants of about $83 million for the general election.

The system is financed by taxpayers who check a box on their returns to allocate $3 to an election fund, with about 33 million people a year in recent years directing a total of about $400 million to each quadrennial presidential election.

But the fund has faced chronic shortfalls as the percentage of taxpayers contributing has declined to less than 10 percent last year from over 30 percent in the 1970s. Those who could tap wealthy supporters began looking for ways to outmaneuver it almost from the beginning.

In the 1980 Republican primary, for example, John B. Connally, the former Texas governor, became the first candidate to reject public money and outraise his rivals, but his candidacy failed to catch on.

By the mid-1980s, candidates and donors were circumventing the spending limits by raising unlimited "soft money" donations to party committees from corporations, unions and wealthy individuals. The party committees used the money to help support a candidate's presidential campaign or to attack his opponent.

In 2002, Congress changed the campaign finance laws to ban soft money contributions to party committees, and donors turned instead to so-called 527 groups, which could still spend unlimited contributions.

By 2000, two Republican candidates, the billionaire Steve Forbes and Mr. Bush, had turned down public money for the primary campaign. Mr. Bush became the first major-party nominee to do so. And in 2004, for the first time, both the Democratic and the Republican nominees turned down public financing for the primaries.

For Mrs. Clinton and other 2008 candidates, deciding this early to turn down public financing means that she can immediately begin building two war chests, one for the primary and one for the general election. Candidates can raise twice as much from each individual donor: $2,100 for the primary and $2,100 for the general, for a total of $4,200.

It also means that the presidential candidates will be more beholden than ever to the so-called bundlers, often lobbyists, who solicit donations to present to campaigns in a lump sum. In 2004, President Bush honored his biggest bundlers by calling them Pioneers and Rangers who raised $100,000 or $200,000, respectively.

Beginning with the first quarterly disclosure of presidential campaign finances, due at the end of April, candidates can show off their cash on hand as a deterrent to competitors. Mrs. Clinton, who faces doubts among some Democratic primary voters about whether she can win the general election, may be able to point to her general election fund-raising as evidence of her strength.

Candidates who wait until 2008 to start raising contributions for the general election may be starting too late to catch up. In 2004, for example, Mr. Kerry demonstrated during the primaries that he could raise far more money than public financing provided. But by the time he had won the nomination it was too late to raise private money to compete in the general election, and he relied instead on public financing.

On Monday, a spokesman for Mr. Kerry, who is weighing another presidential bid, said, "It's smart for Democrats to keep their options open."

Mr. Toner, chairman of the Federal Election Commission, said he expected that even if the major candidates bypassed the election fund, the money would still be used by dark horses. Any hypothetical surplus would remain in the fund, he said.

Lawmakers in both chambers of Congress have proposed legislation to revamp and expand the presidential primary financing system, but the ideas have not gained much traction in recent years. Phil Singer, a spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, said she would support "modernizing" the system.

Spokesmen for the Democratic leaders of both chambers say they like the idea. But Republicans are wary. "The most massive poll ever taken on any subject is taken on the subject of using tax dollars for political campaigns," Senator Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, the Senate Republican leader, said in a statement.

"That poll is taken every April 15 on our tax return," he said, referring to the voluntary check-off. "About 10 percent of Americans choose to participate; 90 percent choose not to."

Charles E. M. Kolb, president of the Committee for Economic Development, a business group that advocates for election laws, said, "It may take a collapse of the system in order to build it back up."

For now, Mr. Kolb added, "obituary may be the right word."

Clinton Bid Heralds Demise Of Public Financing (WP)

By Dan Balz And Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

The public financing system designed to clean up presidential campaigns in the wake of the Watergate scandal may have died on Saturday when Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) announced her bid for the White House.

Little noticed amid the announcement rollout was a page on her Web site in which she asked potential contributors to give her campaign checks of up to $4,200. That figure signaled not only that she plans to forgo public funds for primary season but also that, if she becomes the nominee, she will not take public money for the general election.

By opting out of the system, Clinton will be able to spend as much money as she can raise, both for the primaries and for the general election, rather than being forced to abide by strict spending limits imposed by the Federal Election Commission on candidates who accept public financing.

Others have opted out of public financing for the nomination campaigns, but Clinton is the first since the current structure was created in 1974 to declare she will forgo public financing in the general election as well.

Clinton's decision will put pressure on other candidates in both parties to follow suit, and if they do, the 2008 campaign will complete what has been the rapid disintegration of a system designed to rein in unlimited spending in presidential campaigns.

One effect is to put lesser-known candidates at a further disadvantage in competing with rivals who have the capacity to raise huge amounts of money.

"It's going to be a tremendous test of whether this system survives," Robert Lenhard, chairman of the Federal Election Commission, said of the pressure building on the existing system. Michael Toner, his predecessor, was less restrained. This election, he predicted, will be "basically the death" of public financing.

Under the current system, candidates raise money for the nomination battle and can qualify for public funds. For the general election, however, the federal government underwrites the entire cost of the campaign but limits candidate spending to a fixed amount, meaning the nominees have never raised money for that part of the campaign. By starting to raise funds for both the primary and general elections, Clinton made it clear she plans to opt out of the entire system.

The 2008 campaign will be the most expensive in history. Candidates may be raising $2 million a week or more between now and early next year, and the eventual nominees of both parties will raise tens of millions between the time they clinch the nomination and the national conventions in late summer 2008.

Clinton is one of several candidates believed to have the capacity to finance their entire campaigns without any federal money, along with Sens. John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Barack Obama (D-Ill.). A campaign plan for former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani indicated he would try to raise $100 million by early next year to win the nomination. Former Massachusetts governor Mitt Romney (R) attracted contributions and pledges worth $6.5 million in one day earlier this month.

President Bush built the new primary-season system in the past two campaigns, designating his most prodigious fundraisers -- those who raised $100,000 or $200,000 -- Pioneers and Rangers. The trend gives greater influence to wealthy fundraisers who can tap rich friends.

Campaigns are learning to tap into smaller contributors using the Internet, but Meredith McGehee, policy director at the Campaign Legal Center, said the breakdown of the system ultimately will put more distance between politicians and the people they are seeking to represent. "The pool of people that you're going to to finance the presidential election, the very nature of that pool of people is changing, and it's changing for the worse," she said.

A Clinton campaign official, defending her decision to opt out of all public financing, said the escalating cost of campaigns makes it difficult to stay within the current limits. "These dramatic increases make it clear that the current public financing system is in need of an update," said campaign spokesman Phil Singer, "and Senator Clinton would support modernizing it."

Among the presidential candidates, McCain has long championed the importance of campaign finance laws. Yesterday, his spokesman, Danny Diaz, said the senator thinks the current public finance system "is not fulfilling its original goal" and is also contemplating opting out.

The Watergate scandal helped produce a new system for financing campaigns, one that established limits on individual contributions to presidential candidates and disclosure requirements for campaigns to provide greater transparency about how money is raised and spent.

That system provided a carrot and stick for candidates designed to limit spending. For the primary season, the federal government agreed to match the first $250 of any individual contribution. In return, candidates agree to abide by strict state-by-state and overall spending limits during their nomination campaigns.

The system began to break down in 2000, when Bush decided to give up federal matching funds during his campaign for the nomination. That allowed him to raise and spend as much money as he could to win the nomination -- putting his rivals at a distinct disadvantage. He raised almost $100 million, breaking all previous records.

In 2004, Democrats John F. Kerry and Howard Dean joined Bush in opting out of public financing for the primaries. Bush and Kerry, the two nominees, both swamped Bush's 2000 campaign spending record. Kerry raised almost $235 million, Bush $270 million.

Both, however, chose to accept more than $80 million in public funds for their general election campaigns, though Kerry gave serious consideration to opting out. Few experts believe that either nominee will remain within the public financing system in 2008.

The system has broken down for several reasons, including the growing length of campaigns and escalating costs, especially for television advertising.

Public financing for the general election was designed to create a level playing field for the two nominees and relieve candidates of the need to raise money during the final months of the campaign. But candidates still see imbalances that can favor the party that holds the later convention, and the costs of both television and state-by-state organizations have strained what seem like generous allotments from the federal government.

Under new threshold limits adopted yesterday, individuals will be able to contribute up to $2,300 to a presidential candidate for the primaries and up to $2,300 for the general election. The limits are similar to those governing candidates for the House and Senate, but there is no public financing component for congressional candidates.

Clinton now will be raising money simultaneously for the presidential primaries and a possible general election campaign. Under federal rules, money for the general election cannot be spent until the candidate secures the nomination. If the candidate fails to win the nomination, the money must be returned.

Her campaign has another wrinkle in its fundraising plan. Like others before her, Clinton will have a group of big-time fundraisers tap their networks to help assemble hundreds of thousands of dollars for the campaign. But she also is recruiting what the campaign calls "Hillraisers."

Supporters can set up accounts on their Web sites and encourage friends to contribute to Clinton's campaign. Those contributions will be credited to the Hillraiser's account, and the campaign Web site will maintain a running total of how much each person produces.

Clinton To Bypass Public Funds For Bid (AP)

By Marc Humbert

AP, January 23, 2007

White House hopeful Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton will not accept public campaign financing for either the Democratic primaries or, if she wins the nomination, the general election campaign.

Clinton's decision had been widely expected given her and her husband's proven ability to raise vast sums of money quickly. Her advisers have not disputed estimates that she will raise $100 million or more before the year is out.

The New York senator already has more than $14 million in the bank, money left from her successful re-election campaign last year. The funds can be spent on her presidential bid.

While both President Bush and Democratic challenger John Kerry rejected public funding for their primary campaigns in 2004, they did accept $74.5 million each for the general election campaign. The funding for the general election was expected to reach $85 million for the major party candidates in 2008.

Analysts had been predicting that the major candidates for 2008 would reject the public financing option for both primaries and the general election because of the growing cost of competing. Not accepting public financing allows candidates to keep raising and spending as much as they want.

Clinton becomes the first of the top-tier candidates to announce the rejection of public financing.

"Both presidential nominees opted out of the public financing system in 2004 because the cost of running a modern campaign has gotten so expensive," said Phil Singer, a spokesman for the Clinton campaign. "These dramatic increases make it clear that the current public financing system is in need of an update and Senator Clinton would support modernizing it."

Strategists from both parties had estimated last year that the 2008 race could cost each nominee $500 million — far more than the Presidential Election Campaign Fund could afford. It is financed through the $3 checkoff on federal income tax returns.

The fund, which is expected to have about $200 million by the end of 2007, still would help pay for party presidential nominating conventions and assist primary candidates who do not raise large amounts of money.

Big Bucks Needed To Wage Presidential Campaign (CHIT)

By Mike Dorning

Chicago Tribune, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- The Iowa caucuses that kick off the presidential campaign are nearly a year away. For the most viable contenders, make that one year and $100 million away.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) has that capacity, and other contenders believe that they do as well.

To wage a serious presidential campaign in 2008, the ante is $50 million raised by Dec. 31 of this year, said one adviser to Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.). And that is just to get a place at the table.

Those are daunting figures. To make the $100 million mark in a year, a candidate must bring in an average of nearly $2 million a week. That's $274,000 a day, including Sundays and holidays, all of it raised in increments legally limited to no more than $2,100 per person.

Start late or fall behind and the remaining burden increases. "Every single day, the biggest part of your day is fundraising. Fundraising is going to take up more of your time than sleep if you're a candidate," said Democratic strategist Tad Devine, who advised presidential nominee Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) in 2004.

Clinton and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson joined in the competition for campaign money last weekend, announcing their own presidential exploratory committees less than a week after Obama entered the race, highlighting the importance of the intense competition for campaign funds.

On the Republican side, Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas entered the race, part of a surge of early announcements that strategists attribute to a rush to raise campaign funds.

In this election, candidates will court well-heeled, well-connected supporters who can bring in hundreds of thousands of dollars from wealthy friends and business contacts. They will commute back and forth among New York, Chicago, Los Angeles, San Francisco, Palm Beach, Fla., and other money centers for mammoth events that in some cases may raise $1 million or more in an evening. They will hone sophisticated marketing campaigns that use Internet sites, web videos and e-mail to galvanize large followings of dedicated supporters whose modest individual contributions can add up to staggering sums.

Federal Election Commission member Michael Toner predicted "an unprecedented fundraising sprint during the first six months of this year, with candidates raising up to $50 million to $60 million by the end of June and $100 million by the end of the year."

Presidential election campaigns regularly set records for their cost. But this time there is an extraordinary confluence of forces that most political professionals believe will drive the costs of the early primary campaigns especially high.

The primary schedule is highly front-loaded. In the Democratic Party, contests are tentatively scheduled in Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina within a 15-day span next January.

So instead of the traditional focus on Iowa and New Hampshire, most top-tier candidates are expected to mount early full-fledged campaigns in all four states, with costly field operations, television advertising and travel back and forth among more locations. Moreover, because the contests are so close together on the calendar, there is less time to use a strong showing in one state to raise money for the campaigns in the others.

At the same time, the field of candidates is unusually crowded in both parties, with no incumbent president or vice president running for the first time since 1952, creating an open field. With such a large pack of candidates, a big campaign treasury demonstrates political strength that helps a candidate gain attention from the media and voters. And money also provides the means for a candidate's message to be heard above the din.

"You're not the only person competing for voters' attention, so you're going to have to be louder, more provocative, more consistent in your message and that's going to cost a lot of money," said Chip Smith, deputy campaign manager for Democratic presidential candidate Al Gore in 2000.

Add to that the wholesale defections of presidential candidates from a voluntary public financing system that previously had set strict limits on campaign spending for primaries in exchange for federal matching funds. Those candidates who choose to accept public financing, which provides matching payments for the first $250 of each individual contribution, will be limited to spending slightly over $40 million in their campaigns for the 2008 nomination and also must abide by state-by-state spending limits that inhibit the resources they can devote to crucial early primaries and caucuses.

George W. Bush opted out of the public financing system during the primaries in 2000 and went on to win the Republican nomination and the presidency. Kerry and Howard Dean declined public financing for the 2004 primaries and went on to lead the Democratic field that year.

Clinton already has declared she will forgo public financing in both the primary and general election campaigns to avoid the spending limits. Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson cited "the rising cost of campaigns."

Most campaign consultants now believe the public financing system places crippling limits on a presidential primary campaign and do not expect the leading candidates to accept matching funds.

"Essentially, the lid's been blown off on the scheme of funding," Devine said. "And when there's no roof, the altitude can be extreme."

Most candidates and campaign advisers deliberately play down expectations for fundraising, anxious to avoid perceptions that their campaigns are under-performing should they fall short.

But a confidential campaign strategy memo prepared for former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, who is considering a run for the Republican nomination, leaked to the media recently and offered an inside glimpse of his fundraising plans. His advisers calculated he would need to raise $100 million by Dec. 31 of 2007. Likewise, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, a Republican who has created an exploratory committee for a presidential run, has set a goal of $100 million by the end of 2007.

Clinton starts with more than $14 million left over from her Senate campaign last year that she can transfer directly to her presidential campaign. That, noted one Democratic strategist, "is a considerable down payment toward $100 million."

Clinton also can draw on the kind of formidable fundraising base normally associated with an incumbent president. She and her husband have been cultivating key Democratic fundraisers and donors since before Bill Clinton's election as president in 1992, and the former first lady has accrued plenty of political and social IOUs. She has in her husband a surrogate with almost unmatched appeal to party donors. And in the Senate, she has represented the nation's most important financial center for more than six years.

Former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.), a presidential primary candidate and vice presidential nominee in 2004, built his funding base for his last campaign and has had plenty of time to nurture it for his current presidential run.

In order to compete, Obama and other candidates have to rapidly assemble their own fundraising networks, filled with the kind of people willing and able to ask friends for big-dollar donations and serve on the host committees that make sure that $2,100-a-seat fundraising dinners are sold out. It often takes plenty of personal attention from a candidate in advance to nurture that kind of commitment.

"Even if you're Barack Obama or John McCain, you can't just show up in Los Angeles," said Monica Notzon, a Republican fundraiser. "There is a whole bunch of legwork they hopefully have done already."

On the strength of his electrifying speech at the 2004 Democratic National Convention, a compelling biography and his personal presence, Obama already has attracted an extraordinarily influential group of financial backers.

Billionaire investor Warren Buffett and Hollywood moguls Jeffrey Katzenberg, David Geffen and Steven Spielberg are among past supporters of Obama's political action committee, Hopefund. Billionaire philanthropist George Soros, an early supporter of Obama's U.S. Senate bid and Hopefund donor, demonstrated his backing for the presidential campaign by sending the maximum legal contribution—$2,100—within hours of Obama's announcement, Soros spokesman Michael Vachon said.

These high profile donors are helpful because they also bring with them potential networks of additional contributors. Corporations are prohibited from donating directly to campaigns; only individuals and political action committees can give candidates contributions.

The Internet opens the potential for a flood of additional money, particularly for a candidate who can generate excitement because of his personality or a cause.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) took in a surge of money after winning the 2000 New Hampshire primary and setting a style embodied by the name of his campaign bus, "Straight Talk Express." With his anti-war crusade, Dean attracted legions of givers through his Web site, bringing in more than $30 million from small-dollar donors who contributed no more than $200 each.

Broad-band Internet access is now much more common. And people have grown accustomed through electronic commerce to entering their credit numbers on a Web site and spending money with the click of a mouse. So most political strategists believe the potential for raising money through the web is even greater now.

"The real thing to watch is who's going to electrify the low-dollar donors," Smith said. "You can get to $40 million or $50 million very quickly."

Hillary Takes A Pass (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

Congratulations to Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton for acknowledging right from the start that she won't accept public money for her White House bid. Now if she'd only admit how much the current fund-raising rules hurt her competitors.

Top-tier or wealthy candidates have been forgoing public financing for the Presidential primaries for some time because it limits their spending ability. Steve Forbes shunned it in 1996, as did he and George W. Bush in 2000. Howard Dean, John Kerry and President Bush all refused public funds in the 2004 primaries. But now Senator Clinton says that if she wins the Democratic nomination, she will be the first to forgo taxpayer funding in the general election as well.

Congress enacted a public financing law for Presidential candidates beginning with the 1976 election. Taxpayers fund the system by checking off a box on their income tax form. In return for receiving public funds -- which are expected to total around

$84 million in 2008 -- a candidate agrees to limit private-fund raising and overall campaign spending. The claim, then and since, has been that this will limit the influence of special interests and make Presidential contests more competitive.

The reality is close to the opposite. The system now benefits mainly well-known and well-heeled candidates and thus limits political competition. Serious Presidential contenders like Senator John McCain and Mrs. Clinton begin the race with greater name recognition, long donor lists and the ability to garner far more media attention.

Their lesser-known challengers have to claw for every $2,000 individual contribution, and then they are limited in how much they can spend. Long gone are the days when a few rich backers could elevate an unknown with a cause -- antiwar Eugene McCarthy in 1968 -- by writing big checks. Instead, you have to be a gazillionaire yourself, or be a famous Senator or have a last name of Bush or Clinton. One irony of the 2008 race is that popular former Governors such as Tom Vilsack and Mike Huckabee probably can't raise enough cash to be competitive, but New York City Mayor Mike Bloomberg might be able to make waves next year as an Independent because he's a multibillionaire.

As for special interests, those handful of rich donors in the past could at least be identified and their interests put on the record. Now the candidates have to bow to interest-group lobbies that can "bundle" contributions (trial lawyers) or provide in-kind support. Does anyone really believe that John Kerry's decision to accept public funds in the 2004 general election made him immune to the pleadings of Big Labor, the trial bar and other liberal groups? Or that Mrs. Clinton's decision to spurn public financing will make her any less accountable to voters if she wins?

Speaking of which, the public these days doesn't think much of the current election financing scheme. Fewer than 10% of taxpayers want a portion of their tax dollars siphoned off for political purposes. Perhaps voters are more sophisticated than campaign-finance "reformers" give them credit for being. Or perhaps taxpayers understand that limiting the pool of candidates competing for the most powerful job in the world is a really bad idea.

Clinton And Obama Campaigners Trade Insults (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, January 23, 2007

The Democratic party's presidential campaign got into full swing on Monday with campaign staff for Barack Obama and Hillary Clinton already indulging in sniping contests over the relative merits of their candidates.

Campaign workers for Mrs Clinton, who on Monday signed the papers to set up a presidential exploratory committee – the first step before declaring a formal candidacy – made indirect attacks on the relative inexperience of Mr Obama, who entered the race a week ago.

Democratic consultants said the campaign, which already includes five other candidates, most notably John Edwards, the party's 2004 vice-presidential candidate, was shaping up to be the most intense and long-running in the party's history.

Polls show Mrs Clinton leading by a wide margin among registered Democrats. "Hillary's Democratic primary support is climbing while others are stalled or falling," wrote Mark Penn, Mrs Clinton's chief pollster, in a memo. "She is not just strong, but the strongest in the field."

Joe Trippi, who was campaign manager for Howard Dean, who almost took the 2004 Democratic nomination, said both Mr Obama and Mrs Clinton had been bounced into declaring their candidacies early by the strength of the other's campaign.

George Soros, the New York-based billionaire, declared his support for Mr Obama the moment the first-term senator from Illinois signed the papers last week. Mr Soros, who has been one of the most generous supporters of Democratic campaigns in recent years, gave Mr Obama the maximum permitted individual donation.

"Both camps were watching the other sign up big-name donors in each other's cities [Chicago and New York] and realised there was no time to lose," said Mr Trippi, who is credited with running the most sophisticated internet campaign of its day.

On Monday night, Mrs Clinton kicked off what she said would be a running national "conversation" with voters via video weblink "about the direction our country is taking". At the weekend Mrs Clinton will make her first visit to Iowa, the venue of an early caucus in the Democratic nomination early next year, where John Edwards is already the front-runner. Mr Obama is ahead of Mrs Clinton in New Hampshire, the site of the first Democratic primary.

All three leading candidates are planning to launch extensive online operations to build campaign "netroots", which is considered important to their prospects. Mr Trippi, whose 2004 Howard Dean campaign attracted 650,000 internet supporters, says this time each will register millions.

"This is a completely different moment to 2004," he said. "Then we didn't have nearly as many blogs, we didn't have YouTube, or MySpace. It is a safe bet that one of these candidates will be derailed by some obscure video recording on a cellphone that will be posted on the web."

But the most intense competition between the candidates is likely to pivot around their Iraq war stances. Mrs Clinton, who last week returned from a visit to Iraq with a plan to launch a congressional resolution to “freeze” the number of US forces there at the January 1 level of 132,000, is probably the most vulnerable.

Having voted in favour of the war in 2002, Mrs Clinton has the most ground to make up among the party’s liberal base. Mr Edwards also voted in favour but has since recanted. Mr Obama always opposed the war.

Headmaster Disputes Claim That Obama Attended Islamic School (WP)

By Howard Kurtz

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Fresh doubt was cast yesterday on a magazine's allegation that Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) attended a madrassah, or religious school that teaches a fundamentalist version of Islam.

Hardi Priyono, deputy headmaster of the Basuki school in Indonesia, told CNN that his institution -- which Obama attended four decades ago, beginning when he was 6 -- is not a madrassah.

"This is a public school," Priyono told CNN correspondent John Vause in Jakarta. "We don't focus on religion." Classes in Islam are offered to the predominantly Muslim students at the school, CNN reported.

Insight, a weekly Internet magazine owned by the conservative Washington Times, had reported the madrassah allegation late last week and added, citing unnamed sources, that the information had been unearthed by researchers close to the campaign of Obama's rival for the Democratic presidential nomination Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York. In an online posting, Insight called yesterday's Washington Post article on the controversy a "hit piece" by the "liberal media establishment."

While not addressing the veracity of the madrassah allegation, the magazine said it had contacted the Obama camp, which declined to comment.

"Insight's story was not thinly sourced," the posting said. "Our reporter's sources close to the Clinton opposition research war room confirm the truth of the story. The Clinton camp's denial has as much credibility as the 'I never had sex with that woman' statement."

Spokesmen for Obama and Clinton called the Insight story absurd. Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs yesterday criticized Fox News for picking up the allegations, saying of the network's slogan: "It would be nice if 'fair and balanced' included some actual journalism once in a while." A Clinton spokesman, Howard Wolfson, said yesterday that "comments like this prove the point: This is a biased publication with no discernible journalistic standards."

Fox says two of its programs merely took note of what Insight had reported. The morning show "Fox & Friends" aired a clarification yesterday, reporting that Obama's camp had called the story "completely ridiculous" and that "the Clinton camp has said, 'We had nothing to do with that.' "

Obama-mania May Backfire (CSM)

By Dante Chinni

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2007

Unless you were stranded on a desert island last week, you probably know that Sen. Barack Obama (D) of Illinois announced he is officially considering possibly running for president in an election almost two years away.

It wasn't exactly a shocking development, but it made big headlines. Last Tuesday, the day Senator Obama posted the video on his website announcing that he had created an exploratory committee – his intention to consider his intentions – cable news spent much of the day discussing the announcement.

In fact, there was so much coverage of the senator's statement that between Tuesday and Sunday last week the word "Obama" got 14,800 hits on a search of Google News. That was more than 10 times as many hits received over the same period for the terms "Iraq" and "34,452" – the UN's estimate last week of the number of Iraqi civilian deaths since the war there began.

Of course, last week's other big entry in the 2008 race, Sen. Hillary Clinton (D) of New York, scored slightly more coverage in the period with 15,300 hits, but Senator Clinton legitimately made history with her entry – the first time the spouse of a former president has sought the White House.

While Clinton has served an entire term in the Senate, Obama is just two years into his first term and has a slight track record.

Yes, Obama's life story – father from Kenya, mother from Kansas – makes for compelling copy. But at this point in American political history, an African-American running for president isn't new. Shirley Chisholm ran back in 1972. Jesse Jackson made an especially strong run in 1988. A 2004 contender, Al Sharpton, recently said he may run again, though that announcement drew less media interest.

So what is it about Obama that has the press's pens scribbling and cameras flashing?

Well, the senator's media talents are formidable: He is smooth and natural on camera and is an engrossing speaker. And he is generating real excitement with voters. His 2004 convention speech is still talked about. And his recent visit to New Hampshire drew huge crowds.

Ironically, however, a big reason for the press's fascination with him is that he is almost as much a mystery to the media as he is to the public. He has no lengthy public record we in the media can go back and study, as is the case with most senators – including Clinton – or governors. Other than his two years in the Senate, his political experience consists of seven years in the Illinois Senate. He has no previous big, close campaigns we can look at to see what he did in a pinch. He is as fresh and new to most of us as he is to you.

As much as people like to talk about "the media" as though "it" is a monolith, they are complex organisms made up of people – people that have ideas about the issues and personalities they cover. Years of covering politicians and the electorate leads many reporters to think that a certain kind of person may be the right kind of person to fix the problems and run the country.

It's less a Democrat or Republican issue than it is a type-of-person issue. The press gravitates toward well-educated moderates who talk about a third way or new paradigm in politics. In 2000, it was Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona and his Straight Talk Express that captured attention.

For many in the media, Obama is a candidate to get excited about because he holds the promise of being interesting, different, and able to shake up Washington.

And that means Obama-mania will probably be alive and well in the press for at least a few more months. But at some point that lack of a long public history could present some problems for the senator.

Inevitably the "Who is Barack Obama?" stories will come – pseudo-psychological pieces that will put the senator on the couch. They will, as they most always do, look for "key moments" from his life to draw a picture. And what will they find?

Obama's short time in office means that image will be crafted probably even more than usual from old friends, old tales, and old pieces of writing. Those things may or may not have real significance – and may or may not be flattering – but are easy to draw from and more difficult to rebut.

Right now, Obama enjoys a sweet story line. But at some point, the media will be eager to fill in the missing pages. And when they do, Obama may find that his biggest strength with the media has its problems.

Never Too Early For Pollsters (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

Let the hypotheticals begin. Conventional wisdom may say Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York is the Democrats' prohibitive front-runner. But a Newsweek poll released over the weekend, which otherwise shows the candidates tightly bunched, indicates that former Senator John Edwards, below, is the only one to beat the top two potential Republican candidates in head-to-head matchups. The poll shows that Mr. Edwards, of North Carolina, Mrs. Clinton and Senator Barack Obama of Illinois all would beat Senator John McCain of Arizona by a few percentage points. But Rudolph W. Giuliani, the former New York mayor, would narrowly defeat Senators Clinton and Obama while losing to Mr. Edwards, 45 percent to 48 percent. But the numbers are all close and fall within the poll's margin of sampling error of plus or minus four percentage points.

The matchups, in percentages:

Edwards 48, McCain 43
Clinton 48, McCain 47
Obama 46, McCain 44
Edwards 48, Giuliani 45
Giuliani 48, Clinton 47
Giuliani 47, Obama 45

Experienced Dodd Toils To Win Notice In '08 Bid (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- At her first public event after declaring for president last weekend, New York Sen. Hillary Clinton drew a horde of cameras and reporters. For months before Illinois Sen. Barack Obama got into the 2008 race, fire marshals were turning fans away from his packed houses.

Meanwhile, another Democratic hopeful, Connecticut Sen. Chris Dodd, travels the country, a year before the first nominating votes, "hoping someone will show up," he quips.

Mr. Dodd's experiences are typical of the early days of a presidential campaign, which often are humbling, even demeaning, for all but the rare Clinton-like celebrities and Obama-like phenomenons. His colleague Mr. Obama has been a senator for two years. Mrs. Clinton is starting her second term. Mr. Dodd has been in the Senate for more than a quarter-century and was in the House for six years before that. He is chairman of the Senate Banking Committee. And he is an asterisk in early 2008 presidential polls.

Yet ask many Democratic activists whom they'd personally most like to see as president, and Mr. Dodd's name comes up often -- including from some committed to other candidates, notably Mrs. Clinton. Frequently described as witty, smart, and one of the most qualified figures in the party, Mr. Dodd enjoys goodwill beyond Washington from his mid-1990s stint as national party chairman.

At the same time, few of these Democrats have been pressing him to run. With voters as disgusted by Washington's partisan games as at any period in recent memory and seemingly hungry for a fresh face, a man who has been in Congress for a third of a century would be a hard sell, Democrats say. So would a New England liberal, even one with a business-friendly record who has tangled with one of his party's most powerful interests, trial lawyers.

Meanwhile, the competition includes the first viable female, African-American and Hispanic (New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson) candidates, each of whom excites segments of the liberal Democratic base by the history-making potential.

Donna Brazile, Al Gore's 2000 campaign manager, who is neutral in the 2008 contest, says of Mr. Dodd, "He's like everybody's big brother. He's down-to-earth yet engaged in the nitty-gritty." But, she adds, "personally, I sometimes wish he'd just stay in the Senate. In a field that contains so many rockstars, I don't see how Dodd will take a slice of the electorate."

"I don't have any illusions about it," Mr. Dodd says, acknowledging his underdog status. But, he adds, "The most important compass is your own."

The son of a senator who was a prosecutor at the Nuremberg Nazi war-crimes trials, and himself a Peace Corps volunteer in the Dominican Republic at 22, Mr. Dodd says he no longer can stay in the Senate "bleachers" with the country so tarnished in the eyes of the world. "I'm not afraid of using military force," he says, but the force of America's ideals around the globe have been squandered under the Bush administration. "I've got to try -- at this time -- because the nation's situation is too worrisome to me."

In politics, it is a truism that timing is everything. Yet politicians have their own clocks, as the contrast between the silver-haired, 62-year-old senator and the 45-year-old Mr. Obama suggests. Mr. Obama has said he didn't intend to run; the outpouring last fall at book-signings for his second bestseller, and the emergence of an Internet draft, spurred advisers to tell Mr. Obama he had to seize the moment.

Mr. Dodd, on the other hand, has been on the political scene so long that he can recall when one of his young campaign drivers was Mark Warner, who went on to be Virginia's governor and last year explored a presidential campaign himself -- before deciding this wasn't his time. Likewise, Mr. Dodd has weighed and ruled out presidential bids before, as evidenced by eBay's recent offer of an old campaign button featuring a dark-haired Dodd. In the past, he says, he believed being single was a liability, especially given something of a playboy image; or he had to defer when fellow Connecticut Sen. Joe Lieberman was running, or his Washington experience was a disqualifier in years voters preferred outsiders.

Now Mr. Dodd is married, the father of two young daughters. And despite the current "Obama-mania" for his less-seasoned colleague, Mr. Dodd argues that with the nation roiled by war, terrorism and economic globalization, he can persuade voters that his experience is an asset. "Certainly the last six years has reminded people that maybe, maybe, experience has value -- not that anyone's ever really ready for this job," Mr. Dodd says.

Having voted in 2002 to authorize President Bush to use force against Iraq, he now says Congress and the nation were misled. Last week, he proposed legislation to block Mr. Bush from sending more troops without new congressional authorization. As it happened, the media's focus that day was on the antiwar moves of his Democratic rivals, Sens. Clinton, Obama and Joe Biden of Delaware. Mr. Biden has been a senator even longer than Mr. Dodd -- since 1973 -- and faces some of the same doubts as he runs for president. But as chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, his foreign policy pronouncements grab greater attention.

Mr. Dodd ranks just under Mr. Biden on that committee and has been prominent in foreign-policy debates for two decades; in the 1980s, he was a main target for Republicans' attacks as he came to define the Democratic opposition to the Reagan administration's interventions in Central America's conflicts. He knows numerous world leaders and met with those in Iraq, Syria, Jordan and Israel last month.

The liberal gets credit for popular laws for workers' family and medical leave, child care and Head Start, and testing of prescription drugs for children. Yet he has a moderate record on business issues, reflecting Connecticut's corporate presence.

In 1995 and 1996, the same years he was serving as President Clinton's chairman of the Democratic Party, in the Senate Mr. Dodd was chief sponsor of two business measures that drew Mr. Clinton's vetoes, and the wrath of his party's special interests. The first was a bill to limit securities lawsuits that high-technology companies wanted, and trial lawyers didn't; Mr. Dodd got Congress to override that Clinton veto. The second was a bill restricting product-liability suits, also opposed by trial lawyers; Mr. Clinton's veto stood.

Senators Don't Have Lock On 2008 Campaign (USAT)

By Dewayne Wickham

USA Today, January 23, 2007

The last time the political stars lined up like this was in 1920. In that year's presidential contest, the nation was licking its wounds from a bruising war, and many Americans were angered by outgoing President Woodrow Wilson's attempt to turn that fight into a crusade to spread democracy around the globe.

Neither Wilson — who was ailing and had served two terms — nor his vice president, Thomas Marshall, sought the presidency in 1920. That lack of an incumbent candidate and the nation's obsession with foreign policy issues propelled Ohio Sen. Warren Harding into the White House.

"America's present need is not heroics, but healing; not nostrums, but normalcy … not submergence in internationality, but sustainment in triumphant nationality," Harding said before winning a landslide victory.

Not surprisingly, with neither President Bush nor Vice President Cheney seeking the presidency next year, and foreign policy again the cause of great discontent, a growing number of senators are lining up for the job. And journalists are treating them as though they have the inside track.

Newsweek magazine ran pictures of Democratic senators Barack Obama of Illinois and Hillary Clinton of New York on its cover earlier this month with the headline, "The Race is On." Clinton launched her presidential campaign last week, and Obama is scheduled to officially announce his White House run next month.

Also this month, The Wall Street Journal reported that Sportsbook.com has made Arizona Sen. John McCain the odds-on favorite to win the GOP presidential nomination, even though he trails former New York mayor Rudolph Giuliani in a recent USA TODAY/Gallup Poll. But it's too soon to turn this campaign into a senatorial foot race.

"I wouldn't discount the prospect of a governor, or Mayor Giuliani, winning the presidency," said Meena Bose, a presidential scholar at Hofstra University. "Governors bring executive experience" to a White House campaign, which is something that shouldn't be overlooked, she said.

"It's a lot easier to attack a senator who has a voting record," said Jamie McKown, professor of government and policy at the College of the Atlantic in Bar Harbor, Maine. "Opponents of a senator who is running for president can make an issue of their voting record, which is often not easy to defend."

Remember 2004 Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry's fumble in answering how he voted on a military funding bill? "I actually did vote for the $87 billion before I voted against it," he said. His more expansive answer never caught up with that sound bite.

Governors usually don't bring that kind of baggage into a presidential campaign. That may explain why, of the 19 men who have held the office since the beginning of the 20th century, nine went from the statehouse to the White House, but only two came directly from the Senate.

In the current campaign, there's no shortage of governors who have entered — or are poised to enter — the race. Among Democrats, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack have thrown their hats in the ring. And three Republicans who recently left their statehouse jobs — Mitt Romney of Massachusetts, Mike Huckabee of Arkansas, and George Pataki of New York — have set up exploratory committees.

Don't let the pundits and the early polls fool you. One of these governors could turn out to be a dark horse candidate, especially if Clinton and Obama split the Democratic Party's liberal base during the primary elections.

And if McCain is upended by his support of Bush's decision to send more troops into Iraq, and Giuliani's liberal stance on social issues generates a backlash among right-wing Republicans, the GOP may end up with a governor at the head of its presidential ticket.

This much is certain: It's much too early to treat next year's presidential election like a graduation exercise for the U.S. Senate.

Here, There And In Iowa (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

DOJ_NMG_0120579

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

One of the striking things about the 2008 presidential campaign is the number of stages it is being played on at once. Take today in Washington, for example, where things will be happening on two fronts. The afternoon brings a hearing of the Senate Armed Services Committee, a platform that could display the sharply contrasting views on Iraq of Senators John McCain, Republican of Arizona, and Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York. The evening brings the president's State of the Union address, which many Democrats — notably Mrs. Clinton — view as providing an opportunity to tee off to advance their own presidential campaigns.

For the rest of the week, attention in the Senate will be focused on resolutions critical of President Bush's Iraq policy, giving a platform to other presidential hopefuls, including Senators Barack Obama of Illinois, Joseph R. Biden of Delaware, both Democrats, and Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, a Republican who is considering running. Antiwar activists are planning a big demonstration in Washington on Saturday, an event that could provide the candidates another gauge of public sentiment against the war.

But the action is not limited to Washington. At week's end, Mrs. Clinton is making her first trip to Iowa since creating her presidential exploratory committee; it seems fair to surmise that this will not be the kind of small living-room chats — with 10 Democrats and a local reporter or two — that have put the state on the political map. Halfway across the country, Mrs. Clinton's former and potential future political rival, former Mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani of New York, will be competing for attention by heading for New Hampshire, a trip that was planned before Mrs. Clinton decided to spend the same weekend in Des Moines.

Throwing Their Blogs Into The Ring (WP)

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Last week's presidential announcement video from Barack Obama seemed fresh, futuristic and YouTube-friendly -- until Saturday, when Hillary Clinton's "I'm in to win" video, as pretty and polished as a Merchant-Ivory production, made Obama's clip look like a student project. Obama, here comes Mama. And she doesn't play.

As they size each other up, the Democratic front-runners might want to sneak a glance at John Edwards, who has outpaced them both in new-technology savvy. Edwards has been campaigning in cyberspace for months, building a deep, "sticky" Web site with tons of multimedia offerings and a destination-quality blog. Clinton is still working on a blog. Obama is apparently still working on a lot of things.

Who knows whether the presidential campaign Web sites of the three leading Democratic contenders reveal anything meaningful about the candidates? At this early stage, a year before the first primaries and caucuses, who knows what indicators to trust? A Post poll showed Clinton with a substantial lead nationwide, but other polls show a much tighter three-way contest in Iowa and New Hampshire, the states that count -- make that the states that will count, a year from now. New candidates are still piling in (e.g., Bill Richardson on Sunday). The race doesn't even have a complete starting field yet, much less a trend.

But the march of human progress does have a trend. More of you will read this column on the Internet than on newsprint. Those of you who want to tell me how surpassingly brilliant or irredeemably stupid it is will almost certainly do so by sending e-mails rather than putting pen to paper. In just about every realm of human activity I can think of, the Internet matters more now than it did five minutes ago. I can't think of any reason that politics should be exempt.

So what do the Web sites HillaryClinton.com, BarackObama.com and JohnEdwards.com tell us about their namesakes? At first glance, they seem to confirm what we think we already know. Clinton's site evokes a super-competent juggernaut, with every base covered and every hair in place. Obama's is very much a work in progress. And Edwards's Web site suggests the patience, attention to detail and willingness to take risks that you would expect from a trial lawyer who rose from nothing to become a self-made millionaire.

Clinton and Obama are first-name candidates on their sites -- "Hillary" says this, "Barack" says that. Edwards is more formal -- he's "John Edwards" or "Senator Edwards," if you please. Perhaps that's a necessary reminder, since he's not, technically speaking, a senator anymore.

As for overall tone and scope, it's hard to evaluate Obama's campaign cyber-HQ because it's so clearly a provisional, placeholding site with not much but a couple of videos (the announcement; a biography) and a big button you can click to become a contributor. There's a link to his Senate reelection Web site-- he would have to run in 2010 -- and if you find the link and click through, you get a fuller picture of the man.

The Clinton and Edwards sites, as one might expect, are largely about the business of getting elected. Clinton's home page tells you how to "Join Team Hillary" or become a "HillRaiser" of campaign funds. Edwards likewise prominently advises how to join his team, but his home page also focuses on some issues -- he's against global warming, we learn, and opposes an escalation of the war in Iraq.

The real difference is depth and ambition. Both Clinton and Obama (he on his Senate campaign Web site) say they want to have a dialogue with the American people about how best to solve the nation's problems. But Edwards has already started his conversation with the nation. His Web site is an exercise in social networking that includes not only a blog, where surfers can post their thoughts, but also cyber-diaries written by Edwards's family members.

"The soft rain of last night has left the field behind the house dewy with a low fog. Maybe the gossamer meadow is the reason I feel contemplative this morning," begins a recent entry by Elizabeth Edwards. Her diary posts generally draw more comments than her husband's.

Somehow, it's hard to imagine Hillary Clinton waxing about any gossamer meadow.

Edwards's Web site is less YouTube than MySpace. It tries to take advantage of the Internet's great paradox -- that a technology so devoid of human contact can nevertheless create a sense of intimacy and connection.

So, Mama's playing it safe, Obama's not quite ready and Edwards is up to something interesting. In the "Second Life" sense, at least. We'll see about the real world.

Casino Executive Contributes $1 Million To Gingrich Group (WP)

By John Solomon

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

Newt Gingrich, a former House speaker and a possible presidential contender, jump-started his new political group with a check for $1 million from a source many in his conservative base would shun -- the gambling industry.

Gingrich's American Solutions for Winning the Future reported to the Internal Revenue Service that it collected a $1 million check from Las Vegas Sands Corp. Chairman Sheldon G. Adelson shortly after the November elections. The IRS reported the donation in recent days.

The contribution dwarfed the other checks, totaling just $60,000, gathered for the group's start-up. Gingrich announced the group late last fall, setting it up as a "527" organization, a type of political nonprofit that can collect and spend donations of unlimited size.

Though Gingrich says his group is seeking bipartisan ideas, his movement is clearly courting conservatives with a new "Contract With America for the 21st Century" that proposes private savings accounts for Social Security, "patriotic education" in public schools and the appointment of judges who understand the "centrality of God in American history."

A decade after $100,000 checks to political parties and groups were the jaw-dropping phenomenon, Adelson's donation marks a new frontier in political fundraising -- a seven-figure check to a group associated with a single politician whose aspirations may include the White House. Gingrich has said that he will decide by the fall whether to enter the crowded race for the Republican Party's presidential nomination.

Kent Cooper, a former Federal Election Commission official, said: "A check of this size could either bankroll the start of a new organization or underwrite the exploration, traveling and contacts of a potential presidential candidate."

Gingrich's spokesman, Rick Tyler, said last night that the former speaker was traveling and unavailable to comment. "The 527 is designed to foster a dialogue with Americans. Hence the name American Solutions," Tyler said.

Adelson's office in Las Vegas declined to comment.

Adelson's check underscores the uncomfortable position that Republicans face on the issue of gambling. The party rose to power under Gingrich in the early 1990s on the strength of social and religious conservatives, and many of the latter oppose gambling on moral grounds.

Conservatives were stung during the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal when it was revealed that one of their champions, political strategist Ralph Reed, made money from Indian gambling sources and that many GOP lawmakers wrote letters or intervened on behalf of Abramoff's casino-operating tribes and received donations from them.

"The problem is the income comes from what we call a vice, and that is an issue," said the Rev. Louis P. Sheldon, chairman of the Traditional Values Coalition, which has long been a powerful voice on social issues inside the GOP.

"I certainly could never have done that and I certainly can't encourage it, but if good will comes out of it in terms of these issues . . . then that remains to be seen. There's an old expression that the devil's had the money long enough, it's about time the good people got their hands on it," he said.

Adelson was listed by Forbes magazine in 2006 as America's third-richest man, with assets of more than $20 billion. His long list of political donations, primarily to Republicans, includes $100,000 to the Republican National Committee in 1997 and 1998, when Gingrich was speaker.

Adelson made his mark in business by creating the nation's most famous technology show, Comdex, and was a relative latecomer to Las Vegas's gambling scene. He got into the casino business in the mid-1990s, buying the old Sands casino and imploding it to make room for the massive Venetian casino. That opened in 1999, four months after Gingrich left the House.

Louisiana: Congressman To Run For Governor (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

Representative Bobby Jindal, Republican of Louisiana, said he would enter the 2007 governor's race, his second attempt at winning the office. Mr. Jindal will be running against a weakened incumbent, Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco, a Democrat. Ms. Blanco defeated Mr. Jindal in 2003, but her standing was damaged after Hurricane Katrina. Mr. Jindal, 35, the son of immigrants from India, has also been the secretary of the Louisiana Department of Health and Hospitals and an assistant secretary at the federal Department of Health and Human Services in the Bush administration.

Jindal To Run Again To Lead Louisiana (WT)

By Audrey Hudson

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

Republican Rep. Bobby Jindal yesterday declared his candidacy for the Louisiana governorship but vowed to delay campaigning until after the April conclusion of the state's legislative session to avoid politicizing Hurricane Katrina recovery efforts.

Mr. Jindal, who lost to Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco in 2003, has a significant edge in early polling over Mrs. Blanco, a Democrat who has drawn criticism for her handling of the response to Katrina.

"Politics has a way of impeding progress, and Louisiana cannot afford to lose another second," Mr. Jindal wrote in his e-mail announcement sent to supporters.

"The upcoming state legislative session this spring is vital. We cannot afford failure, and the surest way to attain failure is to politicize every initiative and decision."

Mr. Jindal, whose parents emigrated from India, was elected to Congress at age 33 in 2004. He served as secretary of the state Health and Hospitals Department and in the Bush administration as an assistant secretary in the Health and Human Services Department in 2001.

A poll by the Southern Media and Opinion Research shows Mrs. Blanco's support among voters is 35 percent, compared with 59 percent for Mr. Jindal. Mrs. Blanco defeated Mr. Jindal by four percentage points in 2003.

Mrs. Blanco has announced her intention to seek re-election in the primary set for Oct. 20; she could not be reached for comment yesterday. If no candidate gets 50 percent of the vote, a runoff election will be held Nov. 17.

Mr. Jindal, the first to announce a candidacy to challenge Mrs. Blanco, emphasized his interest in contracting the race's length -- a move that runs counter to electoral trends.

"It is my belief that campaigns are too long as they are, and that people grow weary of the barrage of charges and countercharges," Mr. Jindal said. "I want to avoid D.C.-style politics with mudslinging and instead focus on solving the problems that our state faces."

The poll, conducted Jan. 12 to 14, shows that Mr. Jindal, whose district is in the New Orleans' suburbs, received overwhelming support in New Orleans -- 72 percent -- while Mrs. Blanco pulled 22 percent support.

Mrs. Blanco's low numbers are attributed to her responses to Hurricanes Katrina and Rita.

Mrs. Blanco initially rejected President Bush's offer to deploy federal troops, after waiting 24 hours to make a decision. Days later, Mrs. Blanco was wired for a television interview and whispered to her press secretary that she wished she had requested troops earlier.

New Orleans Project Residents Face Home Demolition (LAT)

By Ann M. Simmons

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

NEW ORLEANS — To some, the four sprawling three-story brick complexes may not look like real estate worth fighting over.

But with inhabitable housing of any kind at a premium here, the fate of New Orleans' four largest public housing complexes — St. Bernard, C.J. Peete, B.W. Cooper and Lafitte — is at the center of another battle in the city's turbulent efforts to reshape its future.

The U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development and the Housing Authority of New Orleans have approved plans to demolish these complexes, landmarks in their neighborhoods, and replace them with lower-density apartment clusters for mixed-income residents.

Their decision has brought relentless opposition from former tenants who insist they want to restore their lives in their old homes.

Last week, residents ignored "No Trespassing" signs and stormed through unlocked gates and torn barbed-wire fences into the St. Bernard complex to clean their units.

But Monday, lawyers for the city's public housing agency filed illegal-entry and property-damage claims against those trying to halt the public housing demolition. They are seeking a court order to bar entry into any of the projects without the agency's approval.

Housing officials argue that the apartments are too badly damaged to repair. They insist that redevelopment would improve tenants' lives by eliminating crime-infested dens of concentrated poverty.

"People deserve better than this," said Jereon "Jerry" Brown, a Washington-based spokesman for the Department of Housing and Urban Development, as he showed reporters flood-damaged and ransacked units at Lafitte last month. "If they could just be patient. A mixed-income neighborhood can better attract businesses and better schools. It's all tied together."

"It's not just about bricks and mortar," said C. Donald Babers, the New Orleans housing authority's federally appointed administrator, who accompanied Brown. "We're looking at quality of life for our families."

Dressed in a tailored suit and bowler hat, and wearing a diamond-studded gold ring on each hand, Babers did not enter the mold-crusted apartments, citing respiratory concerns. But advocates for public housing — where about 5,100 people lived before Katrina, and where some 1,200 have since returned — insist that the complexes were safe during past hurricanes because they were solidly built of steel, concrete and brick. Many apartments escaped flooding from Hurricane Katrina.

The advocates also argue that tearing them down prevents a key segment of the city's workforce from returning, and excludes thousands from the city's rebuilding process.

Nearly all the families who lived in New Orleans public housing were African Americans on low incomes.

"It's definitely about race and class," said Judith Browne-Dianis, co-director of Advancement Project, a Washington-based civil rights and racial justice group that is also representing tenants in a class-action lawsuit seeking to restore them to their apartments. "If you look at what happened after Hurricane Katrina, the people who were residents of public housing were the people who were left behind at the Superdome and Convention Center, and now they are the same people who are being locked out."

For former Lafitte tenant Jeffrey Hills, 31, a tuba and sousaphone player who used to live at Lafitte, the desire to return to the projects is simple.

"It's affordable housing," said Hills, who used to pay $400 a month rent, which included utilities, for a two-bedroom apartment with a balcony and parquet floors. "I'm a young man with three kids. I can't afford to pay $1,500 in rent."

The sense of place, community ties and social networks are also what former tenants say they miss most.

"Every single person still displaced is constantly reevaluating wishes to come home with the unfolding reality they are not welcome at this point," said William P. Quigley, another attorney for the plaintiffs.

But Babers said tenants were swayed by nostalgia and had been isolated in such communities for so long that they were unable to consider alternative, viable living arrangements.

"It's a 1940s mind-set," said Babers, a reference to when many of the projects were built. "Change is difficult for people. They're afraid of the unknown."

Brown, his colleague, recalled how plans for demolishing and rebuilding public housing in other cities, such as Chicago and Atlanta, had met similar resistance. But once tenants moved into new, modern units in mixed-income neighborhoods with easy access to shops and schools, the opposition quickly waned, Brown said.

Jacquelyn Marshall, 36, a former resident of C.J. Peete, said tenants' reluctance to forsake their old units stemmed from distrust that the authorities would do right by them. The experience of residents of the city's former St. Thomas housing project has bred further skepticism, advocates say. The complex, originally designed to house around 1,500 families, was demolished in 2002. So far, 296 units have been constructed, 122 of them as low-income housing.

"We are not against the redevelopment of public housing," Marshall said. "We are against the process. I'm not for tearing down something that's livable when it will result in thousands of families being homeless. They need to start renovating before they demolish."

Linda Lockhart, one of the few dozen residents who have been allowed to move back to the B.W. Cooper complex, wept as she spoke of losing an estimated $140,000 worth of household goods and personal belongings, acquired through decades of scrimping and saving.

"If we had been allowed to return home sooner, I could have saved some things," said Lockhart, 51. Tenants were shut out for several months after Katrina, allowing vandals to ransack and steal possessions not destroyed by the storm.

Lockhart, a security company worker who raised two college-educated children at Cooper, shares a cramped one-bedroom unit with her daughter. Both sleep on the floor. They have one bamboo chair and no dining-room set. The view from the back porch is rows of dark and deserted flats, some with missing doors and shattered windows.

"If somebody had given me a house, I wouldn't be back," Lockhart said. "But I can't make it out there. When I lived [at Cooper] before, I was able to save money because the rent was reasonable, and I had a steady paying job."

Few public housing residents deny that crime was sometimes a problem, but they say troublemakers were typically outsiders. And Quigley, the lawyer, said that given the recent surge of murders in the city — 15 killed since Jan. 1 — it's clear that criminality is not confined to public housing, since most of the complexes are closed.

Babers, however, pointed to the Iberville complex, near the city's French Quarter: Over seven months through December, the complex was the site of 12 murders, he said.

Iberville residents forcibly reoccupied their complex after Katrina. Former St. Bernard residents are following that example.

Relatives helped Stephanie Mingo, a mother of four, pry off a steel cover sealing her front door so she could start washing and disinfecting the apartment.

Power and water have been shut off at St. Bernard, and rodents inhabit the filth. But diehard residents said they would continue to clean the complex until authorities allowed them to return.

"Soon you're gonna be sittin' on my porch while I braid your hair," Mingo shouted to a neighbor as she raced across the compound to reclaim her unit.

"Girl, just like the ol' days," the woman shouted back.

State Farm Legal Woes Hit Gale Force (WSJ)

By Liam Pleven

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

Nearly a year and a half after Katrina, the legal storm spawned by the deadly hurricane is coming to a head in Mississippi. At its center is the nation's largest home insurer: State Farm.

The Bloomington, Ill., firm is the only insurer, so far, to face a major judgment against it in a Mississippi court over a disputed homeowner's claim related to Katrina. The judgment came two weeks ago when a federal judge ordered it to pay a Mississippi couple $232,292, and a jury awarded the couple $2.5 million in punitive damages. On Friday, State Farm settled another case about to go to trial, and the insurer faces lawsuits from hundreds of other Mississippi homeowners.

State Farm also is one of a number of insurers named in a civil lawsuit filed by Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood. His office has been investigating what it calls "the insurance industry's fraudulent denial of claims." A grand jury met last week. A State Farm spokesman said the company is "cooperating fully" with the investigation.

Meanwhile, State Farm is involved in talks that could settle many of these legal issues, and the talks are at a critical stage, according to a person familiar with the matter.

A mutual company that is owned by its policyholders, State Farm insures more than one out of every five homes in the U.S. State Farm reported $3.24 billion in net income for 2005, a year when it experienced steep hurricane costs.

At the center of these and other insurance disputes is a long-running legal dilemma: Who pays a homeowner's claims when a house is damaged by both wind and water? Many homeowner policies cover wind damage but exclude flood damage because it is covered under the government's flood insurance program.

In 2005, State Farm was the largest home insurer in Mississippi, with roughly 30% of the market, according to A.M. Best Co. State Farm has already paid out $1.1 billion in Katrina-related claims in the state. But, besides the lawsuits from several hundred homeowners in Mississippi, more than a thousand homeowners in Louisiana have brought Katrina-related cases against the company. Other insurers, including Allstate Corp. and Nationwide Mutual Insurance Co., are also fighting suits. (A backlash against insurers is building in several coastal states. See article.1)

Disputed homeowner claims in Mississippi could cost the industry hundreds of millions of dollars, aside from possible punitive damages, says Robert Hartwig, president of Insurance Information Institute, a trade group.

In an interview last week, Mississippi's Mr. Hood said he hoped the judge's recent ruling against State Farm would bring insurers "to the table." State Farm has said it would like to resolve as many of the outstanding cases as possible. It isn't clear whether other major insurers would follow its lead if the negotiations bear fruit.

Only two homeowner cases against insurers have gone to court in Mississippi, and they ended very differently. U.S. District Judge L.T. Senter presided over both cases. State Farm potentially lost out on millions last week when the judge ordered it to pay the Mississippi couple and the jury followed with a punitive damage award. The other case involved Nationwide Mutual Insurance. In that instance, Judge Senter decided Nationwide should pay Paul and Julie Leonard $1,228.16 in addition to the $1,661.17 the company had previously paid the couple. Then he dismissed the case.

The Nationwide case varied from the State Farm case in important ways. The house Nationwide insured was standing after the hurricane, leaving behind evidence for the insurer to make a case for the coverage it offered. Judge Senter found most of the damage was due to water and wasn't covered.

The State Farm-insured house was destroyed, leaving little evidence beyond the foundation. State Farm denied the claim outright. Judge Senter said the insurer still bore the burden of proof that water, not wind, did the damage, and it didn't prove it.

A State Farm attorney, Peter Martin, said in an interview last week the Nationwide case was "much easier" because it left behind evidence. State Farm says it is likely to appeal the decision.

Mom Is At Home In House, Senate (LAT)

By Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — It probably wasn't chance that Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's first public event after announcing her interest in running for president — a stop at a New York health center named for the Chelsea and Clinton neighborhoods — echoed the name of her daughter.

Nor was it chance that the new speaker of the House, Rep. Nancy Pelosi, took up her gavel for the first time earlier this year surrounded by children, including some of her grandchildren.

In recent days, female politicians have risen to new power and prominence. And they did so — deliberately — surrounded by reminders of their motherhood.

Whether being a woman is an asset or liability in national politics may be an open question, but being a mother — or a grandmother — appears to be a sure winner.

Strategists say that talking about motherhood is reassuring to voters, some of whom are still uncomfortable with women in powerful jobs. It also helps create a narrative for their lives that connects them to mainstream and traditionalist voters.

"Raising children is certainly something both have in common with millions of Americans, and parents everywhere worry about their kids' future, so why not talk about it?" said Democratic strategist Stephanie Cutter. "It's really no different than talking about a military record or experience in running a business — it gives voters a sense of who you are."

One example is freshman Sen. Amy Klobuchar (D-Minn.), who brought her 11-year-old daughter, Abigail, to the Senate floor for her swearing-in this month. Abigail frequently accompanied her mom on the campaign trail, and the story of her complicated birth — and the family's struggles with their healthcare plan — was a frequent campaign theme.

"Being a mom is a big part of who I am. Historically, I don't think there have been enough moms in the U.S. Senate, and I think it was good for mothers across our state to get the sense that someone who understands their lives is in the United States Senate," Klobuchar said recently.

For Pelosi (D-San Francisco), who has been little known on the national stage except as a "San Francisco liberal," highlighting her motherhood and grandmother-hood — she has five children and six grandchildren — is also part of a strategy to make her less of a caricature.

But perhaps no female politician has used motherhood as effectively as Clinton (D-N.Y.), who is starting the most serious run at the presidency by a woman. Not coincidentally, when she was asked about her presidential ambitions on a women's TV talk show last month, Clinton noted that "we've never had a mother … [in] that position."

Also not coincidentally, Clinton has just released a new edition of her 1996 book on raising children. The cover features a large photo of Clinton surrounded by school-age children. Inside is a soft-focus portrait of the senator with her 26-year-old daughter, Chelsea Clinton.

"At the core of this book is my own experience as a mother and my conviction that parents are the most important influences on the lives of their children," Clinton writes in the new introduction.

For Clinton, whose eight years as first lady left many with a view of her as a strident feminist and partisan, talking about being a mother could "soften" her image. Strategists say they expect Chelsea Clinton, now working for a New York City-based hedge fund, to take on a prominent role in her mother's campaign.

"Gender stereotypes are still alive and well in America and cut across men and women in all ideologies," Republican strategist Dick Morris and his wife, Eileen McGann — no fans of Clinton — wrote recently on their website, Vote.com. "Survey research shows that all voters believe that women are more compassionate, more focused on children and education, and more pro-peace than men."

Although many conservatives consider Clinton a liberal, she has tried to position herself more as a centrist on issues from immigration to abortion. One reason, political analysts suggest, is electoral strategy: More than half of the electorate is female and some of the most sought-after voters are mothers. Those voters tend toward moderate views.

"Swing women tend to be married and moms," said Democratic pollster Celinda Lake, who noted that talking about being a mother "creates a connection to married women."

Although mentioning motherhood is often seen as a softener for women, Lake says that the reverse is also true: It shows them as strong in a nonthreatening way.

"People think that mothers are very tough. It's comfortable for voters to see a woman being tough in that way," Lake said.

Pelosi took advantage of that "motherly" toughness strategy during the recent scandal over former Florida Republican Rep. Mark Foley's inappropriate advances to teenage congressional pages.

"As a mother and grandmother, I think 'lioness,' " Pelosi said as she criticized the Republican leadership's response. "You come near the cubs, you're dead."

Ellen R. Malcolm, head of Emily's List, which works to propel the careers of Democratic women, said she considered the past year a watershed for political women: "It's kind of a coming of age."

After the 2006 midterm elections, there are 71 women in the House of Representatives and 16 in the Senate — a record for both chambers.

And a female governor heads the National Governors Assn. for the first time.

"One of the strongest themes of the last election was that we needed a change for the next generation," Malcolm said. "By talking about being mothers, they show that they are looking ahead to the next generation."

In Arab Capital Of U.S., Ethnic Divide Remains (NYT)

By Neil Macfarquhar

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

DEARBORN, Mich., Jan. 19 — After the longtime mayor, Michael A. Guido, died of cancer here in December, a flock of Arab-American candidates stepped forward in the hopes of claiming City Hall.

But despite the fact that roughly one in three Dearborn residents is of Arab origin, most of the Arab-American candidates had dropped out by mid-January. Poll numbers showed that none of them could win.

Internal rivalries echoing those that beset the Arab world, along with the general electorate's lingering unease about Muslims, combined to derail what many here had hoped would be the chance to prove that Arab-Americans had arrived politically — at least in Dearborn, their unofficial capital in this country.

"One day, an Arab-American will be in office at the top, but this will not be the time," said Osama Siblani, the burly publisher of the weekly Arab American News, whose friends tease him about his perennial "this is the time" editorial at every election. "There is no doubt that electing an Arab-American to the City Hall in Dearborn would have sent a strong message to the rest of the country that Arab-Americans are part of the political process. Would we want it? Yes. Is it possible? No."

Mayor Guido had something of a checkered reputation among Arab-Americans here, not least because his first campaign, in 1985, distributed a leaflet promising to address the "Arab problem." Things improved somewhat over the years — he visited Lebanon, and Arab-Americans donated heavily to his campaigns.

But last summer, he criticized the "mobs" protesting Israel's attacks against civilian targets in Lebanon and sent the Arab-American community a $23,000 bill for overtime for police officers and firefighters during the demonstration. The bill, sent to a coalition of Arab-American groups, resulted in a free-speech lawsuit.

When Mr. Guido died, several Arab-American candidates stepped forward, including a well-known local prosecutor and a former North American middleweight boxing champion who recently starred on "The Contender," a reality television series. An intensive vetting of candidates for the Feb. 27 election was started under the auspices of the Lebanese American Heritage Club so that the entire community could unite behind just one contender.

That did not happen, not least because the front-runner, John O'Reilly Jr., having been president of the City Council for 17 years, knew something about the internal rivalries pitting the Lebanese against the Iraqis against the Yemenis. Mr. O'Reilly, known as Jack, set out to separate the Yemenis from the rest of the Arab community here and succeeded in winning their early enthusiasm.

Arab-American candidates "come to us and say 'salaam aleikum' and a few other Arabic words to play on our emotions," said Nass Al Rayashi, one of the founders of the Yemeni American Political Action Committee, using the Arabic greeting of "peace be upon you." The committee was formed in March 2005 in large part because the Yemenis felt the Lebanese had dominated civic life at their expense.

The Yemenis, concentrated in the somewhat gritty South Side neighborhood sandwiched between the sprawling Ford Rouge plant and Woodmere Cemetery, want a candidate focused on local concerns. These include a lack of parking at the Dix Street mosque and pollution emitted by neighboring industrial areas including the Ford vehicle factory, which drew Arabs here for work for decades, but where fewer and fewer are finding jobs.

"Don't tell us you go to Ali so-and-so's house to eat Arab food," Mr. Rayashi added. "This is America, this is the melting pot. Our interests should be what is good for us here."

There has long been a division between the economically better off western side of Dearborn and the eastern side. In the old days, recalled Mr. O'Reilly, whose father was mayor from 1978 to 1985, the division was known as the "cake eaters" versus the "factory rats."

Now some see it as more like the Muslims versus everybody else.

"People are a little bit afraid of them," Mr. O'Reilly said, attributing it partly to traditional Christian education that he said had long taught that "their philosophy of religion was 'convert to Islam or die.' "

The fact that Arab-Americans in Dearborn are prone to demonstrations, including protests against last summer's war in Lebanon and the recent hanging of Saddam Hussein, only adds to the unease, he said.

Although more affluent Arab-American lawyers and real estate developers have gradually integrated the western part of the city, an ethnic divide remains. Abed Hammoud, a lead lawyer in the Wayne County prosecutor's office and the favorite of the Arab community until he withdrew from the mayor's race on Jan. 12, said he was met with surprise when he knocked on doors in western Dearborn.

"People reacted like I had come from the moon," said Mr. Hammoud, 41, a kinetic figure with receding salt and pepper hair who left Lebanon in 1985. "They said things like 'It's good of you to come to this end of town,' or they asked me about the people 'over there' and they meant the other side of town."

The Arab American Political Action Committee, which Mr. Hammoud and Mr. Siblani, the newspaper publisher, helped found in 1998 largely to inspire Arabs to run and vote, commissioned a poll to assess Mr. Hammoud's chances. They found Mr. O'Reilly, suddenly alone in the non-Arab field, commanding an unbeatable 65 percent lead to Mr. Hammoud's roughly 30 percent. They consoled themselves with the fact that Mr. Hammoud was likely to do better this time as a candidate than he did in his first mayoral primary, which fell on the unfortunate date of Sept. 11, 2001.

But basically the results suggested that at best he would capture the Arab vote — not enough to win the entire city of 100,000.

Time alone may favor the Arab-Americans here. Mr. Hammoud cited numbers showing that in 1998, there were 60,000 registered voters in the city, 8,500 of them Arab-Americans. Today, it is 14,500 out of 57,000, and at least 60 percent of high school students are Arab-Americans.

"People look at an Arab now, and the first thing that pops into their head is terrorism," said Tarick Salmaci, the boxer, who withdrew from the race. "We want to change that. Arab-Americans have to become political figures to change that.

Illegal Health Care (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

GOP Governors Arnold Schwarzenegger and Mitt Romney have become media darlings for proposing sweeping state health insurance reforms aimed at achieving "universal" coverage. Now out of office, Mr. Romney is trying to ride his plan to the Republican Presidential nomination. But it turns out state schemes that feature "pay or play" employer taxes or mandates are probably illegal.

At least that's the clear implication of a significant but underreported ruling last week by the Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals, which said that Maryland's "Fair Share" health legislation -- otherwise known as "the Wal-Mart tax" -- violates a federal employee-benefits law known by the acronym Erisa.

In this case, Maryland had sought to require all companies with 10,000 or more employees to spend at least 8% of their payroll on employee health care or pay the state the difference. Wal-Mart happened to be the only employer in Maryland large enough to fit that precise definition. But it joined with other firms under the Retail Industry Leaders Association to challenge the law, which was first struck down by a district court last summer.

Judge J. Frederick Motz wrote for that court that "The Act violates Erisa's fundamental purpose of permitting multi-state employers to maintain nationwide health and welfare plans, providing uniform nationwide benefits and permitting uniform national administration." Last week's Fourth Circuit ruling affirmed that decision, and it could spell trouble for the California and Massachusetts schemes.

Leave aside that the plan muscled into law by Maryland's Democratic legislature was far less ambitious. The basic similarity is that all three plans feature employer mandates or taxes aimed at changing employee-benefit plans -- in this case by requiring employers to provide health insurance.

Like the Maryland law, the California plan is explicit on the point, and would require all firms with 10 or more employers to provide health care or pay a 4% tax. This would seem clearly illegal according to the reasoning of the Fourth Circuit, which also said that the ostensibly "voluntary" nature of the Maryland tax was irrelevant from the standpoint of Erisa. No reasonable firm, it said, could be expected to choose to pay money to the state to avoid changing its employee-benefit plan.

Mr. Romney's Massachusetts scheme is slightly different, since it doesn't feature the same kind of percentage tax. But not only would Massachusetts charge a $295-a-head fee to employers that don't provide insurance, it would also make them liable for the catastrophic medical costs of uninsured employees. Again this is likely to fall afoul of Erisa, says one legal expert with whom we spoke, because these penalties are aimed at changing employee-benefit plans that are supposed to be voluntary according to federal law.

There were sound reasons that Congress decided to create a uniform national regulatory framework when it wrote the Erisa law way back in 1974. To wit: Freeing employers from the administrative burden of having to comply with a multitude of state and local requirements leaves them with more money to spend on actual health care and other benefits. It doesn't speak well of Messrs. Schwarzenegger and Romney and their staffs that they didn't seem to have given this well-known legislation much, if any, thought when crafting their reforms.

This week brings one other piece of bad news for proponents of the Massachusetts model, by the way. Early bids suggest the soon-to-be compulsory insurance policies that will pass muster under the scheme will be expensive -- starting at a whopping $380 per month, or $4,560 a year, for an individual. That's hardly surprising when you look at costs in other states that overregulate their insurance markets, such as New York. But it's more evidence that the better way to get people covered is to mimic the practices of less-regulated states such as Connecticut, where a 35-year-old man can get covered for as little as $50 per month.

We're all for state policy experiments, but these ballyhooed health care reforms are policy blunders that won't stand scrutiny in court, much less in the marketplace.

The Ironic Mr. Spitzer (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 23, 2007

What you denounce in politics can depend on where you sit, and here's hoping that's true of Eliot Spitzer. As New York's Attorney General, the Democrat was the scourge of the financial industry. And in a final rhetorical flourish in that job, he was among the first to denounce last month's report by the Committee on Capital Markets Regulation pointing to a decline in American financial industry competitiveness.

Now, however, Mr. Spitzer is New York's Governor, and it will be fascinating to see if he assumes a more statesmanlike pose toward the same industry. Both the New York state budget, and Mr. Spitzer's own political future, depend on the financial industry's prosperity, as the same Capital Markets Committee report made clear.

While the securities industry employs 2.2% of New York state's workers, those workers earned 9.2% of the state's gross income in 2005. The industry accounts for no less than 7% of "gross state product." And here's the kicker: At its peak in 2001, the securities industry paid 18.7% of total New York tax receipts, according to the state comptroller's office. The numbers for 2006 aren't yet in, but expect another banner year for bankers' tax bills. It's fashionable to decry big Wall Street bonuses, but New York politicians would be destitute without the income tax revenues from those bonuses.

Here's another irony: Mr. Spitzer's fate as Governor may also depend on the enforcement forbearance of his successor as AG, Andrew Cuomo. As the Capital Markets Committee noted, one of the main threats to U.S. public financial markets is multiple layers of regulation that can create double and triple jeopardy. In London, investors deal with a single regulator. But in New York, Mr. Spitzer made the state AG's office into another Securities and Exchange Commission. If Mr. Cuomo uses his powers the way Mr. Spitzer did, even fewer companies will want to go public in the U.S.

Two other New York politicians -- New York City Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Senator Chuck Schumer -- issued a new report yesterday on the regulatory risks to U.S. financial markets that we'll have more to say about soon. They're calling for less onerous regulation and tort reform. Perhaps Mr. Spitzer will have a similar epiphany once he discovers how dependent he now is on the state's financial entrepreneurs.

Scant Evidence Found Of Iran-Iraq Arms Link (LAT)

By Alexandra Zavis And Greg Miller, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 23, 2007

U.S. warnings of advanced weaponry crossing the border are overstated, critics say.

BAQUBAH, IRAQ — If there is anywhere Iran could easily stir up trouble in Iraq, it would be in Diyala, a rugged province along the border between the two nations.

The combination of Sunni Arab militants believed to be affiliated with Al Qaeda and Shiite Muslim militiamen with ties to Iran has fueled waves of sectarian and political violence here. The province is bisected by long-traveled routes leading from Iran to Baghdad and Shiite holy cities farther south in Iraq.

But even here, evidence of Iranian involvement in Iraq's troubles is limited. U.S. troops have found mortars and antitank mines with Iranian markings dated 2006, said U.S. Army Col. David W. Sutherland, who oversees the province. But there has been little sign of more advanced weaponry crossing the border, and no Iranian agents have been found.

In his speech this month outlining the new U.S. strategy in Iraq, President Bush promised to "seek out and destroy" Iranian networks that he said were providing "advanced weaponry and training to our enemies." He is expected to strike a similar note in tonight's State of the Union speech.

For all the aggressive rhetoric, however, the Bush administration has provided scant evidence to support these claims. Nor have reporters traveling with U.S. troops seen extensive signs of Iranian involvement. During a recent sweep through a stronghold of Sunni insurgents here, a single Iranian machine gun turned up among dozens of arms caches U.S. troops uncovered. British officials have similarly accused Iran of meddling in Iraqi affairs, but say they have not found Iranian-made weapons in areas they patrol.

The lack of publicly disclosed evidence has led to questions about whether the administration is overstating its case. Some suggest Bush and his aides are pointing to Iran to deflect blame for U.S. setbacks in Iraq. Others suggest they are laying the foundation for a military strike against Iran.

Before invading Iraq, the administration warned repeatedly that Saddam Hussein was developing nuclear, chemical and biological weapons. Those statements proved wrong. The administration's charges about Iran sound uncomfortably familiar to some. "To be quite honest, I'm a little concerned that it's Iraq again," Sen. John D. Rockefeller IV, head of the Senate Intelligence Committee, said last week, referring to the administration's comments on Iran.

Lowered credibility

The accusations of Iranian meddling "illustrate what may be one of our greatest problems," said Anthony Cordesman, a former Defense Department official and military expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington.

"We are still making arguments from authority without detail and explanation. We're making them in an America and in a world where we really don't have anything like the credibility we've had in the past."

Few doubt that Iran is seeking to extend its influence in Iraq. But the groups in Iraq that have received the most Iranian support are not those that have led attacks against U.S. forces. Instead, they are nominal U.S. allies.

The Supreme Council for Islamic Revolution in Iraq, one of the two largest parties in parliament, is believed to be the biggest beneficiary of Iranian help. The Shiite group was based in Iran during Hussein's reign, and Iran's Revolutionary Guard trained and equipped its Badr Brigade militia.

But the Supreme Council also has strong U.S. connections. Bush played host to the head of the party, Abdelaziz Hakim, at the White House in December, and administration officials have frequently cited Adel Abdul Mehdi, another party leader, as a person they would like to see as Iraq's prime minister.

The Islamic Dawa Party of Iraq's current prime minister, Nouri Maliki, also has strong ties to Iran.

Some U.S. officials have also suggested that Iran, a Shiite theocracy, has provided aid to the Sunni insurgents, who have led most of the attacks against U.S. forces. Private analysts and other U.S. officials doubt that. Evidence is stronger that the Iranians are supporting a Shiite group that has attacked U.S. forces, the Al Mahdi militia, which is loyal to radical cleric Muqtada Sadr.

Top U.S. intelligence officials have been making increasingly confident assertions about Iran.

"I've come to a much darker interpretation of Iranian actions in the past 12 to 18 months," CIA Director Michael V. Hayden said in recent congressional testimony. Previously, Tehran's priority was to maneuver for a stable Iraq dominated by its Shiite majority, but that attitude has changed, he said.

"There is a clear line of evidence that points out the Iranians want to punish the United States, hurt the United States in Iraq, tie down the United States in Iraq," he said.

One high-ranking intelligence official in Washington acknowledged a lack of "fidelity" in the intelligence on Iran's activities, saying reports are sometimes unclear because it is difficult to track weapons and personnel that might be flowing across the long and porous border.

But U.S. forces have picked up specially shaped charges used to make roadside bombs capable of penetrating advanced armor, he said, with markings that could be traced to Iran and dates that were recent. The markings have been found on the devices themselves or the crates in which they were smuggled into the country, he said.

"Two years ago we were debating whether this was really happening," the official said. "Now the debate is over."

Documents withheld

DOJ_NMG_0120589

U.S. officials have declined to provide documentation of seized Iranian ordnance despite repeated requests. The U.S. military often releases photographs of other weapons finds.

British government officials, including Prime Minister Tony Blair, have also accused Iran of supplying advanced explosive devices to Iraq.

Blair said a year ago that the weapons bore the hallmarks of Iran or Hezbollah, the Iranian-backed militia in Lebanon. But British officers stationed in Iraq at the time said they had seized no such weapons in the districts for which they had responsibility.

"We do have intelligence which suggests that weapons and ammunition are being smuggled in from Iran," Maj. David Gell, a spokesman for British forces in Basra, said last week. "We don't always manage to find any."

U.S. military officials in Diyala have had the same experience. No munitions or personnel have been seized at the border, officers said.

Sutherland, the U.S. colonel who oversees Diyala, believes that Tehran is prepared to work with any group, Shiite or Sunni, that can tie up U.S. forces. But State Department and intelligence officials have privately expressed doubts that Iranians are helping Sunnis.

Sunni insurgents in Diyala don't appear to need outside suppliers. They exploit massive weapons stashes containing materiel dating back to the Iran-Iraq war, when Hussein had a major military base in the area. U.S. military officials say they have found the type of shaped charges they attribute to Iran and Hezbollah in majority-Shiite parts of the province.

Outside military analysts have questioned how many of these sorts of weapons actually come from Iran. The technology used to make them is simple and widely known in the Middle East, they note. Iran is a likely source for some of the more sophisticated devices, but other countries could also be pitching in.

"A lot of rather sophisticated weapons have actually been released by Syria," said Peter Felstead, editor of the London-based Jane's Defense Weekly.

Others note that smugglers could be bringing weapons across the border from Iran without government approval.

'They are significant'

A second high-ranking U.S. intelligence official in Washington acknowledged that only a "small percentage" of explosions in Iraq could be linked to shaped charges coming from Iran.

"But in terms of American casualties, they are significant," he said, because they are much more lethal than standard roadside bombs.

A senior U.S. military intelligence official said coalition forces in Iraq had also found shaped charges "in the presence of Iranians captured in the country." He declined to elaborate but noted that U.S. operatives who raided an Iranian office in the Iraqi city of Irbil this month captured documents and computer drives he called a "treasure trove" on Iran's "networks, supply lines, sourcing and funding."

Five Iranians were taken into custody in the raid, prompting angry protests from the Iraqi government.

U.S. intelligence officials emphasized that Iran intentionally stops short of steps that would be seen as direct provocation and provide justification for a military response. For example, Iran has refrained from supplying Shiite militias with surface-to-air missiles and other weaponry that was part of Hezbollah's arsenal in its fight with Israel last summer, they said.

A high-ranking U.S. intelligence official called it a "careful calibration" that probably reflected disagreements within the Islamic regime. "I don't doubt that Iranian national security council meetings are very contentious," the official said.

West's Iran Plan Shows Gains. Will US Stick To It? (CSM)

By Howard LaFranchi

The Christian Science Monitor, January 23, 2007

With evidence mounting that international pressure on Iran is getting results, President Bush prepares to deliver a State of the Union speech Tuesday night that could provide signs of where efforts against Tehran and its nuclear program will go next.

Although it remains debatable what exactly is working – sanctions, Western unity, the threat of force, targeted US actions, or even deteriorating internal conditions – Iran appears to be responding, analysts say.

"The sanctions and international pressure are having an effect," says Joseph Cirincione, a nonproliferation expert at the Center for American Progress in Washington.

But Mr. Cirincione cautions against interpreting everything going on inside Iran as a direct response to international pressure on the nuclear program. "The sanctions are hurting Iran's economy, especially by [sowing] doubts among international investors and discouraging their involvement in the Iranian economy," he says. "At the same time, the pragmatists and reformers are using the sense of Iran's growing international isolation to strike back at [President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad, but for reasons unrelated to the nuclear issue."

In an unusual step, a majority in Iran's parliament has sent a letter to Mr. Ahmadinejad laying responsibility for the country's dire economic straits at his feet, and criticizing him for his high-profile foreign travel.

In addition, Ahmadinejad – who has made a global name for himself by defying the United States, European powers, and the United Nations Security Council with his nuclear-related taunts – appears to be coming under growing political pressure at home to stifle the brinkmanship.

Last week two prominent Iranian newspapers, including one owned by Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, Iran's supreme leader, rebuked Ahmadinejad over the nuclear issue and called on him to distance himself from nuclear policy. And in comments released Monday, Iran's most senior dissident cleric, Grand Ayatollah Hossein Ali Montazeri, joined the chorus of criticism.

Still, Ahmadinejad remained defiant over the weekend, dismissing criticism that his country's economy has been hurt by UN sanctions. Iran also announced new tests of short-range missiles.

While it is too early to say if Tehran will be ready to alter its nuclear course or is simply concerned about Ahmadinejad's extremist image, some experts say it is equally unclear how Mr. Bush will interpret the events in Tehran – and whether or not he will see them as the fruit of diplomacy.

"What we are seeing is the success of American and European pressure. It is not American pressure on its own," says Anatol Lieven, a foreign-policy expert at the New America Foundation in Washington. He sees growing Iranian isolation in the region "as a result of Iran's overambitious and menacing stance."

The turn of events is "an example of multilateralism, not of America working on its own," he says.

But will Bush see it that way?

It was in his State of the Union address of 2002 that Bush first spoke of Iran as part of an "axis of evil," for its support of what the US deems terrorist organizations. Since then, Tehran has advanced its nuclear program to uranium enrichment, while the US has developed contingency plans for taking out Iranian nuclear installations with air power.

Some analysts and a few prominent foreign diplomats – including Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov – have said they see unsettling parallels between US action and rhetoric on Iraq and America's Iran policy.

Yet since early 2005, the US has opened a diplomatic track, primarily with European powers, to stop Iran short of acquiring nuclear weapons through international pressure.

The Security Council approved a sanctions resolution against Iran late last year. The resolution was considerably weakened under veto threat from Russia and China – two of Iran's key commercial partners – but the move paved the way for the US to pursue tougher financial sanctions. It has also pursued action with a "coalition of the willing" of primarily European countries.

Earlier this month, the Treasury Department took action against an Iranian bank, prohibiting it from completing transactions in US dollars. The European Union is also considering tougher action against Tehran than the measures called for in the UN resolution.

At the same time, the US is taking some aggressive military steps: moving a second aircraft carrier into the Persian Gulf, for example, and detaining Iranians in Iraq, who it claims have links to an Iranian Revolutionary Guard faction that is allegedly supporting insurgents in Iraq.

Meanwhile, a number of US partners in the Middle East have adopted tougher stances vis-à-vis Tehran. Saudi Arabia is rebuffing Iranian efforts to engineer a cut in OPEC oil production that could stem a decline in the price of crude oil. And in a Jan. 16 meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, the foreign ministers of Egypt, Jordan, and several Gulf states issued a critical statement that, while oblique in its references, was clearly aimed at Iran.

The question now may be how long Bush – who has flatly ruled out allowing Iran to acquire nuclear weapons – will be willing to stick with an approach whose steering wheel is not solely in American hands.

Yet another question – raised to national prominence by the Iraq Study Group – is whether the US will eventually move to talks with Tehran as part of a regional effort to stabilize Iraq.

Mr. Lieven, speaking at a Washington forum last week, said that Iran is a "natural ally" when it comes to Afghanistan – indeed, the US worked with Iranian officials in the early stages of stabilizing post-Taliban Afghanistan.

Iran Bars 38 IAEA Nuclear Inspectors (AP)

By Nasser Karimi

AP, January 23, 2007

Iran has barred 38 nuclear inspectors on a United Nations list from entering the country, the foreign minister said Monday in what appeared to be retaliation for the U.N. sanctions imposed last month.

The rejected officials are on a list of potential inspectors drawn up by the International Atomic Energy Agency to visit and monitor Iran's nuclear facilities.

"The act of rejecting some inspectors is legal and in accordance with the agency's regulations," Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki told the official Islamic Republic News Agency. He said others on the U.N. nuclear watchdog's list remain eligible, but did not explain how Iran decided which inspectors to bar.

The IAEA "submits a long list of inspectors to member countries and the countries have the right to oppose the visit by some inspectors," Mottaki said.

Last month, the U.N. Security Council imposed limited trade sanctions on Iran over its refusal to cease uranium enrichment, a process that can produce the material for nuclear energy or bombs.

Days later, the Iranian parliament passed a motion that obliged the government to revise its cooperation with the IAEA, but gave it a free hand to determine the steps to be taken.

IAEA spokeswoman Melissa Fleming and other agency officials did not immediately return after-hours calls from The Associated Press.

The United States rebuked Iran for the move. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said it was "another example of the Iranians trying to dictate the terms to the international community — in this case, the IAEA."

The United States and some of its allies accuse Tehran of trying to develop nuclear weapons. Iran denies this, saying its program is only to produce nuclear energy.

Iranian hard-liners had urged the government to respond to sanctions by abrogating the Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty — the agreement under which the inspections are held.

Analysts said the decision to bar a limited number of inspectors appeared to be a measured retaliation.

"Iran is carefully calibrating its response, saving harsher measures for a further tit-for-tat response to the next U.N. Security Council resolution," said Mark Fitzpatrick, an Iran expert at the International Institute for Strategic Studies.

When the Security Council imposed sanctions on Dec. 23, it gave Iran 60 days to cease enrichment or face the likelihood of additional penalties.

Fitzpatrick said the decision to bar some inspectors was largely "a symbolic act of defiance."

"The IAEA has about 200 inspectors it could send to Iran, so stopping 38 of them will not impede its ability to carry out inspections, at least in the short term," he said. The move "demonstrates Iran's unwillingness to accept the U.N. Security Council mandate that it suspend enrichment."

The IAEA last visited Iranian nuclear facilities earlier this month when two inspectors came.

IAEA In Talks With Iran After Inspectors Blocked (AFP)

AFP, January 23, 2007

The International Atomic Energy Agency said it was discussing with Iran its demand to withdraw some nuclear inspectors but was confident it could continue monitoring the country's nuclear facilities.

"It should be noted however, that there are a sufficient number of inspectors designated for Iran and the IAEA is able to perform its inspection activities in accordance with Iran's Comprehensive Safeguards Agreement," IAEA spokeswoman Melissa Fleming said.

Earlier, the head of the Iranian parliament's national security commission told ISNA news agency that Iran has decided to block 38 IAEA inspectors in a fresh show of defiance over its nuclear aims.

Last month, Iran's parliament adopted a bill requiring the government to revise its cooperation with the IAEA after the UN Security Council passed a resolution to impose sanctions on Tehran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment work.

Alaeddin Borujerdi, head of parliament's national security commission, said on Monday that the blocking of the inspectors was a "first step in implementing the parliament legislation."

IAEA inspectors regularly visit Iranian nuclear sites under the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, to which Iran is a signatory.

The parliament adopted the bill in response to the UN resolution 1737 that imposes sanctions on Iran's nuclear and missile programmes.

DOJ_NMG_0120592

Iran, OPEC's second largest oil exporter, insists its nuclear programme is solely aimed at meeting peaceful energy needs. However, the West fears that it could be diverted towards building a bomb.

Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki told reporters on Monday that "any country had the right to refuse admission to inspectors", a position confirmed by IAEA diplomats.

Last July IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei said that 200 inspectors were charged with investigating Iran's nuclear activities, but did not stay permanently in Iran.

Previously they have only mainly encountered only minor problems, like delays in getting visas and restrictions on access to certain nuclear installations.

A diplomatic source at the IAEA said that Iran had a right to refuse access to its inspectors without giving a reason.

However, under Iran's agreement with the IAEA on the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, the IAEA can take action if Iran repeatedly refuses access to designated inspectors.

"If as a result of the repeated refusal of the government of Iran to accept the designation of agency inspectors, inspections to be conducted under this agreement would be impeded," according to the agreement.

"Such refusal shall be considered by the (IAEA) board upon referral by the director general of the agency with a view to its taking appropriate action," it says

The next meeting of the IAEA's council of governors is slated for March 5.

It is not the first time that Iran has denied access to an IAEA inspector.

Tehran banned a Belgian inspector, Chris Charlier, last April for talking to the press. It has also limited inspectors' access to some of its sites on several occasions.

Iran Bars Inspectors; Cleric Criticizes President (NYT)

By Nazila Fathi

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

TEHRAN, Jan. 22 — Iran is barring 38 nuclear agency inspectors from entering the country in retaliation for a United Nations resolution aiming to curb Iran's nuclear program, a senior Iranian lawmaker said Monday.

The announcement came only days after Grand Ayatollah Hossein Ali Montazeri, Iran's most senior dissident cleric, criticized President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's defiant stance against the West on the nuclear issue in a speech on Friday, calling it provocative. His comments were the first direct public attack on the president's nuclear policy by such a senior cleric.

The two developments suggest an increasingly open debate within Iran over how forcefully to confront the West over Iran's nuclear ambitions, even as its government continues to defend them.

Two hard-line newspapers, including one owned by the supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, have already called for the president to stay out of all nuclear matters. Ayatollah Montazeri said Iran has the right to nuclear technology but questioned the way Mr. Ahmadinejad has confronted the West.

"One has to deal with the enemy with wisdom," he said. "We should not provoke the enemy, otherwise the country will be faced with problems.

"We should get our right in a way that it does not create problems or excuses for others," he said.

"Besides, is this our only irrefutable right and we have no other rights?" he asked, referring to rising inflation since Mr. Ahmadinejad took office over a year ago.

Ayatollah Montazeri was once in line to become Iran's supreme religious leader, until he was banished and put under house arrest for his criticisms. His comments reflect the growing concern in Iran over additional economic sanctions if Iran continues to defy the international demand to halt its uranium enrichment program.

The United Nations Security Council passed a resolution on Dec. 23 and imposed sanctions banning the trade of goods related to Iran's nuclear program. It also gave Iran a deadline of two months to halt its uranium enrichment program or face tougher sanctions.

In response, Parliament passed a bill last month calling for the government to limit its cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency.

"The committee has decided to bar 38 inspectors from coming to Iran and we have announced the new limitation to the agency," said Alaedin Boroujerdi, the head of Parliament's committee for foreign policy and national security, the ISNA news agency reported.

The nuclear agency's inspectors visit Iran's nuclear facilities regularly. But last summer Iran said that it had decided not to let some of the inspectors return.

Still, Mr. Boroujerdi said that Iran planned to continue its cooperation with the agency, and that Iran would remain a party to the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty.

An I.A.E.A. spokeswoman, Melissa Flemming, said that the agency was confident that it could continue to monitor Iran's nuclear program.

"There are a sufficient number of inspectors designated for Iran, and the I.A.E.A. is able to perform its inspection activities in accordance with Iran's Comprehensive Safeguard Agreement," she said in an agency statement.

For his part, Mr. Ahmadinejad vowed again on Sunday that Iran would continue with its nuclear program, and brushed off the United Nations resolution as insignificant.

In Brussels on Monday, European Union foreign ministers called for all countries to enforce the sanctions against Iran. The British foreign secretary, Margaret Beckett, said a collective application of the sanctions was essential "to keep pressure on Iran to accept the offer of the international community to come back to the negotiating table."

European Union officials said they would apply the measures next month, including a ban on selling materials and technology that could be used in Iran's nuclear and missile programs and the freezing of the assets of 10 Iranian companies and individuals.

Germany's foreign minister, Frank-Walter Steinmeier, said it was time to take a tough and united stance on Iran but kept the option of diplomacy open. "There is a need to send a clear signal, and we need to show resolve," he said.

Iranian Cleric Hits Tehran's Tactics (WT/AP)

By Ali Akbar Dareini

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

TEHRAN -- Iran's most senior dissident cleric said President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's aggressive nuclear diplomacy had harmed the country, joining a chorus of criticism that has included even the hard-line leader's allies.

The comments by Grand Ayatollah Hossein Ali Montazeri, released yesterday, reflected a growing feeling among many that Mr. Ahmadinejad has concentrated too much on fiery, anti-U.S. speeches and not enough on the economy.

Ayatollah Montazeri, 85, is one of a few grand ayatollahs, the most senior theologians of the Shi'ite Muslim faith. He had been the designated successor of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, founder of the 1979 Islamic revolution, until he fell out with Ayatollah Khomeini shortly before his 1989 death after complaining about powers wielded by unelected clerics.

He said Iranians have the right to nuclear power, but questioned Mr. Ahmadinejad's dealings with the international community in obtaining it.

"One has to deal with the enemy with wisdom, not provoke it," he said, according to a copy of his comments made available to the Associated Press.

"This [provocation] only creates problems for the country," he told a group of reformists and opponents of Mr. Ahmadinejad on Friday in the holy city of Qom, 80 miles south of the capital, Tehran.

In the kind of action that might be described as a "provocation" by the dissident ayatollah, Iran said yesterday it has barred 38 members of a U.N. nuclear-inspection team from entering the country, in what appeared to be retaliation for sanctions imposed last month over its contentious atomic program.

Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said some inspectors were admitted, but he maintained that Iran could decide who should be turned away.

Last month, the U.N. Security Council imposed limited trade sanctions on Iran because of its refusal to cease uranium enrichment, a process that produces the material for nuclear reactors or bombs. Days later, the country's parliament passed a motion that obliged the government to revise its cooperation with the International Atomic Energy Agency but gave it a free hand to determine the steps to be taken.

Meanwhile, the prices of fruit, vegetables and food staples have skyrocketed since the U.N. imposed the limited sanctions.

"Some countries don't have oil and gas. Yet, they run their country and stand on their own. We have so much oil and gas but make useless expenditures work for others and don't think of our own people's problems, and the price of basic commodities go higher and higher every day," Ayatollah Montazeri said.

Ayatollah Montazeri appeared to be referring to Mr. Ahmadinejad's foreign trips, the latest of which was to Latin America, and to Iranian financial aid to the Palestinians.

The Palestinian foreign minister for the Hamas-led government said in November while visiting Iran that Tehran had given his government more than $120 million in the previous year.

Mr. Ahmadinejad was elected last year on a populist agenda promising to bring oil revenues to every family, eradicate poverty and tackle unemployment. But he has faced increasingly fierce criticism in recent weeks for his failure to meet those promises.

Iran Tests Missiles As Fear Of Attack Grows (FT)

By Gareth Smyth

Financial Times, January 23, 2007

Iran began military manoeuvres in its central desert on Monday, testing short-range missiles at a time of rising tension with the US and as President Mahmoud Ahmadi-Nejad faces continuing criticism at home.

State radio reported that Revolutionary Guards were test-firing both the 350km-range Zelzal-1 missile and the 70km range Fajr-5 near the town of Garmsar, 80km south-east of Tehran.

Mohsen Rezaei, an influential conservative politician and former Revolutionary Guards commander, told state television at the weekend that Washington had opted for "serious confrontation" with Iran, in which it "intends to resolve its problem in the Middle East".

That was a rare glimpse for the Iranian public of the seriousness with which leading officials view the situation, especially in his acknowledgment that America or Israel might attack Iran's atomic sites.

The US announced this month it was moving a second aircraft carrier into the Gulf and deploying Patriot missiles capable of shooting down shorter-range missiles.

Questioned on Sunday by reporters over the possibility of military clashes, a confident Mr Ahmadi-Nejad replied: "What war?" But he faces criticism over both foreign policy and the budget for the Iranian year 2007-8, which he presented to parliament on Sunday.

Deputies from parliament's economic committees quoted in Monday's newspapers were generally sceptical of the accuracy of the budget figures given by Mr Ahmadi-Nejad. One economist told the Financial Times the budget was "structured in such a way as to hide what looks like a growing deficit".

Kazem Jalali, a deputy, was more poetic. "I hope the president's dreams come true one day," he told Ayandeh-No newspaper.

Criticism has also come from one of the most senior Shia clerics. Grand Ayatollah Hossein-Ali Montazeri made a thinly veiled attack on the president on Saturday for his "radical and provocative slogans", and argued that Iran's rights could be defended without giving "pretexts" to the US.

Grand Ayatollah Montazeri, 85, is a reformist dissident based in the holy city of Qom, where Mr Ahmadi-Nejad's allies won only three of nine seats in last month's local elections.

¦Manouchehr Mottaki, Iran's foreign minister, said on Monday that the country was barring some inspectors from the International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations body monitoring its nuclear facilities.

But Mr Mottaki added confusion when he said Iran would make a statement next week on "the nationalities Iran opposes", apparently contradicting a statement from Alaeddin Boroujerdi, the head of parliament's foreign affairs and national security commission, who said Iran was refusing entry to 38 inspectors but that nationality was "not the main basis".

Melissa Fleming, of the IAEA, said "details of inspector designation" were confidential and the agency was discussing Iran's "request for withdrawing the designation of certain . . . inspectors".

Seoul Asks Washington To Ease Sanctions On Pyongyang: Reports (AFP)

AFP, January 23, 2007

South Korea has told the United States that some of the frozen North Korean accounts in a Macau bank are from legitimate business and should be unblocked, news reports said Tuesday.

North Korea insists its accounts be unfrozen before any more multinational talks are held on dismantling its nuclear weapons programme.

Chosun Ilbo newspaper quoted an unidentifed high-ranking source in Washington as saying that South Korea asked the United States to consider unfreezing at least five of the 50 accounts with Banco Delta Asia (BDA).

Yonhap news agency also said on Monday that top South Korean officials have told US counterparts that five to seven of the BDA accounts are legitimate.

"This means that as far as we've confirmed, those accounts have nothing to do with drug trafficking, money-laundering or counterfeit dollars," the source was quoted as saying by Chosun.

"Releasing money in those accounts from the freeze is aimed at saving North Korea's face in order to encourage it to proceed with the six-party talks," the source said.

The talks that began in 2003 and reached a tentative deal in September 2005 have failed to bring any tangible progress. Pyongyang insists that a US blacklist, which led to a freeze of its Macau accounts and others in Asia, be withdrawn.

The US has said the matter is a law enforcement issue aimed at curbing the North's counterfeiting of dollars and is unrelated to the six-party talks.

Chosun quoted Kim Kye-Gwan, North Korea's chief delegate to the six-party talks, as saying he and his US counterpart Christopher Hill made progress on the bank issue in talks in Berlin last week.

"When we say progress, it includes the financial sanctions, of course," Kim reportedly told journalists in Moscow.

"(The result of the Berlin talks) was okay with us as we have agreed that the US side must not shun the issue (when the six-party talks resume)."

Hill said on Monday in Tokyo that host China is expected to announce the date for a new round this week.

U.N. Chief Announces N.Korea Fund Audit (AP)

By Justin Bergman

AP, January 23, 2007

Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon announced Monday that an external audit would be conducted of the U.N. Development Program in North Korea after the U.S. alleged the program had funneled millions of dollars to Kim Jong Il's regime.

The audit will initially focus on UNDP spending in North Korea and then be expanded to other U.N. agencies, though details have yet to be finalized, said Ban's spokeswoman, Michele Montas, who made the announcement his behalf.

The audit will be conducted by the U.N.'s Board of Auditors, which is comprised of accountants from eight U.N. members, she said.

U.S. deputy ambassador Mark Wallace alleged Friday that the UNDP's North Korea operation had been run "in blatant violation of U.N. rules" for years. He demanded an outside audit focusing on concerns that development funds had been used by Pyongyang for "its own illicit purposes."

UNDP Administrator Kemal Dervis said Monday there is "no justification for the extreme allegations" made by Wallace, adding that UNDP is "doing its best in very difficult circumstances."

The agency said it welcomed the external audit, stressing it is committed to operating in a transparent manner.

"The external auditors can come in anytime they want and look at anything they want," said UNDP spokesman David Morrison.

U.S. officials said they first received indications there might be irregularities in UNDP's North Korea program last year. They raised concerns the cash might be misused, possibly for Pyongyang's nuclear program.

Wallace has made several allegations in letters to senior UNDP officials, which were first reported by The Wall Street Journal. He has said that UNDP's local staff is dominated by North Korean government employees who managed the agency's programs and finances in violation of UNDP rules.

The U.S. cited three other violations of U.N. rules — the government's insistence that UNDP pay cash to North Korean government suppliers, and UNDP's failure to oversee projects it funds in the country or to audit its programs.

On Monday, the agency sought to refute the allegations, insisting the North Korean program followed UNDP financial rules.

Morrison said the agency has spent about $3 million annually over the last 10 years on programs in North Korea, in addition to about $600,000 in office costs, which include local salaries and supplies. The programs focus on food production, rural and environmental sector management, economic management and social sector management.

Morrison rejected the assertion that UNDP "has been doling out buckets of cash," saying the agency does the vast majority of its spending in euros through checks and bank transfers, using cash only for travel purposes and minor expenses.

He also said UNDP international staff have visited nearly all their project sites in the past two years to ensure funds are being used appropriately.

The UNDP has conducted three internal audits of its North Korean program in the last eight years, the last in 2004. Another internal audit was scheduled for this year, Morrison said.

The agency's executive board was expected to meet Thursday to discuss the program's mandate over the next three years. The agency is working with board members to find a compromise that would allow the program to continue operating in the country, said a UNDP staff member, who spoke on condition of anonymity because talks were ongoing.

Ban Orders Audit Of U.N. Operation In N. Korea (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

NEW YORK -- U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon yesterday ordered a thorough audit of the U.N. Development Program's operation in North Korea, the first in a sweeping assessment of all U.N. agencies, funds and programs.

The audit will specifically look at hard-currency transactions, the independence of locally hired staff, and the agency's ability to monitor ongoing projects. UNDP, which spends about $3.6 million annually on a dozen projects inside the repressive country, yesterday welcomed the audit and promised to cooperate.

Mr. Ban said he wants the UNDP audit completed within three months, the first phase in an ambitious accounting that could take years and millions of dollars to complete. U.N. officials yesterday could not say how much the effort would eventually cost.

The United States -- which funds 11 percent of UNDP's annual budget but does not contribute to the North Korea program -- has raised serious concerns that hard currency from UNDP may be finding its way into the government's nuclear weapons program.

An editorial in Friday's Wall Street Journal suggested that hundreds of millions of dollars had been diverted by the government from UNDP programs, and said the agency was undermined by permitting the Pyongyang government to choose local personnel for its programs.

David Morrison, UNDP director of communications, told a small group of reporters yesterday that the program has four international staffers in North Korea. Those staffers have been able to visit 10 out of 11 projects in the country and have few concerns over access and monitoring issues, he said.

He rejected comparisons to the Iraq oil-for-food program, which Saddam Hussein was able to manipulate to siphon hundreds of millions of dollars into private pockets.

"Working in [North] Korea is a tough job," he said. "We always have to be wary of the possibility of any kind of misrepresentation of activities in any country in the world."

Mr. Morrison noted that UNDP long ago switched to using euros rather than dollars as the convertible currency in North Korea, in part because of U.S. concerns about counterfeiting and partly because Pyongyang prefers it for political reasons.

U.N. officials routinely refused to publicly criticize the governments of countries where they are running development or humanitarian work, saying that would will only make life more difficult for international staff on the ground, and possibly draw new restrictions on their efforts.

Many of these issues have been identified in UNDP's three internal audits of the North Korea program, in 1999, 2001 and 2004; a fourth will be under way shortly.

Those audits are not made public or even shared with the 36 nations that serve on UNDP's Executive Board, which will discuss the North Korea program on Thursday. Instead, the reports are reviewed by an external auditor, then distilled further and presented to the executive committee.

U.S. officials, among others, have demanded access to the initial audits, as well as source material, saying that as major donors to UNDP programs they have a right to know how those programs are managed.

However, UNDP officials have maintained the audits are internal management tools and not intended for general distribution.

"We are aware that there is a difference between the regime I've just described and practices the secretariat has just introduced, and we are reviewing whether we should ... change our practice," Mr. Morrison said.

UNDP is also the coordinating agency for other U.N. efforts in the country, including programs of the World Food Program and UNICEF.

U.S. law prohibits using taxpayer money in repressive regimes such as Iran, Cuba and North Korea. Therefore, Washington subtracts its share of the North Korea program's costs from its overall contribution to the agency.

Korean Nuclear Envoys Meet In China (AP)

AP, January 23, 2007

The North and South Korean nuclear envoys met in Beijing, the South Korean Foreign Ministry said Tuesday, part of the latest efforts to restart six-nation negotiations on Pyongyang's atomic weapons program.

The South's Chun Yung-woo met North Korean negotiator Kim Kye Gwan in Beijing, the Foreign Ministry said, without giving any further details.

The meeting is the latest in a series of talks between envoys from the countries involved in the six-party negotiations — China, Japan, Russia, the U.S. and the two Koreas — aimed at setting a date for the resumption of wider discussions on dismantling North Korea's nuclear programs.

The last session of the talks in December, the first after the North's nuclear test, failed to make any progress. Officials have said they expect the negotiations to resume before mid-February.

Envoys At N. Korea Talks Optimistic (AP)

By Burt Herman

DOJ_NMG_0120597

Envoys to the six-party talks on North Korean nuclear disarmament are sounding rare notes of optimism, raising hopes for progress after their expected return to the bargaining table in coming weeks.

The talks could bring the first steps toward turning back the clock on North Korea's nuclear development since Pyongyang restarted its main nuclear reactor more than four years ago and proved its long-claimed atomic arsenal with its first test explosion in October.

At the last round of the talks in December, the United States and its partners — China, Japan, Russia and South Korea — could not even get North Korea to talk about its nuclear program. Instead, the North stuck to its previous demand that Washington desist from a campaign to financially isolate the country for alleged counterfeiting and money laundering.

But there have recently been hints of a positive foundation being laid for future arms talks, even though no date has been set for their resumption. That includes hopeful talk from the North itself, after an unusual series of one-on-one meetings in Berlin last week between the main U.S. and North Korean negotiators.

The North went out of its way Friday to say that a "certain agreement" had been reached at those sessions, sentiment that encouraged other countries involved.

"On the whole, the impression is developing that the North Korean side has interpreted the results of the talks in Berlin with a certain optimism," Russian nuclear envoy Deputy Foreign Minister Alexander Losyukov said Monday after meeting over the weekend with North Korean negotiator Kim Kye Gwan, according to a report by Russia's Interfax news agency.

U.S. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, who represents Washington at the nuclear talks, said Monday in Beijing that there was "a basis for making progress" when the six-nation nuclear negotiations resume.

Officials have not publicly elaborated on what progress would mean. But a South Korean newspaper report Monday said the North and U.S. had come close to an agreement in Berlin for freezing North Korea's reactor and allowing the return of international monitoring in exchange for aid for the impoverished country.

Pyongyang kicked out international inspectors at the end of 2002 as it restarted its nuclear reactor. That prompted the latest nuclear crisis, sparked after the U.S. accused the North of a secret uranium enrichment program in violation of an earlier disarmament deal.

Since then the North's reactor has churned out more plutonium for use in bombs, with experts estimating the country could now have enough radioactive material for as much as about a dozen bombs.

The United States also denied a report by the Russian news agency Interfax that separate talks between the U.S. and North Korea on the financial sanctions would resume in Beijing this week.

The six-nation talks started in August 2003, and since then only resulted in a single agreement in September 2005 on a statement of principles for the North's disarmament in exchange for aid and security guarantees. They have yet to be put into practice.

Several envoys have said they expect the nuclear talks to resume before mid-February, when the Lunar New Year is celebrated across Asia.

Actual progress could be added cause for celebration this year on the continent, where North Korea's nuclear ambitions have rattled nerves and raised prospects for an arms race that could spread across northeast Asia.

But if there are no results this time, the holiday will instead be a time for serious soul-searching about the viability of the process — possibly leading to new means of pressuring North Korea to give up its nuclear arms.

Nuke Talks Unencumbered (WT)

By Edward Lanfranco

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

BEIJING -- Christopher R. Hill, the top American envoy for eliminating North Korea's nuclear weapons program, said yesterday that the resumption of six-party talks in Beijing should not be affected by U.S. concerns over China's test of an anti-satellite missile.

"My government's position on that is pretty clear," Mr. Hill, the assistant secretary of state for East Asian and Pacific affairs, told reporters. "We've certainly conveyed [concern] to the Chinese, but I would say the six-party talks are on a different track."

Mr. Hill acknowledged having "private discussions" Sunday night with his Chinese counterpart, Vice Foreign Minister Wu Dawei, about the Jan. 11 test in which China shot down an obsolete satellite with a ballistic missile. He referred further questions to other State Department officials and the Pentagon, saying, "I don't want to be the spokesman on it today."

The American diplomat was in Beijing to inform the Chinese of progress made in Berlin last week during three days of discussions with Kim Kye-gwan, the head of the North Korean delegation to the six-party talks. He already had briefed counterparts in Seoul and Tokyo.

Mr. Kim appears to have shown greater willingness to treat U.S. financial sanctions and North Korean nuclear disarmament as separate issues, clearing the way for a resumption of nuclear negotiations that broke down at the end of December.

Mr. Hill said no venue had been set for discussion of the financial issue, "although that will not be a problem." The State Department will have to "fine-tune the date for the talks" with the Treasury Department, but he predicted they would take place "very soon, probably at the same time or even before the six-party talks."

"We are down to a question of logistics now," he said, adding that his latest talks had been held in Berlin only because of a "coincidence of schedules."

Mr. Hill offered few details about what he called "lengthy discussions" with Mr. Wu, but said the two had agreed on the need to restart the six-party process at an early date.

"We felt we should have done more in the December round, and we want to get going on implementing the September Statement," he said. "We have some ideas for doing that and have had some good discussions all around about how to do it."

In September 2005, negotiators struck a deal in which North Korea would abandon its nuclear weapons program in exchange for security guarantees and economic aid. Subsequent six-party talks stalled after the Treasury Department moved to have a North Korean bank account frozen in Macau and were further complicated when Pyongyang detonated a nuclear device in October.

"I don't want to go into the specifics, but I do believe we have a basis for making progress in the six-party talks," Mr. Hill said. "People ask if I'm optimistic. I'd rather not make a bet on the game I'm playing in, but I think based on all the consultations we've had in the last week we have a basis for getting together as soon as possible."

Somali Islamists' No. 2 Leader Surrenders In Kenyan Capital (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

NAIROBI, Kenya, Jan. 22 — The second in command of Somalia's defeated Islamist forces has surrendered to the Kenyan authorities and is staying at a hotel in Nairobi, Western diplomats and Somali officials said Monday.

Sheik Sharif Ahmed, the head of the Islamist Courts Union executive council, was part of a group of Islamist leaders being hunted down by American and Ethiopian troops in southern Somalia. Described as a moderate Muslim and potential peacemaker, he surfaced at the Kenya-Somalia border in the past week, Somali officials said, and now the Kenyan immigration authorities are deliberating on what to do with him.

"Sheik Sharif is in Nairobi," said Abdirahman Dinari, spokesman for Somalia's transitional government. "We are waiting for the next move."

Several Western diplomats said American officials, who have urged Somalia's newly empowered government to reconcile with moderate Islamist leaders, were instrumental in arranging Mr. Ahmed's safe passage to Kenya.

"He decided to come to Kenya only after getting a guarantee from the Americans that he would not be deported" back to Somalia, said one Western diplomat in Nairobi who spoke on condition of anonymity. "He's been here a week."

Over the weekend, the BBC broadcast an interview with Michael E. Ranneberger, the American ambassador to Kenya, in which Mr. Ranneberger said, "We certainly have made clear to the T.F.G.," Somalia's transitional federal government, "that it needs to talk to all elements, and that includes people such as, for example, Sheik Sharif."

At that point, Mr. Ahmed, a school-teacher turned religious leader, was still widely believed to be hiding in the marshes of southern Somalia or possibly dead.

On Monday, an American Embassy official denied that the United States played any role in bringing him to Kenya. "We're not holding or interrogating or protecting him," she said on condition of anonymity. "We're not involved in this operation in any way."

Kenyan officials did not return calls for comment.

European diplomats in Kenya said that American officials were playing an increasingly large behind-the-scenes role in Somalia, pursuing an aggressive counterterrorism agenda but also trying to shape Somalia's political future.

Several Somali leaders seemed to welcome this involvement, saying that Italy, the other Western power in Somalia, had discredited itself by trying to establish a rapport with the Islamists before they were defeated.

Last month, the Islamists attacked Somalia's transitional government, which was based in Baidoa. What they did not expect was a crushing response from Somalia's neighbor Ethiopia, which sided with the transitional government because Ethiopian officials viewed the Islamists as a regional threat.

It took all of one week for the Ethiopian-led forces, with approval from American officials, to rout the Islamist army and install the transitional government in Mogadishu, Somalia's bullet-pocked capital by the sea.

Mogadishu is now loosely controlled by a mix of Ethiopian troops and government soldiers, who are struggling to pacify a population that is armed to the teeth. On Monday, residents said a gun battle between Ethiopian troops and masked men in a crowded livestock market killed seven people, four of them insurgents and three civilians.

Western diplomats said Mr. Ahmed, 42, could be enormously helpful in defusing the violence because he has a devoted following among former Islamist fighters, who are suspected of being the backbone of Somalia's growing insurgency.

United Nations officials said Mr. Ahmed could be granted political asylum in Kenya or another country in the region, possibly Yemen, so that he can meet with Somalia's new leaders on neutral soil and map out a path forward.

Abdirizak Adam Hassan, chief of staff for transitional president Abdullahi Yusuf Ahmed, said that if Mr. Ahmed renounced violence, he would be welcome back in Somalia.

"We're not after his blood," Mr. Hassan said.

The case is a little different, though, for Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, the Islamists' top leader. Mr. Aweys is nowhere to be found, and most Somalis believe that he will never turn himself in because American and Ethiopian officials have accused him of being a terrorist.

Somali Islamic Leader Surrenders In Kenya (WP)

By Stephanie McCrummen

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

NAIROBI, Jan. 22 -- A top moderate leader of Somalia's ousted Islamic Courts movement surrendered to Kenyan authorities Monday, and U.S. officials are hoping he can help subdue a rising insurgency among the movement's supporters on the streets of the Somali capital, Mogadishu.

After dodging U.S. and Ethiopian airstrikes in the mangrove forests of southern Somalia, Sharif Ahmed is under the protection of Kenyan authorities in a comfortable Nairobi hotel that he is not allowed to leave. U.S. officials have never accused him of any crime and are portraying him as a moderate Islamic leader with whom the Somali government should negotiate.

European Union officials have made reconciliation with Islamic leaders in Somalia a condition of financing a proposal to send African Union peacekeepers to the country.

The U.S. and European diplomatic pressure to negotiate comes as Somali and Ethiopian troops in Mogadishu are conducting house-to-house hunts almost daily for people accused of supporting the Islamic movement, which Ethiopian troops overthrew last month.

The ongoing purge in the broken-down capital is creating an atmosphere veering toward paranoia. Many Somalis, including members of the new government's parliament, have gone into hiding for fear of being arrested, and others are afraid even to talk about the ousted Islamic movement, according to people in several Mogadishu neighborhoods who were interviewed by telephone.

Abdirahman Dinari, a spokesman for the Somali government, declined to comment on the prospect of negotiations with Ahmed or other Islamic leaders. He said the arrests in recent weeks have targeted people suspected of involvement in attacks on Somali and Ethiopian troops, including the shelling of the presidential residence in Mogadishu on Friday. On Saturday, the deputy chairman of the Islamic Courts, Ahmed Qare, asserted responsibility for that attack.

"If there is someone who is innocent, we will release them," Dinari said.

Families, neighbors and some local leaders, however, describe the arrests as part witch hunt and part orchestrated campaign of revenge.

"Anyone known to have spoken out in favor of the Courts is in hiding," said Mohamud Uluso, a prominent member of the sub-sub clan called the Ayr, which had provided substantial military and financial support to the Islamic Courts. "They did not commit any crime, but publicly they supported the Courts. They did not kill anyone. They did nothing."

According to witnesses, the arrests have at times been more like kidnappings, with plainclothes security forces blindfolding people, throwing them into trucks and hauling them off to secret locations. There have been reports of Somalis settling petty arguments with neighbors by accusing them of supporting the Islamic Courts, with Ethiopian troops then swooping in to take the accused away.

While some of those arrested have been released after several days -- or after relatives pay -- others remain missing.

Ethiopian and Somali government troops came after dark last week to Ahmed Luqman's crowded, lantern-lit neighborhood, where he has lived with his wife and six children for more than 20 years.

Soldiers surrounded the area known as Bulo Huvey, broke down a metal gate, shoved their way into a neighbor's house and arrested at least two people whom Luqman has known for years, he said.

Certain he was next, although not sure why, he climbed through a window and ran.

DOJ_NMG_0120600

"I escaped," recounted Luqman, who said he was never a staunch supporter of the Islamic movement. "Now I live somewhere far from where I used to live, because I'm afraid. I'm afraid for myself. I know a lot have been arrested. Some have been killed. But I can't tell exactly the number."

The U.S. State Department tacitly supported the Ethiopian invasion that pushed the Courts movement from power, and in December it cast the Islamic Courts as a group controlled by an al-Qaeda cell. Many regional analysts and diplomats have described that claim as exaggerated.

This month, U.S. and Ethiopian aircraft conducted strikes targeting not only three men suspected in the 1998 bombings of U.S. embassies -- and whom the Courts were accused of sheltering -- but also certain Courts leaders accused of having al-Qaeda connections.

"To defeat them, the U.S. put them all in one basket," said Uluso, who met with State Department officials when the Islamic Courts came to power last June. "Then, after they were defeated, the thinking was they could maybe reconsider and take the good guys and empower them, so that the image that America is against Islam will not be on the table. Because that has been the impression in the Islamic world."

But the U.S. airstrike in southern Somalia -- aid groups have reported that it killed at least 20 civilians -- plus the continuing arrests are working against the goal of inclusion, said a top leader of the Islamic movement who is still in the region.

The leader, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the sensitivity of the situation, warned that if the detentions continue, "things could get ugly."

He said that the leadership of the Islamic Courts is "completely intact" and that U.S. ambassadors have been in contact with some of its members.

Somali Prime Minister Ali Mohamed Gedi has often used the label "terrorist" to justify the detentions. But the pattern of arrests suggests to many analysts in the region that the situation is less about fighting a global war on terrorism than it is about Ethiopia trying to address its internal security problems and help Somali government leaders settle their own old scores.

For one, the arrests are heavily targeting Ayr neighborhoods that had supported the Courts. The Ayr are considered rivals of Somali President Abdullahi Yusuf's clan, the Darod. Moreover, Yusuf, a close ally of Ethiopia, has had a long-standing personal feud with Islamic Courts leader Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys, who is Ayr and is on a U.S. list of people suspected of ties to al-Qaeda. Aweys has consistently denied such ties.

There has also been an ethnic dimension to the arrests. Ethiopian and Somali security forces are focusing on people such as Luqman who are from a region of Ethiopia along the Somali border where an underground group has been fighting for years to end Ethiopian control. The group, the Oromo Liberation Front, was suspected of having people in Mogadishu and of cooperating with the Islamic Courts.

But the Oromo region has also been the scene of droughts and other tribulations that have forced thousands of refugees across the border and into Somali cities, including Mogadishu.

"Whether a man has relations with those organizations or not, he will be arrested," Luqman said. "Because he is Oromo. They can't distinguish if he belongs to the movement or not. So that's the problem."

At one Oromo refugee camp, a sprawl of doorless houses with cardboard roofs, the people left were mostly old men, women and children. A leader there, Abdirahman Omar, 67, said that Ethiopian and Somali troops showed up after morning prayers Jan. 4 and arrested 12 Oromo refugees, including his son, Aden. All remain missing.

"He does not even speak the Oromo language," said Omar, who came to Somalia in 1979 and said his son is a math teacher. "He knows nothing about Ethiopia, let alone Ethiopian politics."

In another neighborhood, Kilometre Four, Habiba Dahir said that her husband, Abdijabar Isee, an Oromo, was arrested recently as he was walking down the street with a Somali friend.

The friend told her later that a plainclothes Somali policeman approached them and asked Abdijabar for his name, and that shortly afterward a pickup truck full of green-uniformed Somali police officers drove up, blindfolded her husband and threw him in the truck with another blindfolded man.

"At first we were told he was killed, but later we learned he is alive," said Dahir, who denied her husband was involved with any militant movement. "I can't say any more."

China Denies Intent To Militarize Space (AP)

AP, January 23, 2007

Chinese Foreign ministry officials have told a visiting U.S. diplomat that China's successful test of an anti-satellite weapon should not be seen as a threat and does not signal the beginning of a race to militarize space, the State Department said Monday.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill raised the issue with Chinese officials over the weekend in Beijing. China has not made a public announcement of the Jan. 11 test, in which it shot down one of its own old weather satellites, but officials acknowledged it during their meeting with Hill, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Hill, who heads the State Department's East Asia bureau, told the Chinese they should be more forthcoming about their military activities and their defense budget. These issues have been a long-running concern of the United States, and McCormack said the Chinese have taken only "baby steps" thus far toward more openness.

McCormack said the United States seeks "greater understanding of exactly what their intent was" in testing the anti-satellite weapon. He said Hill also asked for details of the test and what plans China may have for future tests.

"All of this is designed, really, to avoid any sort of misunderstandings, not only with the United States, but other countries around the world," McCormack said.

Hill was in Beijing as part of a three-nation visit to exchange views on talks with North Korea over its nuclear weapons program. He also visited South Korea and Japan.

In criticizing the test on Friday, the State Department said "modern life as we know it" depends on the security of space-based technology, whose uses include data transmission, communications and weather forecasting.

China Tells Senior US Official Not To Worry About Anti-satellite Test (AFP)

AFP, January 23, 2007

China has told a senior US official that a recent test of a Chinese satellite killer missile did not signal a threat to other countries or a bid to militarize space, the State Department said.

Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill raised US objections to the test with senior Chinese officials during a visit to Beijing over the weekend, State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

"The bottom line is we encourage them to be more forthcoming, more transparent with respect to not only this test but also their space program," McCormack said when asked about the message delivered by Hill.

The Chinese, who had not previously confirmed carrying out the test earlier this month, told Hill "this was not a threat against anybody and was not meant to spark a race to militarize space," McCormack told reporters.

Hill was in Beijing for separate talks on organizing a new round of six-party negotiations aimed at halting North Korea's nuclear weapons program.

"It's has been a continuing topic for us to encourage the Chinese to become a little more transparent in terms of their military spending and their military programs," McCormack said.

"They haven't been very forthcoming, is the assessment to date," he said.

The United States revealed last week that China had destroyed an orbiting weather satellite earlier this month using a ballistic missile -- making it the third country after the former Soviet Union and the United States to shoot down an object in space.

The successful test meant China can theoretically shoot down spy satellites or other orbiters operated by other nations, sparking fears of a space-based arms race.

On Friday Washington voiced concern the test may also have scattered debris in space that could endanger the manned International Space Station or orbiting satellites.

US magazine Aviation Week and Space Technology, which first reported the test, said the missile was fired from the Xichang space center in central Sichuan province on January 11 and had destroyed a Chinese weather satellite launched in 1999.

The impact reportedly occurred more than 500 miles (800 kilometres) above Earth, high enough to hit orbiting satellites.

Washington for now has virtual supremacy in space, with Russia having lost much of its means and China generally still just starting out.

A Global Mission For China And America (FT)

By Robert Zoellick

Financial Times, January 23, 2007

America and China need to develop an agenda as mutual stakeholders in the world economy. The new strategic economic dialogue and the energy group launched by China with the US, India, Japan and South Korea supply the means to do so.

So far the media focus has been on the appreciation of China's currency. Progress on this issue will establish a sense of fair competition. Yet the Sino-American agenda needs to be broader. Some steps can prepare the way for China's transition to a flexible exchange rate. Others lay the foundation for two important economies to advance and share in global prosperity.

ADVERTISEMENT

China is understandably preoccupied by its staggering internal challenges. Nevertheless, its leaders recognise that China's development depends on the international marketplace. The US, in turn, needs to show the American public that China's economic growth creates opportunities and that China will share international responsibilities.

A successful strategy will need to open doors for the US and others to benefit while supporting China's development and encouraging China to help sustain the international economic system to which its growth is linked. Take China's core concern: the creation of a "harmonious society". China's leaders are striving for more balanced development – between the coast and the interior, the cities and countryside, the rich and poor, the environment and growth. China is seeking to boost consumption, in part to lower the high savings rate that fuels the contentious current account surplus.

America can assist these transformations. US businesses can help develop the interior and link these provinces to global sourcing networks. American farm products can lower the cost of food as rural Chinese move to higher value-added products. US retailers can help Chinese consumers get better goods and services at lower prices, just as they do for families at home.

Second, the Chinese have a high savings rate because the old social safety net has disintegrated. Given the one-child policy and rising longevity, China will grow old before it grows wealthy. It would benefit from US private sector involvement in building healthcare and funded pension systems.

Third, China's high rate of investment has masked the fact that investment returns have been declining because capital is allocated inefficiently. China is starting to complement its reform of commercial banks with steps to strengthen insurance and equity markets, develop a bond market and foster asset management and disposition services. Properly pursued, these plans offer business opportunities for US and other foreign companies and create the prerequisites for opening China's capital markets and freeing its currency. That step will enable China's central bank to rely on monetary policy tools to moderate inevitable fluctuations, instead of being tied to exchange rate targets.

Fourth, China and the US share energy and environmental interests. Both need to expand energy supplies to nuclear, clean coal and renewables. Both would benefit from more diverse sources of oil and gas. Both need advances in energy efficiency. Both need to co-ordinate strategic reserves with international partners to cope with shocks. Both need to protect the energy transport choke-points.

Fifth, China wants a "knowledge economy". This creates a mutual interest in protecting intellectual property and preventing counterfeiting. There is a need for educational services, including innovative information technology. China should be encouraged to participate in the development of international technology standards, rather than using local standards to protect against competition.

Sixth, as Chinese businesses "go global", both countries will have an interest in open, fair and transparent investment policies. Chinese companies will be pressed to improve corporate governance, transparency and to rely on private capital. When Chinese companies invest in developing markets, they should abide by standards for sustainable development and good governance.

Finally, China can be a responsible stakeholder in international economic, health, environmental and energy regimes. Since the new head of the World Health Organisation is Chinese, China can set a standard in practices to counter infectious diseases, chronic ailments and pandemics. China could strengthen enforcement against trade in endangered species and join the International Tropical Timber Organization. As a big investor in Sudan, it can press Khartoum to accept United Nations peacekeepers in Darfur. As one of the beneficiaries of the global trading system, China should play a more active role in closing a deal in the WTO's Doha round.

China is sensitive to the history of rising powers. Its own story is different from past examples. China wants its economic rise to complement, not replace, the current order. If the US and China recognise the strategic stakes in guiding this transition, they can develop an agenda that builds confidence and support in both countries and beyond.

US Plans 'Substantial' Aid Pledge For Lebanon Government (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, January 23, 2007

The United States will announce a substantial aid package for Lebanon at a donors conference in Paris this week aimed at bolstering the government of Prime Minister Fuad Siniora, senior US officials said.

The offer, to be unveiled Thursday by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, will come on top of more than 230 million dollars already pledged by Washington to help rebuild Lebanon following the devastating war between Israel and the Islamic militia Hezbollah last July and August.

"It will be substantial," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said of the new US contribution to Siniora's government, which since the war has been locked in a power struggle with Hezbollah and other pro-Syrian parties.

McCormack would not provide details of the US aid proposal.

But another senior official said it would be "an equivalent vigorous effort" in comparison to the 230 million dollars pledged by Washington at a donors conference in Stockholm shortly after a UN-brokered ceasefire that ended the war.

Washington has also begun delivering 39 million dollars in military hardware and other assistance to Lebanon's army, which under the UN plan moved into Hezbollah's stronghold along the Israeli border.

Siniora's government has estimated the 34-day Israeli offensive against Hezbollah left 3.5 billion dollars in damage, including flattened villages in south Lebanon and the destruction of major infrastructure around the country.

Israel attacked after Hezbollah kidnapped two Israeli soldiers in a cross-border raid.

Siniora has since faced a growing challenge from Hezbollah's political arm and allied parties seen as close to Syria, which dominated the country until being forced by popular protests to withdraw its troops in 2005.

The administration of President George W. Bush cites Lebanon alongside Iraq and the Palestinian areas as key battlegrounds in a strategic confrontation between Arab moderates and radical forces backed by Syria and Iran.

The one-day conference in Paris will draw ministers and other top officials from some 30 potential donor countries in a potent show of support for Siniora, the senior official said.

In addition to pledges of aid, the conference is expected to endorse an ambitious five-year economic reform plan drawn up by Siniora in collaboration with international financial institutions, the United States and other governments.

The plan, which includes a sales tax hike and the privatization of Lebanon's electricity and mobile telephone sectors, has drawn sharp criticism from Hezbollah and its allies, who have called a general strike for Tuesday ahead of the Paris meeting.

Hezbollah, a fundamentalist Shiite Muslim party, is seeking to oust Siniora's Western-backed government and replace it with a national unity cabinet in which the pro-Syrian opposition would have a veto.

The senior US official said the Paris meeting's backing for the reform plan, which was under discussion well before the Israel-Hezbollah war, was more important in the long term than specific aid pledges.

"The basic bargain has been that if they were willing to undertake these reforms, we would work with the international community in marshalling support for Lebanon," said the official, who spoke to AFP on condition he not be named.

He acknowledged the reforms were "politically difficult" due to Hezbollah's opposition and because some measures will involve painful economic adjustments.

"So Lebanon will need help as it goes through this, and that's why people are gathering now in Paris," he said.

While insisting the Paris conference was about helping all Lebanese and not just Siniora, the US officials said it would also highlight the failure of Hezbollah and its leader, Hassan Nasrallah, to repair the war damage.

"There are a lot of questions in Lebanon about the mess that (Nasrallah) created," the official said, noting that the war left more than 750,000 displaced persons and devastated whole sectors of the economy.

"Why is it that they have joined -- and get this for ignominy -- Syria, Yemen and Iraq as the only countries in the Arab world which had negative per capita GDP growth rates last year?" he asked.

"These are things for which he and his leadership are responsible and I think there are many Lebanese who ask themselves, 'Did we deserve this?'"

U.S. To Contribute To Lebanon Revival (AP)

By George Gedda

AP, January 23, 2007

The United States will announce a substantial contribution to Lebanon at an international donors' conference this week as part of an effort to rebuild the country and strengthen its western-backed government, State Department officials said.

The total is expected to exceed the $230 million that the United States contributed for reconstruction efforts last year, a senior administration official said Monday. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because details of the proposal have not been announced.

The money, which would have to be approved by Congress, would be a major increase over the $30 million to $40 million that Washington had pledged for aid to Lebanon in recent years. The funds will be announced at a donors' conference in Paris, which Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will attend.

The U.S. contribution is expected to include an effort the U.S. announced last October to rebuild a vital bridge on the Beirut-Damascus highway, which is expected to cost about $20 million. Israeli jets bombed the structure during last summer's 34-day war against Hezbollah, the militant group backed by Syria and Iran.

The donors meeting comes amid efforts to buttress Lebanon's government, which is led by Prime Minister Fuad Saniora. Since Dec. 1, Hezbollah has staged street protests and sit-ins aimed at toppling Saniora's government.

At the State Department on Monday, spokesman Sean McCormack said the donors' conference will demonstrate "the support of the international system for this democratically elected government and also the international system's support for the Lebanese people."

Under Secretary of State Nicholas Burns said in Israel on Sunday that the assistance will be part of a world effort to defend Lebanon "from that axis of countries, Iran and Syria, and organizations like Hezbollah, Palestinian Islamic Jihad and others."

The donor's conference will be chaired by French President Jacques Chirac.

After the meeting in Paris, Rice will travel to Brussels for a NATO meeting that will focus on Afghanistan and the resources needed to restore stability there in the face of continuing insurgent activities, McCormack said.

The meeting also will touch on the issue of NATO countries in Afghanistan that are declining to send troops to regions in the south, where the bulk of the violence is taking place. Canada and Britain are among the countries that have troops in Afghanistan's south.

Activity Picks Up For Mideast Talks (AP)

By Amy Teibel

AP, January 23, 2007

After months of inaction, a flurry of diplomatic activity toward reviving Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking is under way. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is planning a summit with Israeli and Palestinian leaders, top Israeli officials are floating peace initiatives and the moderate Palestinian president says he is ready to discuss the outlines of a final settlement.

But with Hamas militants dominating the Palestinian parliament and Cabinet, and weak leadership on all sides, no one expects a deal any time soon.

The U.S. and Israel are trying to build on the "road map" peace plan by initiating confidence-building steps such as easing financial sanctions on the Palestinians and lifting West Bank roadblocks. They are also holding out the prospect of more wide-ranging concessions to help Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas in his power struggle against Hamas militants.

"We're at the pre-negotiation stage where the emphasis is on confidence-building measures," Miri Eisin, a spokeswoman for Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, said Monday. "But we're not talking about the substance."

The 2003 road map — which outlines a staged plan for creating a Palestinian state alongside Israel — never got off the ground because each side failed to meet its initial obligations. With the Israeli-Palestinian peace process in deep freeze since 2000, and the political rise of Hamas in the Palestinian territories, moderates on each side have found themselves with little choice but to start talking again.

In the past few weeks, the Israeli and Palestinian leaders held their first substantive meeting, and Israel followed up by transferring $100 million in frozen tax revenues to Abbas.

Rice has promised to lead a summit with Abbas and Olmert by mid-February, and is talking about reinvigorating U.S. involvement in Mideast peacemaking.

Meanwhile, the estranged leaders of the two most powerful Palestinian factions, Abbas and Hamas leader Khaled Mashaal, met over the weekend in Syria to try to put together a governing coalition that could negotiate with Israel. Though they did not reach agreement, they said they would continue the dialogue.

Early next month, the so-called quartet of Mideast peace brokers who launched the road map — the U.S., the European Union, Russia and the U.N. — also plan to meet to explore ways to re-energize peacemaking.

Sharp differences have emerged between the Israeli and Palestinian positions, however. The Palestinians oppose an Israeli proposal for a provisional Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, believing Israel could use it to usurp land while the sides negotiate endlessly over so-called final status issues.

It is precisely the big-picture issues — final borders, the status of disputed Jerusalem and the Palestinians' demand to repatriate refugees and their descendants — that have caused past peace talks to collapse.

"We are for negotiations on a final status agreement, even if there are (confidence-building) steps," said Nimr Hammad, a political adviser to Abbas. "But (those steps) must be tied to a final status agreement."

The failure to reach agreement at the Abbas-Mashaal meeting bodes poorly for a resolution that could end months of Palestinian infighting. With Hamas holding so much power, Abbas' room for maneuvering in negotiations with Israel could be severely limited.

If the international community wants to move ahead in a meaningful peace process, "we have to get our act together internally," said Saeb Erekat, the chief Palestinian negotiator.

Israel and the U.S. insist they are not abandoning the road map, but rather attempting to find creative ways to revive it.

DOJ_NMG_0120605

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni and Israeli Defense Minister Amir Peretz have each offered peace plans based on the road map. Livni asked to strengthen Palestinian moderates by painting a clear picture of what a provisional Palestinian state would look like, and Peretz said a final peace deal could be reached within two years.

"Time is running out and we must use it to strengthen the moderates," Peretz said in a speech Monday at a security conference.

Speaking later at the same conference, Livni insisted the international community keep up pressure on Hamas beyond statements of principles.

"Now we are demanding that they enforce their values ... as a way of strengthening the moderates and weakening the extremists," she said.

Egypt has questioned the road map's viability, however, calling for a final deal that would bypass the plan's initial stages.

Another obstacle to getting peace talks moving again is the weakness of the leading players.

A combination of corruption allegations and Israel's summer war with Hezbollah guerrillas in Lebanon have widely discredited Olmert in the eyes of the Israeli public.

Although his international standing is strong, Abbas has not prevailed over Hamas. And President Bush has his hands full with Iraq and a dismal approval rating at home, though achievements on the Israeli-Palestinian front could help burnish the U.S. image in the region.

Skeptics do not see real momentum building.

"No one treats the road map seriously any more," said Yossi Beilin, a dovish Israeli lawmaker who was involved in several rounds of negotiations with the Palestinians.

The re-energized U.S. involvement is intended "to create the impression that the Middle East is on their agenda," Beilin said. "They want to guarantee a pragmatic Arab coalition, and they know the stumbling block is the Arab-Israeli conflict," he said. "And since they can't solve it, they make do with talking about it."

Palestinian Factions Set To Resume Unity Talks (AFP)

By Sakher Abu El Oun

AFP, January 23, 2007

Palestinians were preparing to press on with efforts to form a national unity government after inconclusive talks between Khaled Meshaal, leader of the ruling Hamas movement, and president Mahmud Abbas, head of the rival Fatah party.

A statement from the umbrella group of Palestinian factions Monday said a meeting would take place in Gaza City on Tuesday between representatives of Fatah and Hamas, but gave no further details.

"We hope to achieve an inter-Palestinian understanding through this dialogue, because the Palestinian people and the factions have no alternative," Hamas spokesman Ismail Radwan said.

Speaking for Fatah, Tawfiq Abu Khusa said, "We need a government capable of lifting the blockade, reducing the suffering of our people and getting the Palestinian cause back on the international agenda."

Chief Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erakat, speaking from Damascus, echoed Abu Khusa, while stressing that the new government's political programme would have to be "acceptable to the Palestinians, the Arabs and the international community."

Abbas and Meshaal said after meeting in Damascus on Sunday that their respective factions were committed to further dialogue "within two weeks" to try to resolve remaining differences.

The talks had been touted as key to resolving the long-running feud between Fatah and Hamas, where intermittent violence that boiled over in December left more than 30 people dead.

Fatah and Hamas have tried for months to agree on a unity government in the hope of ending a boycott and aid freeze by the United States and the European Union that crippled the already staggering Palestinian economy.

Washington and the EU consider Hamas to be a terrorist group and suspended direct financial aid to the Palestinians after it took power in March because the Islamists refuse to renounce violence or recognise Israel's right to exist.

"We reiterate that dialogue is the only way to resolve our political differences," Meshaal said at a joint press conference, adding that it was wrong to speak of a "power struggle" within the Palestinian Authority.

"There are still points of divergence but the dialogue will continue in Gaza ... or outside to arrive at the formation of a government of national unity," he said.

A joint statement issued after the meeting stressed that discussions had "made progress."

Both sides condemned the spilling of Palestinian blood and agreed to avoid provocation.

Last month's clashes erupted after Abbas said he would call for early elections as a way of resolving the standoff with Hamas, which vehemently rejected the move as an attempted coup and warned it could set off civil war.

DOJ_NMG_0120606

Russia, one of the four members of the Middle East peace quartet, Monday welcomed the talks in Syria even though they ended inconclusively.

Contacts "will eventually lead to formation of a coalition government" that meets international demands for Hamas to renounce violence and recognise Israel's right to exist, allowing for the lifting of the boycott and aid freeze, foreign ministry spokesman Mikhail Kamynin said in Moscow.

"In those circumstances a real chance appears for positive steps forward in Palestinian-Israeli relations and the resumption of a meaningful negotiations process between Israel and the Palestinian Authority on the basis of the roadmap," Kamynin said.

In Amman, Jordanian government spokesman Nasser Jawdeh too welcomed Sunday's talks.

"If the result of the meeting ... leads to reviving the peace process, a national unity government, and a halt to inter-Palestinian fighting and bloodshed, then all this is positive and Jordan supports it," he said.

Father Of Dead West Bank Girl Seeks Peace With Israelis (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

ANATA, West Bank, Jan. 22 — Even as Bassam Aramin mourns his 10-year-old daughter, killed last week during a clash between stone-throwing Palestinian youths and the Israeli police, he says he wants to talk to Israelis about making peace.

It has been a long journey for Mr. Aramin, 38, a former Palestinian fighter. He spent seven years in Israeli jails, from 1986 to 1993, for weapons possession and for belonging to the Fatah movement, which was banned at the time.

But his views gradually changed, and for the past two years he has been an active member of Combatants for Peace, a group of former Palestinian militants and former Israeli soldiers who have teamed up to urge reconciliation to both sides.

With his Israeli partner, Zohar Shapira, a former member of an elite commando unit, Mr. Aramin has been speaking to students and community groups in Israel and the West Bank.

“Over time I became convinced that we couldn’t solve our problem with weapons and we had to talk to the other side,” said Mr. Aramin, who lives in Anata, on the outskirts of Jerusalem. “I want to keep talking to Israelis so they can understand what happened to my daughter.”

His daughter, Abir, was in an upbeat mood last Tuesday after completing a math exam at the Anata Girls School. She walked out the front gate and crossed the dusty street, where she bought a small gift for her mother, Salwa, who had helped her study.

As Abir emerged from the store, a clash was erupting between stone-throwing Palestinian youths and the Israeli border police. A moment later Abir was hit in the back of the head, a blow that threw her headlong into the street, according to her sister, Areen, 12, who was with her. After three days in Hadassah University Hospital in Jerusalem, Abir died without ever regaining consciousness.

Israel’s separation barrier, a towering concrete wall here, is just a few yards from the adjacent boys’ and girls’ schools, and the area was the scene of frequent confrontations during its construction. But work on the wall was finished several months ago, and the area was calm until the border police began patrolling neighborhoods on the West Bank side of the wall in recent days. Youths threw stones at the Israeli jeeps on several occasions, residents said.

Areen and other Palestinian witnesses say they have no doubt that Abir was hit by Israeli fire. Michael Sfard, a prominent Israeli lawyer representing the Aramin family, said he had received a rubber-coated steel bullet that witnesses said they had found at the scene, which he presented to the Israeli police.

A preliminary report of the autopsy conducted by an Israeli government pathologist and one appointed by the Aramin family found that Abir’s head wounds were consistent with the impact of a rubber-coated bullet, though other possibilities could not be ruled out, Mr. Sfard said.

But the Israeli police say the autopsy did rule out the possibility of a rubber-coated bullet. The police say an investigation has found that police officers fired tear gas but has not confirmed the use of such bullets. A police official, speaking on condition of anonymity because the inquiry is continuing, said the police suspected that Abir might have been hit by a rock that one of the Palestinians had thrown toward the police.

The Aramin family adamantly rejects the police theory and is quick to note the strong support they have received from Israelis, particularly those from Mr. Aramin’s group.

“They were at the hospital with me the entire time,” said Mr. Aramin, who works at the Palestinian National Archives in Ramallah. “I received phone calls from tens of Israelis expressing their sympathy for my family and condemning the killing of my daughter.”

In a conflict so long and bitter, killings more often prompt calls for revenge rather than understanding. Mr. Aramin said his own outlook had changed slowly, over many years.

Like many Palestinian prisoners, he learned to speak Hebrew while in jail and began conversing with prison guards and watching Israeli television. The peace negotiations of the 1990s gave him hope, and despite the chronic fighting of the last several years, his work with Combatants for Peace has helped sustain him, he said.

The group has about 300 members, with about half from each side, according to Avichay Sharon, 25, an Israeli who was one of the founders and who spent time at the hospital alongside Mr. Aramin.

"When I heard what happened I rushed to the hospital," Mr. Sharon said. "All of us took it upon ourselves to do what we could. Bassam knows there are a lot of people who love him and care about him."

The Israeli members of Combatants for Peace have already served their mandatory military service, though they may be called up for reserve duty that can last for several weeks each year. As an infantry soldier, Mr. Sharon fought in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip from 2000 to 2003. He decided he would not do it again as a reservist.

"I wouldn't point to any one incident," said Mr. Sharon, now a student at Hebrew University in philosophy and Jewish studies. "It was an accumulation of events that opened my eyes."

As a reservist he works in logistics and does not expect to be sent into Palestinian areas. But other members of Combatants for Peace have refused such orders, and served jail time as a result.

The group has held dozens of meetings in recent months, but finding an audience remains a challenge.

"I wouldn't say it's simple," Mr. Sharon said. "Many Israelis don't want a dialogue with someone they think is a terrorist. Palestinians don't want to speak to people they see as occupiers."

Israeli members wanted to pay condolences in Anata, where Mr. Aramin lives with his wife and their five surviving children. But the Aramin family advised against it, fearing that angry neighbors might insult a visiting Israeli, or worse.

Mr. Aramin said he would soon be back at work with his Israeli colleagues.

"I want my daughter to be the last victim," he said. "There are partners on the other side who believe what I believe."

Veteran Of Lebanon Campaigns Is Set To Lead Israeli Army (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

JERUSALEM, Jan. 22 — A former infantry officer who commanded Israeli troops against Hezbollah in southern Lebanon for many years was appointed Monday as the Israeli military's new chief of staff.

Gabi Ashkenazi, 52, a former general and currently the director general of the Defense Ministry, was chosen to replace Lt. Gen. Dan Halutz, who resigned last week after heavy criticism of his handling of the war in Lebanon last summer.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Defense Minister Amir Peretz agreed on the appointment at a meeting on Monday evening, the prime minister's office said. The nomination must still be approved by the cabinet and a government committee.

In a country where security is the paramount issue, the army chief is one of the country's most important and closely scrutinized positions. The vast majority of Israelis were disappointed with the inconclusive outcome of the one-month war last year with Hezbollah, the radical Islamic group.

Since then, the Israeli news media have engaged in almost daily speculation over possible shake-ups in the military. Two senior officers resigned before General Halutz announced last week that he also was stepping down.

Mr. Olmert has also faced intense criticism and has seen his poll ratings crash. In addition, Mr. Peretz has come under pressure to resign, but insists that he will not.

The prime minister has appointed a committee to examine how the war was handled. In response to a petition by a private group, Israel's High Court of Justice on Monday ordered Mr. Olmert's government to explain why naming a new chief of staff should not be delayed until the committee presents its report. But the nomination indicated that Mr. Olmert plans to press ahead.

General Ashkenazi began his military service in 1972. Last July, he was appointed the Defense Ministry's director general.

U.S. Looks To Poland For Missile-shield Site (USAT)

USA Today, January 23, 2007

The United States is asking Poland to allow ground-based interceptor missiles on its territory as part of a missile-defense system, the U.S. Embassy in Warsaw said Monday. Polish Defense Minister Radek Sikorski indicated a willingness to discuss the issue with "our most important ally" but said nothing had been decided. Poland joined NATO in 1999.

The prime minister of the Czech Republic — another NATO member that was once part of the Soviet bloc — said Saturday that the United States has asked to base a radar station in his country for the system.

U.S. officials have said the missile shield is not intended as a defense against Russia, but the prospect of sophisticated U.S. radar and interceptor systems in formerly communist Eastern Europe has led to Russian warnings of a new arms race. The system "would create a clear threat for Russia," Col. Gen. Vladimir Popovkin, the chief of Russia's Space Forces, said Monday.

Serbian president backs reform coalition

Serbian President Boris Tadic urged pro-democratic reform parties to put their differences aside and quickly form a coalition government to stave off gains made over the weekend by ultranationalists in parliamentary elections. The formation of a government has taken on added urgency because a United Nations report this week will probably recommend that the southern Serbian province of Kosovo become independent. The Serb Radicals, loyal to the ideas of the late Slobodan Milosevic and opposed to Kosovo's independence, gained seats but fell well shy of a majority. Democratic parties are trying to form a coalition government.

Somali militia leader reportedly gives up

A top leader of the Islamic militia that was driven from power in Somalia surrendered to authorities in neighboring Kenya, the Associated Press reported. Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed of the Council of Islamic Courts was flown to Nairobi, according to a police report seen by the AP. In Somalia, the remnants of the militia are being hunted by Ethiopian troops and forces from Somali's transitional government. The militia, which had gained control of most of the country, was ousted in December. Somalia has not had an effective government since 1991, when warlords overthrew a dictator and then turned on one another.

Clashes in Guinea leave 10 dead

At least 10 civilians were killed and 115 were wounded in Guinea's capital, Conakry, when security forces clashed with protesters seeking the ouster of President Lansana Conte, hospital officials said. Most of the casualties appeared to have been caused by security forces firing on demonstrators, said Ousmane Bah, a physician who treated some of the victims. Protesters are in the second week of a strike aimed at toppling Conte, who seized power in a 1984 coup and has refused to step down despite ill health.

U.S. Plans Missile Bases In Europe (AP)

By Vanessa Gera

AP, January 23, 2007

The United States has entered a decisive phase in a plan to set up missile defense sites in Eastern Europe — a system Washington says is aimed at protecting itself and its allies against potential attacks from the Middle East.

But the prospect of sophisticated U.S. radar and interceptor systems in formerly communist Eastern Europe has led Russian military leaders to warn of a new arms race. The system "would create a clear threat for Russia," Col. Gen. Vladimir Popovkin, the chief of Russia's Space Forces, warned Monday.

The United States told Polish leaders it wants to open formal negotiations on the possibility of locating ground-based interceptor missiles in their country as part of a larger missile defense system, a U.S. Embassy spokesman in Warsaw said Monday.

Poland's Defense Minister Radek Sikorski indicated a willingness to talk with "our most important ally" on the issue, but said nothing had been decided.

The request comes after two years of exploratory talks and after the neighboring Czech Republic's prime minister said Saturday that Washington had asked to base a radar station in his country as another part of the system.

Washington has repeatedly sought to reassure Russia it has nothing to fear from the system — a message Andrew Schilling, a spokesman for the U.S. Embassy in Warsaw, echoed Monday. He told The Associated Press a U.S. missile defense system in Europe would be solely aimed at countering "the evolving Middle Eastern ballistic missile threat."

Some experts single out Iran as the motivator behind the U.S. push to develop the system, meant to act as a protective umbrella over most of continental Europe with sensitive radars able to detect ballistic missiles and interceptors that could shoot them down.

"This is completely driven by the threat from Iran," said Riki Ellison, president of the Missile Defense Advocacy Alliance, a non-governmental group that promotes missile defense in the belief it increases world security.

"As Iranians continue to grow both their nuclear capabilities and their ballistic missile capabilities, this site in central Europe is needed," Ellison argued. "Not only for Europe and the troops that the United States has stationed in Europe ... but also for secondary protection of the United States."

Schilling said the request to Polish officials was first made Friday and a "formal diplomatic note" would follow. The U.S. hopes talks on the plan will begin "in the course of the next several months," he added.

Agreement is not guaranteed. Both the Czech and Polish parliaments would have to first approve the plan. Although their governments expressed their support, they are weak and face broad public opposition to the plan. Many fear it will raise the risk of attacks on their countries.

"The current governments are in favor because both of them are right-of-center and Euro-skeptic and they think that as far as security is concerned, they have to maintain very close ties with the United States," said Jiri Pehe, a Czech political analyst and director of New York University in Prague.

By supporting U.S. missile defense, the two European Union members are showing they do not trust the EU to guarantee their security — and are perhaps even trying to prevent the formation of a unified EU defense policy, Pehe said.

So far, four countries have working missile defense shields, including the U.S., which has interceptor bases in California and Alaska. Russia, Israel and Japan also have systems, while about 15 countries are also working to develop them, Ellison said.

In past months, Russian military leaders have occasionally threatened that an expansion of the U.S. system so close to its borders could provoke a new arms race.

But Pehe, the Czech analyst, said Russian threats should be taken with a grain of salt.

"Russians in the past have threatened to do all kinds of things — for example when NATO was enlarged," Pehe said. "I think they are aware that this particular system, if it's ever built, isn't aimed against them. I would see this more as pressure — and a bit of bluffing."

Global View Of U.S. Worsens, Poll Shows (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 22 — The global view of the United States' role in world affairs deteriorated significantly again last year, according to a poll of more than 26,000 people in 25 countries.

Negative feelings about the war in Iraq were prevalent, and nearly 7 in 10 people polled said the American military presence in the Middle East provoked more violence than it prevented.

In 18 countries polled previously, an average of 29 percent of those surveyed saw the United States as having a mainly positive influence, down from 36 percent last year.

Across all 25 countries, half of those polled said the United States played a mainly negative role in the world, according to the poll, done for the BBC World Service by GlobeScan and the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland.

Disapproval of the way the United States handled the Iraq war was strikingly strong, at 73 percent.

View Of US's Global Role 'worse' (BBC)

BBCNEWS, January 23, 2007

The World Service survey, conducted in 25 nations including the US, found that three in four respondents disapproved of how Washington had dealt with Iraq.

The majority of the 26,381 respondents also disapproved of the way five other foreign policy areas had been handled.

The poll, released ahead of President Bush's State of the Union speech, was conducted between November and January.

Poll findings in more detail

At-a-glance

The number of those who said the US was a positive influence in the world fell in 18 nations polled in previous years.

In those countries, 29% of people said the US had a positive influence, down from 36% last year and 40% two years ago.

Across the 25 countries polled, 49% of respondents said the US played a mainly negative role in the world.

In Kenya, Nigeria, the Philippines and the US most of those polled said they thought America had a positive role.

But among Americans, the number of those who viewed their country's role positively fell to 57% - six percentage points down from last year and 14 percentage points down from two years ago.

Mid-East role

Respondents were also asked about the Bush administration's handling of six areas of foreign policy:

The war in Iraq: an average of 73% of respondents disapproved (57% in the US). Disapproval was strongest in Argentina and France, while people in Nigeria, Kenya and the Philippines were more likely to approve.

Detainees in Guantanamo: 67% disapproved (50% in the US). Backing for America on this issue was highest in Nigeria, where 49% approved.

Israeli-Hezbollah war: Washington's role met with approval from respondents in Nigeria and Philippines, but on average 65% disapproved across the 25 countries (50% in the US).

Iran's nuclear programme: again, support for US actions appeared strongest in Kenya (62%), Nigeria (53%) and the Philippines (52%). But, overall 60% of respondents disapproved (50% in the US).

DOJ_NMG_0120610

Global warming: more than 80% of respondents in Argentina, France and Germany disapproved compared to 56% overall (54% in the US). But the White House had 50% or more support among those polled in Nigeria, Kenya, the Philippines and South Korea.

North Korea's nuclear programme: opposition to US policy was strongest among respondents in Argentina and Brazil. On average across the 25 countries 54% disapproved (43% in the US).

When asked about US military presence in the Middle East, an average of 68% of respondents across the 25 countries answered that it "provokes more conflict than it prevents".

Views On U.S. Drop Sharply In Worldwide Opinion Poll (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, January 23, 2007

LONDON, Jan. 23 -- Global opinion of U.S. foreign policy has sharply deteriorated in the past two years, according to a BBC poll released on the eve of President Bush's annual State of the Union address.

Nearly three-quarters of those polled in 25 countries disapprove of U.S. policies toward Iraq, and more than two-thirds said the U.S. military presence in the Middle East does more harm than good. Nearly half of those polled in Europe, Africa, Asia, South America and the Middle East said the United States is now playing a mainly negative role in the world.

More than 26,000 people were questioned for the survey.

"It's been a horrible slide," said Doug Miller, president of GlobeScan, an international polling company that conducted the BBC survey with the Program on International Policy Attitudes, an affiliate of the University of Maryland. He said views of U.S. policy have steadily declined since the annual poll began two years ago.

In the 18 countries previously polled by the BBC, people who said the United States was having a generally positive influence in the world dropped to 29 percent, from 36 percent last year and 40 percent the year before.

"I thought it had bottomed out a year ago, but it's gotten worse, and we really are at historic lows," said Steven Kull, director of the Program on International Policy Attitudes. Kull attributed much of the problem to a growing perception of "hypocrisy" on the part of the United States in such areas as cooperation with the United Nations and other international bodies, especially involving the use of military force.

"The thing that comes up repeatedly is not just anger about Iraq," Kull said, adding that the BBC poll is consistent with numerous other surveys around the world that have measured attitudes toward the United States. "The common theme is hypocrisy. The reaction tends to be: 'You were a champion of a certain set of rules. Now you are breaking your own rules, so you are being hypocritical.' "

The BBC survey found that a majority of those polled hold negative views on U.S. policies on a wide range of issues. Sixty-seven percent disapproved of U.S. handling of detainees at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. Sixty-five percent disliked the U.S. stance on last summer's military conflict between Israel and the Hezbollah militia in Lebanon, 60 percent opposed U.S. policies on Iran's nuclear program, 56 percent opposed Washington's position on global climate change and 54 percent disapproved of U.S. policies toward North Korea.

"If this keeps up, it's going to be very difficult for the United States to exercise its moral suasion in the world," Miller said.

The survey of 26,381 people was conducted in Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Britain, Chile, China, Egypt, France, Germany, Hungary, India, Indonesia, Italy, Kenya, Lebanon, Mexico, Nigeria, the Philippines, Poland, Portugal, Russia, South Korea, Turkey, the United Arab Emirates and the United States. The polling took place from November to January.

Although Prime Minister Tony Blair has been Bush's chief foreign ally in the Iraq war, British views of U.S. policies were particularly negative. Fifty-seven percent of Britons surveyed said the United States plays a mainly negative role in the world; 33 percent said the U.S. influence was mainly positive, down three percentage points from last year.

Eighty-one percent of Britons opposed U.S. actions in Iraq, while 72 percent said the U.S. military presence in the Middle East provokes more conflict than it prevents. Just 14 percent of Britons said the United States was a "stabilizing force" in the region.

Globally, the most common view in 23 of the 25 countries is that the United States is causing more Middle East conflict than it is preventing; the most common view in only one country, Nigeria, was that U.S. policies were "stabilizing" the region.

Views of U.S. foreign policy are also becoming more negative among U.S. citizens, the poll found. Of the 1,000 Americans surveyed, 57 percent said the United States is having a mainly positive influence in the world. That is down from 63 percent last year and 71 percent two years ago.

Armenian Editor's Death Leads To Conciliation (NYT)

By Susanne Fowler And Sebnem Arsu

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

ISTANBUL, Jan. 22 — The killing of an Armenian-Turkish editor in Istanbul last week and the sorrow it has generated within Turkey are leading to rare conciliatory gestures between Turkey and Armenia, historic enemies, and to calls for changes in laws here defending Turkish identity.

On Monday, Armenian political and spiritual figures accepted an invitation from the Turkish government to attend the funeral of Hrant Dink, the founder of an Armenian-Turkish newspaper, who was killed outside his office on Friday, apparently by a young nationalist fanatic.

The suspect in the slaying, Ogun Samast, 17, was escorted back to the scene of the crime Sunday night by law enforcement authorities.

The head of the Istanbul security forces said that Mr. Samast "was driven to commit the crime by his nationalistic feelings" and had no ties to any group.

Mr. Dink was a staunch defender of free speech and like other intellectuals was prosecuted for insulting "Turkishness" and sentenced to six months in jail, though his term was suspended.

Bulent Arinc, the parliamentary chairman from the ruling Justice and Development Party, said he would back efforts to abolish the measure under which Mr. Dink was prosecuted, known as Article 301.

"It can be discussed to totally abolish or completely revise the Article 301," Mr. Arinc said, adding that members of Parliament "are open to this."

Despite the fact that the Armenian-Turkish border has been sealed since 1993 and diplomatic relations severed, Armenia is sending a deputy foreign minister, Arman Kirakossian, to the funeral, and the archbishop of the Armenian Church of America, Khajag Barsamian, also accepted the government's invitation to the ceremony.

Earlier, the Armenian defense minister, Serzh Sarkisyan, called for improved relations so that Armenia could "establish ties with Turkey with no preconditions," the Turkish news channel NTV reported.

High-level Turkish government officials are expected to attend the funeral.

Turkey and Armenia have long been at odds over Turkey's refusal to use the term "genocide" to describe the deaths of Armenians beginning in 1915. Many scholars and most Western governments say more than a million Armenians were killed in a campaign they describe as genocide. Turkey calls the loss of life a consequence of a war in which both sides suffered casualties, and has suggested that a group of envoys from each country analyze the history. Armenia has expressed a willingness to participate but insists that the border must first be reopened to trade.

But many Armenians living abroad hold a much harder line and are lobbying the United States and European governments to deny Turkey entrance into the European Union until Ankara recognizes the killings as genocide.

Norman Stone, professor of history at Koc University in Istanbul, said Mr. Dink was killed at a time when Turkey was reacting to pressure to respond to the Armenian issue.

"There are a lot of balanced people here who say, 'Look, the genocide issue is unclear, but if you just leave it as a matter of massacres, then we can start making progress,' " Mr. Stone said.

The funeral is shaping up to be far more than a farewell to a popular though controversial figure. The fact that the government is permitting it to take place on a grand scale is another sign of a change.

A wide boulevard in the heart of Istanbul's main commercial district will be closed to traffic as the funeral cortege gathers outside the offices of the newspaper where Mr. Dink was shot.

The mayor of the district, Mustafa Sarigul, said the local government will hand out carnations and release hundreds of pigeons as a symbol of peace. Mr. Dink once said, "I may see myself as frightened as a pigeon, but I know that in this country people do not touch pigeons."

The procession is expected to advance for about a mile before the body is driven across the Golden Horn to the Kumkapi district for a Christian funeral Mass at the Church of the Virgin Mary. Among the Turkish government officials expected to attend the Mass are the interior minister, Abdulkadir Aksu, and the deputy prime minister, Mehmet Ali Sahin. Burial is to follow at the Balikli Armenian Cemetery.

Most Armenian Turks live in Istanbul, the diverse and cosmopolitan center of Turkey. But the antinationalist demonstrations that followed Mr. Dink's killing also surfaced in places as diverse as Izmir, the Aegean coastal city that is Turkey's third largest, and in Sanliurfa and Hatay, which are close to Turkey's eastern border with Syria.

"Public opinion in both countries, weary of the years-long conflict, had reached a point of explosion," said Kaan Soyak, a director of the Turkish-Armenian Business Development Commission, the only bilateral trade council of Turkish and Armenian executives. "That's what lies behind the massive outpouring for Mr. Dink."

Ethnic Armenian Turks, like Jewish and Greek Turks, are an officially recognized minority group and as such are allowed to operate their own schools. Mr. Dink, for example, attended Armenian schools in Istanbul until entering a state-run university.

Mr. Dink was labeled as a target among nationalist groups on their Web sites. Mr. Samast, the suspect, read and was influenced by those postings, according to the Anatolian news agency.

Seven other suspects were also being detained over the weekend, including Yasin Hayal, who served 11 months in jail for the bombing of a McDonald's restaurant in Trabzon in 2004.

Mr. Hayal, a known nationalist, is suspected of having a history of Islamic militant activity. He attempted to join the rebels in Chechnya but was turned away at the border, his former lawyer, Fatih Cakir, said by telephone on Sunday.

Havva Samast, Mr. Samast's mother, knew that her son and Mr. Hayal were friends.

"I couldn't believe my eyes when I saw him on television and had a shock," she said during a televised interview with the Dogan News Agency from her and her son's home city of Trabzon. "He couldn't have done this on his own. I know that he was friends with" Mr. Hayal.

But many here still blame Article 301 for Mr. Dink's death and see it as an obstacle to freedom of speech in Turkey.

Assassination Link Embarrasses City (WT)

By Nicholas Birch

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

TRABZON, Turkey -- Few were surprised in this Black Sea coast city when a local youth confessed over the weekend to the shooting death of Turkish-Armenian journalist Hrant Dink, the latest incident to darken Turkey's international reputation.

"I bet that's the work of a local man" was the instant reaction to news of Mr. Dint's death in the mind of Mehmet Akcelep, a city councilor who has grown used to seeing his hometown in the news for the wrong reasons.

It was here, last February, that a 16-year-old boy fatally shot an Italian priest in the local Catholic church. It was also here, in May 2005, that four students distributing leaflets about prison conditions narrowly escaped death at the hands of a 2,000-strong lynch mob.

Mr. Akcelep did not have to wait long to see his fears justified. Arrested Saturday on an overnight train, 17-year-old high school dropout and amateur soccer player Ogun Samast turned out to be from Pelitli, a suburb of Trabzon.

"I said my prayers and then I shot [Mr. Dink]," Ogun reportedly told interrogators. "I feel no remorse. He said Turkish blood was dirty blood."

Nationalism always has been a fundamental ingredient of Turkish society. As a political movement, it has traditionally been strongest in the towns south of the 13,000-foot-high mountains dividing Trabzon from the bleak Anatolian interior.

Now, Trabzon has become a leading center of militant Turkish nationalism, and locals said the phenomenon could spiral out of control.

"What you have here is a headless monster, a nursery for potential assassins," said Omer Faruk Altuntas, a lawyer and local head of a small left-wing party.

"You may not like its policies, but at least the MHP controls its followers," agreed Mehmet Akcelep, referring to Turkey's biggest extreme nationalist party, the National Movement Party. "But Samast and hundreds of others like him aren't party people; they're free particles."

Locals say the sources of what one Turkish commentator has labeled "banal fascism" in Trabzon are partially economic. Surrounding villages used to be prosperous; then the hazelnut market collapsed and farmers fled to the city in the tens of thousands.

Ogun's district of Pelitli is made up of former villagers forced out of their homes by floods and landslides. Youth unemployment is high and most teenagers while away their time in one of two Internet cafes, or playing soccer.

Those deep-seated grievances have been stoked by the belief that Trabzon has suffered more than its share of casualties in Turkey's 25-year war against Kurdish separatists.

The May 2005 mob attack on four students occurred in an atmosphere of national hysteria triggered by an attempt by two Kurdish teenagers to burn the Turkish flag. Turkey's top general called the flag-burners "so-called citizens."

Critics of developments in Trabzon blame all local authorities, but reserve their harshest words for the press.

"Three or four times, they've pretty much invited people to take out their guns and start shooting," said retired teacher Nuri Topal. The lynch mob formed after local television stations ran news flashes saying the students were separatists.

In most Anatolian towns, few people watch local television or read local newspapers. In Trabzon, both are immensely popular and influential, mainly because of the town's obsessive relationship with soccer.

The only non-Istanbul club ever to win Turkey's soccer league, Trabzonspor is a central part of the city's identity. The club has long been rumored to be close to local mafia groups enriched by Trabzon's key position in Black Sea human-trafficking networks. Many think its influence on local society is negative, too.

DOJ_NMG_0120613

"Trabzonspor and its supporters associations have become a semiofficial channel for nationalist thought," said local human rights activist Gultekin Yucesan.

No Quick Moves On Doha Round Likely (USAT)

By David J. Lynch

USA Today, January 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — Chief U.S. trade negotiator Susan Schwab said Monday there is no prospect of an imminent breakthrough in long-stalled global trade talks.

Schwab leaves Wednesday for the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, where she plans to meet with counterparts from Europe and key developing nations in hopes of reviving the flickering Doha Round negotiations. The talks, named for the Qatari capital where they began in 2001, deadlocked in July and have made scant progress since then.

"We're still not close, I would say, to being able to sit down as trade ministers to talk about closing a Doha Round deal or to talk about a Doha Round breakthrough in substance," Schwab said in an interview with USA TODAY.

The trade chief said ongoing "technical" talks are advancing and could pave the way for an eventual deal. But major disagreements remain about the numerous components of a global accord billed as reducing trade barriers and promoting growth in developing nations. Any eventual deal would require the U.S. to reduce its farm subsidies in return for expanded access to overseas markets.

"We have a ways to go before we can translate the initial progress we are making on the technical front into a meaningful breakthrough. … It's not going to be at Davos," Schwab said.

The Doha Round was launched after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, in hopes of diminishing the economic despair in poorer countries believed to serve as a breeding ground for terrorism.

Now, after more than five years of fitful negotiations, the political calendar is an increasing concern. At the end of June, the president's "fast-track" authority to get congressional approval of trade deals on a straight yes or no vote expires.

The administration plans to seek a fast-track extension, Schwab said. That request is certain to trigger an intense political battle. In 2002, the last time Congress granted the president such powers, the legislation passed the House by just three votes. Achieving a Doha Round breakthrough would make it easier to obtain the extension, she said.

Peter Mandelson, Europe's top trade negotiator, has warned that if Doha Round progress is not made by the end of March, a new global trade deal would have to await the next U.S. president. Schwab rejected that "artificial deadline," but acknowledged that time is running out. "At some point, countries sort of stop paying attention. It stops being a priority. That is the only deadline out there now that we're concerned about," she said.

Still, her toughest bargaining may lie at home with Democrats who control Congress. Key Democrats, backed by the AFL-CIO labor organization, want tougher labor and environmental standards in any new trade deals. Schwab said discussions with the new Capitol Hill powers have only just begun.

European Trade Negotiator Sees Some Hope (NYT)

By Dan Bilefsky And Carter Dougherty

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

BRUSSELS, Jan. 22 — The European Union's chief trade negotiator said Monday that efforts to restart stalled global trade talks were showing new vigor. But he sought to discourage expectations that a breakthrough could come during a meeting of trade ministers this week alongside the Global Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland.

"We are in the endgame, but we are not in a situation where we have the outlines of an agreement," the trade commissioner, Peter Mandelson, said.

Since Mr. Mandelson met with President Bush two weeks ago, the United States and the Europeans have tried to come up with a formula for cutting agricultural subsidies and tariffs, the major sticking point when the talks collapsed in July.

The talks — called "what if" negotiations by the United States trade representative, Susan C. Schwab — are aimed by each side at sounding out what it would take for the other to improve its offer, American and European officials said. If both sides like what they hear in private, they could try to win over other countries, notably India and Brazil.

"We can move, and we will do so, as long as it's not unilateral and as long as it is in proportion to the effort that others are making," Mr. Mandelson said.

The Europeans would like to see the United States improve its offer of limiting farm subsidies at $22.5 billion — something the Bush administration has said is possible with greater openness in Europe's markets.

Roughly two dozen trade ministers are expected at an informal meeting Saturday on the sidelines of the economic forum in Davos, providing an opportunity to widen the scope of the talks.

DOJ_NMG_0120614

That said, all sides have played down the possibility of tangible progress. One major matter in Davos will be how India reacts. India has proposed using exceptions for “sensitive products” to keep high tariffs on some of the most-traded goods, creating a sharp conflict with advanced industrial nations.

Prime Minister Manmohan Singh, an economist, is thought to be amenable to a trade deal. But his political party depends heavily on the votes of India’s vast rural population, limiting his room to maneuver.

European officials said Monday that the bloc had signaled its willingness to make concessions by reducing barriers to foreign farm products an average of 54 percent. This would bring Europe to a level sought by large developing countries, although it would be only a slight improvement over what Mr. Mandelson hinted last year that Europe might offer.

The European offer depends on an American reduction of farm subsidies to $15 billion or less a year, European Union officials said Monday.

American officials, in turn, have said that for a European offer to be politically viable, the European Union had to raise it significantly above last year’s proposal, and above 54 percent.

Outrage Over British Collusion In N. Ireland Killings (AFP)

By Eamonn Mallie

AFP, January 23, 2007

British police colluded with paramilitaries behind at least 10 murders in Northern Ireland in the 1990s, a damning report said, triggering outrage in Dublin and Belfast and remorse in London.

The report about Protestant militants threatens to cloud current efforts to restore self-rule in the long-troubled British-run province, in which Catholic lack of confidence in policing is a key stumbling block.

"Today's ombudsman's report is deeply disturbing," said Irish premier Bertie Ahern. "Its findings are of the utmost gravity. It paints a picture of despicable past behaviour."

"This was a war of terror that was inflicted on Republican and nationalist people for a very long time," said Sinn Fein head Gerry Adams, whose Republican movement meets next week to decide whether to back the current policing system.

The 160-page study by the Police Ombudsman for Northern Ireland also found evidence linking police informants to 10 cases of attempted murder, 10 punishment shootings and 13 punishment attacks by Protestant outlaws.

The report said that, from 1991-2003, one Ulster Volunteer Force (UVF) informer was paid 79,840 pounds (157,640 dollars, 121,710 euros) including a series of "incentive payments" by his police Special Branch handlers.

Police Ombudsman Nuala O'Loan "established a pattern of work by certain officers within Special Branch designed to ensure that (the informant) and his associates were protected from the law," said the report's authors.

"She also identified a series of instances when they took steps to ensure that police informants who had committed crimes were protected from police officers investigating those crimes and from other agencies within the criminal justice system."

The British government admitted the report made "uncomfortable reading."

A spokesman for Prime Minister Tony Blair said the activities by the Royal Ulster Constabulary (RUC) revealed by the report were "deeply disturbing, wrong and never should have happened."

"The serious failings that have been exposed within parts of the RUC Special Branch ... cannot be justified and no-one should attempt to justify them," added Northern Ireland Secretary Peter Hain.

"They should never have happened."

The report was the result of a three-and-a-half-year investigation centred on activities in north Belfast, during which more than 100 serving and retired police officers were interviewed, 24 of them under caution.

As well as the murders, attempted murders and punishment attacks, the report also cited police informant links with a bomb attack in the town of Monaghan, 110 kilometres (70 miles) southwest of Belfast across the border in the Republic of Ireland.

The report also said informants were "babysat" by their minders to prevent them incriminating themselves during police interviews.

Britain and Ireland are battling to persuade both sides in Northern Ireland -- Catholic-backed Republicans who want union with Ireland, and Protestant Loyalists who favour keeping ties with Britain -- to end their differences.

Sinn Fein, the political wing of the Irish Republican Army, is resisting cooperation with the Police Service of Northern Ireland, the successor of the Protestant-dominated RUC.

Under the St Andrews Agreement struck last November, power-sharing in Belfast -- foreseen under the 1998 Good Friday Agreement, but suspended for the last four years -- can resume on March 26.

The British government insists it is still possible to achieve that date, but only so long as Sinn Fein agrees to cooperate fully with police in the British-run province.

Serbia Vote Could Lead To Coalition Of Democrats (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, January 23, 2007

PRISTINA, Kosovo, Jan. 22 — Two leading democratic parties emerged Monday as the groups most likely to form a government in Serbia, despite a first-place showing for a nationalist party in the parliamentary elections on Sunday.

But the prospect of slow negotiations to secure a coalition complicates international efforts to find a solution for the disputed province of Kosovo, which are approaching a turning point.

The nationalist Radical Party took 82 seats in the 250-member Parliament, initial results indicate. A strong performance by the Democratic Party, led by President Boris Tadic, held back the Radicals.

The Democratic Party won 65 seats, according to initial results from the state election committee. Other parties, led by the Serbian Democratic Party — a different group from the Democratic Party — took 47 seats. That positions the two Democratic groups to lead a slightly broader coalition.

It will not be easy, however, because the two main democratic parties have longstanding rivalries, and the prime minister, Vojilsav Kostunica, seems unwilling to negotiate his job away, though his Serbian Democrats came in third.

Western governments are hoping for the installation of a strong negotiating partner in Belgrade as the United Nations prepares to make its proposals for the future of Kosovo, the Serbian province that has been under United Nations control since 1999.

Western diplomats in the region say that a Democratic Party-led coalition would be most able to track down Serbia's remaining war crimes suspects, notably the wartime Bosnian Serb Army commander, Ratko Mladic.

In Brussels on Monday, the European Union pledged to keep its door open to Serbia despite the strong showing by the nationalists. Speaking after a meeting of foreign ministers, Olli Rehn, the European Union's enlargement commissioner, commended the country for conducting a democratic vote.

President Tadic on Monday urged the rapid formation of a new administration, saying he would award the position of prime minister "to the one who has a best chance to gain a majority in the new Parliament."

Mr. Kostunica, the prime minister, who has headed a minority government for three years, said he was "open for talks with other parties." But he implied that Mr. Tadic's party would have to compromise.

The former Finnish president who is the United Nations envoy to the Kosovo negotiations, Martti Ahtisaari, has held back from announcing his proposals for Kosovo's future until the elections were over, in order not to influence them.

A spokesman for Mr. Ahtisaari's office said a version of the document would be presented to diplomats on Friday.

Mr. Ahtisaari's plan is expected to enable Kosovo to seek international recognition, and to transfer supervision of the province from a United Nations mission to a small body led by the European Union.

A 78-day bombing campaign led by NATO forced the Serb-dominated security forces to cede control of Kosovo in 1999, after the forces were accused of committing atrocities against the ethnic Albanians who predominate in Kosovo. In the election on Sunday, Serbs in Kosovo voted, but most Albanians did not.

Diplomats familiar with the negotiating process say that Mr. Ahtisaari's document, which is ultimately subject to Security Council approval, is unlikely to mention independence explicitly. Instead, recognition of Kosovo would be left to individual countries.

But Russia has said it will oppose any resolution that does not have Serbia's support.

In Serbia, a leading contender for the job of prime minister, Bozidar Djelic of the Democratic Party, suggested that Mr. Ahtisaari should not act until the Serbs form a government, because earlier action on the delicate issue of Kosovo could strengthen the nationalists' position. Under Serbian law, the parties have until the end of April to agree on a coalition, or face the possibility of new elections.

One European affairs analyst suggested that some European Union nations might be reluctant to back a settlement that leads to an independent Kosovo. Spain, Slovakia, Romania, Greece and Cypress have all voiced their concerns about such an outcome.

"It could provide more opportunity for disunity to emerge," said the analyst, Judy Batt, a senior researcher at the European Union Institute for Security Studies in Paris, who was in Belgrade to monitor the elections.

Conversely, she said, "The longer Belgrade takes forming a government, the less sympathy they will have among member states."

Russia Limits Foreign Labor To Fight Illegals (WT)

By Michael Mainville

DOJ_NMG_0120616

The Washington Times, January 23, 2007

MOSCOW -- Thousands of migrant workers from the Caucasus, Central Asia and China are leaving Russia as the government institutes tough new measures aimed at cracking down on illegal immigration.

Campaigners against illegal immigration are welcoming the measures, saying low-paid migrants were distorting the job market and taking work from Russian citizens. But critics say the moves are ill-advised because they will drive up retail prices and create a labor shortage that could hurt Russia's booming economy.

About 12 million people, mostly citizens of impoverished ex-Soviet republics who do not require a visa to enter the country, are currently working illegally in Russia, according to analysts.

The new rules set the quota for legal foreign workers at 6 million, while at same time imposing fines of up to $30,000 on companies that employ foreigners illegally. Also, as of this month, only 40 percent of workers in Russia's retail markets are allowed to be foreigners, and none should be by April 1.

Foreign workers have traditionally dominated in Russia's retail markets, with people from Azerbaijan, for example, selling fruits and vegetables, and Chinese selling cheap manufactured goods. Illegal migrants, mostly from Uzbekistan and Tajikistan, are also heavily employed as laborers in the construction industry.

"We aren't wanted anymore, so I guess we'll be going home," said Artak, an Armenian who sells cigarettes and alcohol at a kiosk in central Moscow. "I'll be surprised if they can find a Russian who is willing do this work all day for what they pay me."

With illegal migrants difficult to track, it's not clear exactly how many are leaving Russia. But Russian police have been out in force to enforce the new laws, and signs are that few are taking the risk of staying.

Many stalls at food markets across Moscow are empty as vendors leave the country. Some markets have closed altogether, while others have posted signs looking for vendors with Russian citizenship. Russian television has shown images of empty markets in the Far East, where Chinese stallholders have fled across the border.

A Russian union organizer who works with illegal migrants in the construction industry said companies are throwing thousands of workers off job sites in fear of being prosecuted.

"You used to be able to get off the plane and immediately find work. Now everyone wants to get back on planes to go home," said the organizer, who did not want his name used because he worries that he'll be targeted by authorities.

The new measures appear to be a response to a surge in ethnic nationalism and opposition to immigration that has occasionally erupted in violence. In August, a bomb tore through Moscow's Cherkizovsky market, killing 13 persons, mostly illegal workers from Central Asia.

Racist attacks have grown dramatically, with at least 53 persons killed last year in racially motivated assaults, according to the human rights group Sova.

Last fall, President Vladimir Putin denounced "ethnic gangs" that control Russia's markets and called for regulation to protect "the native Russian population."

Alexander Belov, the head of the influential Movement Against Illegal Immigration, welcomed the new rules as "a step in the right direction." But he said Russia needs to go further and impose full visa requirements on "people from poor countries who take jobs from Russians and give nothing back to our society."

Russia's population is shrinking by 750,000 people a year and has fallen below 142 million due to low birth rates and high mortality rates, especially among working-age men. There are fears the new measures could lead to an economic slowdown if foreign workers cannot be replaced.

"Most of the migrants working in Russia are doing jobs Russian citizens don't want," said Svetlana Gannushkina, the head of the Migration and Law Network, which assists immigrants.

She said the measures are little more than a populist move ahead of elections to the State Duma, Russia's lower house of parliament, later this year. This could backfire, she added, because the crackdown may also drive up costs in retail markets, hurting Russia's poor.

The average Russian earns only about $5,000 a year, and low-income Russians do most of their shopping in retail markets. "This is going to damage not only migrant workers but also all the people who won't be able to afford to pay more for fruits, vegetables and meat," she said.

The government appears to be hedging its bets promising that prices will not rise and that the April 1 deadline for foreigners to be banned from markets could be extended.

"The laws are aimed at regulating the normal functioning of markets and not at reducing the quantity of goods traded," Economic Development Minister German Gref said in televised comments. "If we see any threat, the time limit can be extended by a government decision."

The Mystery Of The Chinese Baby Shortage (NYT)

By Beth Nonte Russell
The New York Times, January 23, 2007
McLean, Va.

ACCORDING to a State Department report released this week, American citizens adopted 6,493 children from China in 2006, a decline of 18 percent from the previous year's total of 7,906. And yet, just over a month ago, this newspaper reported that China had prepared strict new criteria for foreign adoption applications because the country claimed it lacked "available" babies to meet the "spike" in demand.

China has always limited foreign adoptions, and it does not publish reliable statistics on the number of children in its orphanages. So how is one to know whether the decrease in adoptions reflects a lack of supply or a lack of demand?

In the week following the report on the new guidelines, more than one bewildered person said to me, "But I thought there were lots of babies in orphanages in China!" My response was to helplessly reply, "So did I." My understanding of this was based not on conjecture, but on having been to China twice to adopt, having seen orphanages with my own eyes, and on research and other eyewitness accounts. Many hundreds and perhaps thousands of orphanages operate in China, most of them full of girls.

According to a February 2005 report in The Weekend Standard, a Chinese business newspaper, demographers in China found a ratio of 117 boys per 100 girls under the age of 5 in the 2000 census. Thanks to China's one-child policy, put into effect in 1979 in order to curb population growth, and a strong cultural preference for male children, this gender gap could result in as many as 60 million "missing" girls from the population by the end of the decade, enough to alarm even Chinese officials.

And what happened to these girls? According to the International Planned Parenthood Federation (a term that takes on a whole new meaning when referring to China), there are about seven million abortions in China per year, 70 percent of which are estimated to be of females. That adds up to around five million per year, or 50 million by the end of the decade; so where are the other 10 million girls? If even 10 percent end up in orphanages... well, you do the math.

A few months ago, in a conversation with my friend Patrick Mason, executive director of the International Adoption Center at INOVA Fairfax Hospital in Virginia, I confessed a growing fear: that China, the country from which my two daughters were adopted, would sooner or later shut down its international adoption program. Dr. Mason immediately dismissed my concern, saying, "The number of orphans is just too great."

And yet, I continued to wonder whether, as China increasingly asserts itself on the world stage and prepares to host the 2008 Summer Olympics, allowing Westerners to adopt thousands of infants each year would fit the image it wanted to project. I suspect not, and China's new restrictions lead me to believe that national pride is more important than getting these children into loving homes.

The issue of abandoned and institutionalized children remains a taboo subject in China, a problem the government does not even acknowledge exists. The impulse to hide it seems to stem partly from embarrassment and partly from fear of revealing the grave human rights abuses the one-child policy has produced; surely, watching a parade of well-off foreigners cart off thousands of babies would make the Chinese authorities understandably uncomfortable.

But the answer is not to stop the foreigners from adopting; it is to put an end to their reasons for doing so. My fondest hope, and the hope of thousands of parents who have adopted from China, is for all the orphanages there to close because there are no more abandoned children to put in them. This will be accomplished only when China decides that there is no economic or political justification for the magnitude of suffering that has resulted from the one-child policy. The government must openly acknowledge the problem, in part by publishing verifiable information about the status of its orphaned children, and take real steps to correct it. To do so would go a long way toward building the international trust and respect China seems to want so badly.

China has announced the lifting of restrictions for foreign journalists in preparation for the 2008 Olympics. Perhaps this will allow reporters to look for answers to some basic questions: how many children are there in institutions in China? If there is nothing to hide, why do visitors need approval to visit orphanages? Why are only certain orphanages allowed to participate in the international adoption program, and what is going on in the ones that are not?

The Hague Convention on Intercountry Adoption, to which China and 69 other countries are signatories, goes a long way toward ensuring against child abduction and trafficking; but it does not include provisions that would require member countries to report such information as the number of children housed in institutions or the criteria used for selecting "suitable" children for adoption.

The treaty states that "for the full and harmonious development of his or her personality," each child should have the opportunity to grow up in a "family environment, in an atmosphere of happiness, love and understanding." Indeed, it requires that each signatory take "as a matter of priority, appropriate measures to enable the child to remain in the care of his or her family of origin." One could argue that China's one-child policy directly violates the treaty by ensuring that many children will not remain in the care of the family but be relinquished to the care of the state.

Under the new Chinese adoption guidelines, the international adoption celebrity Angelina Jolie could not adopt from China (she's not married, and alas, she and Brad have more than two divorces between them, which is a no-no); nor could the actress Meg Ryan (again, not married). Another person who is not eligible is yours truly. My husband is over 50, so I would have to trade him in, marry again, wait the required five years (another new rule) before beginning the adoption process, and by that time I would be sneaking up on 50 myself.

It is comforting to know that Madonna is still eligible, at least until she turns 50, gets fat (the new regulations call for a body mass index of less than 40), gets divorced or goes broke (anyone with a net worth of under $80,000 is excluded).

The Chinese have asserted that the demand for adoptions far exceeds the number of babies it deems "available," based on criteria that have never been made public. We can only wonder how many babies will be left behind by Beijing's new policies — perhaps spending their lives in institutions because of these arbitrary and artificial limits.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Denies Bond For Rhode Island Terror Suspect. The Providence Journal (1/24, Ziner, 167K) reports, "Mohammed Yousuf Mullawala, a central figure in a national antiterrorism investigation, admitted lying to Rhode Island state police numerous times about his whereabouts and activities since he arrived in this country in 2002, according to a state police affidavit made public yesterday. Federal Immigration Judge Matthew J. D'Angelo cited those alleged lies and Mullawala's 'evasive and far-fetched explanations' in denying bond yesterday for Mullawala, whom he called a danger to the community and 'an extreme flight risk.'" The Journal notes, "Mullawala's behavior at the Nationwide Tractor-Trailer Driving School, in Smithfield, triggered Homeland Security concerns that have since widened into an investigation by an FBI Joint Terrorism Task Force. According to the school's instructor, that behavior included Mullawala's expressed interest in buying software or videos on hazardous materials and his stated interest in only learning how to drive the truck forward — not how to back it up or any other required technical maneuvers."

Al Arian Begins Hunger Strike Over Contempt Ruling. The Tampa Tribune (1/24, Silvestrini) reports, "Sami Al-Arian has begun another hunger strike after being held in contempt for refusing to testify before a grand jury in Virginia, his supporters say. In the meantime, Al-Arian has appealed an order with the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that says his plea agreement in Tampa does not protect him from having to testify in Virginia." The Tribune notes, "During the trial, the government presented evidence that Al-Arian's think tank, World and Islam Studies Enterprise, received funding from the International Institute of Islamic Thought, based in Herndon, Va. … At the time of the plea agreement, his attorneys stressed Al-Arian would not cooperate with the government. In September, the U.S. attorney's office in the Eastern District of Virginia contacted attorneys for Al-Arian seeking his testimony before a grand jury investigating the institute."

House Democrats To Question Gates On Guantanamo Contractors. The Hill (1/24, Tiron) reports "several" House Democrats intend to "grill" Secretary of Defense Robert Gates on "the Pentagon's use of private contractors in interrogations at the military prison in Guantánamo Bay.' Chief Deputy Democratic Whip Jan Schakowsky and 26 other members "wrote to Gates Tuesday asking for a briefing on interrogation practice after the FBI revealed allegations this month of torture by contractors at Guantánamo.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Judge Mulls CSX Challenge To DC Hazmat Rail Ban. The Washington Post (1/24, B3, Cauvin) reports, "The fate of a District law banning rail shipments of hazardous materials was back before a federal judge yesterday, nearly two years after the prohibition was enacted by the D.C. Council." The Post continues, "The law, which was prompted by fears that the Capitol and other landmarks are vulnerable to a terrorist attack on rail lines that skirt downtown, was quickly challenged in 2005 by CSX Transportation Inc., which controls the key freight routes through the District. The law has never taken effect. Yesterday, a judge heard arguments to determine whether it ever will." The Post adds, "U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan set no timetable for a decision in the case, which is being monitored by cities and states throughout the country. … CSX said that the District is overstepping its legal authority and that the law, if allowed to stand, could lead other local governments to pass similar bans, crippling the transportation of hazardous materials nationwide. … Under federal regulations, rail operators bear much of the responsibility for assessing risks and determining how to deal with them -- an arrangement that critics say puts public safety at the mercy of profit-driven businesses." The Post notes, "After gathering evidence and taking preliminary steps for nearly a year, lawyers for the two sides appeared before Sullivan yesterday for nearly two hours -- on one side, Robert Utiger of the D.C. attorney general's office and James R. Wrathall of WilmerHale for the Sierra Club; on the other, Virginia Seitz of Sidley Austin for CSX and Arthur R. Goldberg of the Justice Department."

FBI Arrests Suspect In Los Angeles Subway Mercury Incident. The AP (1/24) reports, "The FBI on Tuesday arrested a man they believe spilled toxic mercury on a subway platform. Armando Bustamante Miranda, 27, was being questioned but it did not appear he was involved in any terrorist activity, FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller said. He was arrested and held for a parole violation unrelated to last month's spill, Eimiller said." However, she added, "We're not going to have anything more until we sort this thing out." The AP notes, "The county is conducting an investigation to determine why transit officials waited eight hours to alert authorities after they were told about the spilled mercury." The Los Angeles Times (1/24, Blankstein, Guccione, 850K) adds that "Miranda was being questioned by FBI agents and Los Angeles County sheriff's investigators," and the Times notes, "Detectives expressed frustration at the difficulty in finding the suspect, at one point creating more than a dozen potential profiles, including a prankster, a screenwriter working on a script, an actor seeking attention, a student working on a project and even a terrorist. Officials repeated Tuesday that they doubt the incident was related to terrorism." Fox News' Fox Report with Shepard Smith (1/23) also briefly reported on the arrest.

Group Attempting To Simplify Rules Concerning SBU Documents. The Washington Post (1/24, A21, Williamson, 690K) reports, "Inside an unmarked, secured office near the White House, intelligence officials, lawyers and police work to close a gaping hole in the nation's counterterrorism system: the failure of people in the government to communicate with one another." In coming days, the group, "known as the 'information-sharing environment' (ISE) program," is set to "send the president its recommendations for taming an explosion of 'sensitive but unclassified' (SBU) documents." ISE program manager Thomas McNamara says the presence of more than 100 "markers" dictating the rules for handling these documents results in "chaos." He said the group would like to reduce that number to "a dozen or fewer, develop one set of handling rules, and make the documents available to all who need them."

Few Difficulties Encountered Under New Travel Security Rules. The Washington Post (1/24, A3, Aizenman, 690K) reports, "Passengers experienced few difficulties yesterday as new border security rules went into effect requiring citizens of the United States, Canada, Mexico, Bermuda and some Caribbean islands to present a passport when entering the United States by air, officials said." The "smooth transition was largely because of the high percentage of travelers who had obtained a passport, said authorities." The Department of Homeland Security said "90 percent of US citizens flying into the country over the last week arrived with passports, compared with 81 percent during the week of Dec. 11."

Pilots Who Carry Guns On Jetliners May Leave Program Over Training. The Washington Post (1/24, D2, Wilber, 690K) reports a program for pilots aboard US jetliners "is showing signs of growing pains," as the pilots "and their labor groups complain about a lack of supervision and the difficulty in finding time to participate in training courses. Worried that pilots' handgun skills may be eroding, federal security officials are launching a refresher training program next month. … 'Using a weapon is a perishable skill, and we want to ensure they have the appropriate training,' said John A. Novak, an assistant director with the air marshal service." The Post continues that pilots said the course "could prompt some to leave the program," adding that participants "are not paid for their time," or "reimbursed for travel, lodging or food expenses."

DHS General Counsel Resigns. The Washington Post's (1/24, A21) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that Homeland Security general counsel, Philip J. Perry, will resign effective Feb. 6, Secretary Michael Chertoff announced "after business hours yesterday," adding that he fully supported Perry's decision "to put his family first." Kamen notes, "That would include wife Elizabeth Cheney, daughter of Vice President Cheney, and their five children, the youngest of whom arrived last summer." Perry is expected to "rejoin the Washington office of his old firm, Latham & Watkins, as a partner in its litigation department."

WPost Says Report On Poor Conditions For Detainees Requires Action From ICE. Under the headline "Locked In Squalor," the Washington Post (1/24, A22, 690K) editorializes that Immigration and Customs Enforcement "has had guidelines on the books governing the treatment of detainees" for years, and the agency is "very good at meeting its standards," according to a spokesman. But "a report released by the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general last week suggests the opposite," having "found violations of basic ICE guidelines in every one" of the five facilities it examined. The Post adds, "In a written response to the report, ICE agreed that it needs to review its inspection regimen. That's a start. The next step should be promulgating the guidelines it professes to have no problem meeting as agency regulations, which would give them the force of law and provide a greater incentive to comply. … If the inspector general's portrait is indicative, the nation is failing a basic standard of human decency."

State Farm Settles With Mississippi Homeowners. NBC Nightly News (1/23, story 9, :30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "State Farm insurance agreed today to settle hundreds of lawsuits by policyholders in Mississippi whose homes were wrecked by Hurricane Katrina. The company will put up $500 million to resolve the suits for refusing to cover damage from Katrina's storm surge nearly 17 months ago now. This settlement will end the Mississippi Attorney General's criminal probe of State Farm's claims practices." The Washington Post (1/24, D3, Kunzelman, 690K) notes, "The settlement comes less than two weeks after a federal jury in Gulfport awarded $2.5 million in punitive damages to a couple who sued State Farm for denying their claim after Katrina.

USA Today (1/24, Chu, 2.27M) reports the "landmark settlement" is "expected to reverberate across the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast." Meanwhile, State Farm "will settle more than 600 individual Mississippi homeowners' Katrina claims for roughly $80 million, according to a person with direct knowledge of the negotiations who didn't want to be named because the settlement is confidential." USA Today adds that the company "is fighting hundreds of other Katrina-related lawsuits along the Gulf Coast, including in Louisiana. Attorneys in those cases said they hoped the Mississippi development would cause State Farm and other insurers to settle quickly."

Calling the settlement "a move that is expected to jump-start rebuilding along the Mississippi Gulf Coast," the New York Times (1/24, Treaster, 1.16M) reports that it would also "remove a major public relations headache" for the insurer. "While State Farm and the other insurers may have had some strong legal arguments, they have been widely perceived as insensitive. In many cases, residents whose houses were reduced to concrete slab foundations received just a few thousand dollars in payments. Some received nothing."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Asks Congress To Give His Iraq Strategy "A Chance." While President Bush devoted much of his State of the Union speech to domestic policy proposals, national media stories focused on his comments about Iraq. A major theme in the coverage is Bush's political "weakness" as he enters the final two years of his presidency. In that context, the speech is being generally portrayed as an attempt to revive a Bush presidency against very tough odds – mainly the unpopularity of his Iraq policies. For example, under the headline "A Bid To Rescue A Presidency," the Los Angeles Times (1/24, Hook, 850K) asks, "Can this presidency be saved? That's the question that loomed Tuesday as…Bush gave his State of the Union speech in the most inhospitable climate he has ever faced for his annual address to Congress." Bush's domestic agenda "was potentially more appealing to Democrats," but "his plans may be too modest to accomplish the broader challenge facing Bush: How to rescue the last quarter of his presidency from irrelevance and patch his tattered legacy." Bush, adds the Times, "is trying to regain his footing when Iraq is littered with carnage."

The Washington Post (1/24, A1, Balz, 690K), in a front-page story titled "The State Of The President: Beleaguered," says Bush "used his State of the Union address last night to try to revive his presidency against what may be the greatest odds any chief executive has faced in a generation. … Bush's problems all stem from the same issue. The public has lost confidence in his Iraq war policy, and, in the face of evidence that Americans are looking for a change in course, the president has chosen with his new plan to deploy additional troops to the conflict -- a direction the public overwhelmingly opposes." But "his response last night was a speech that was very much in keeping with the style of leadership he has demonstrated repeatedly in office. If he was humbler in tone and rhetorically generous to his Democratic opponents in calling for cooperation, he was anything but defensive."

Another Washington Post (1/24, A1, Baker, Abramowitz, 690K) story describes Bush as "politically wounded but rhetorically unbowed," adding he "gave no ground on his decision to dispatch 21,500 more troops to Iraq despite a bipartisan cascade of criticism." Democrats "seemed unimpressed by his latest governing blueprint and signaled that they are in no mood to meet him in the middle."

The Wall Street Journal (1/24, A1, McKinnon, Fialka, Dreazen, 2.04M) says the speech was "weighted heavily to domestic issues," as "the politically weakened" Bush moves to "try to define himself as something other than a lame-duck president, facing a hostile Democrat-led Congress and consumed largely with Iraq." The Chicago Tribune (1/24, Tackett, 617K) titles its report "Bush Turns Domestic, But War Won't Go Away," and reports that "after several years of using war and terror as the defining themes of his State of the Union message, the president who came to office with little inclination toward foreign affairs tried to recast his presidency Tuesday night with a notable emphasis on domestic issues. Indeed, the president was more than 3,100 words into his speech before his first invocation of Iraq." But Bush confronts a "formidable reality. No matter the merits of his plans offered Tuesday night, his presidency almost certainly seems destined to be defined by his stewardship of the war in Iraq."

The Baltimore Sun (1/24, Davis, 257K) reports Bush sought "to revive his waning influence," adding he "offered a conciliatory tone," singling out House Speaker Nancy Pelosi when he said "he had the 'high privilege and distinct honor' of being the first president to begin his annual address with the words 'Madam Speaker.'" Pelosi and Senate Majority Harry Reid "said they welcomed the bipartisan spirit in which Bush spoke but said he 'continues to ignore the will of the country' on Iraq and promised an 'up-or-down' vote on his plan."

The New York Times (1/24, Zernike, 1.16M) also notes Bush's comments about Pelosi, and says "the day was full of such reminders of how power has flowed away from the president in the new Washington. Not just because he spoke before a Democratic-led Congress for the first time in his presidency. Not just because his poll numbers are dismal. Not just because the mayor of the nation's capital had rejected the White House's invitation to sit with the first lady, Laura Bush, in her box and instead came as Ms. Pelosi's guest. Even Republicans, while noting that it was 'the president's day,' as Senator John W. Warner of Virginia described it, yielded him only a share of the spotlight."

The Los Angeles Times (1/24, McManus, Reynolds, 850K) reports Bush "sought to demonstrate that in the final two years of his presidency, he can still command enough popular support to compel both Democrats and Republicans to pay him heed." The Washington Times (1/24, Curl, 88K) says Bush's "domestic goals" last night "were relatively modest," and "focused…on Democrat-friendly issues." The Washington Post (1/24, A14, Weisman, Fletcher, 690K) makes the same point in a story titled "President Strays Into Democrats' Priorities, Themes."

The AP (1/24, Hunt) reports "a politically weakened President Bush implored a skeptical Congress Tuesday night to embrace his unpopular plan to send more US troops to Iraq, saying it represents the best hope in a war America must not lose. 'Give it a chance to work,' he said." Bush "was unyielding on Iraq," and "Democrats -- and even some Republicans -- scoffed at his…policy. Unmoved by Bush's appeal, Democrats said the House and Senate would vote on resolutions of disapproval of the troop buildup." McClatchy (1/24, Hutcheson) also terms Bush a "politically weak president," and like the AP says he was "unyielding on Iraq." On the White House's domestic agenda, McClatchy adds "the war is so divisive that it may overwhelm chances for bipartisan compromise on anything." Democrats reacted to the speech "with skepticism and, on some issues, outright hostility."

USA Today (1/24, Jackson, 2.27M) notes Bush "said failing in Iraq would create 'a nightmare scenario,'" adding his "plan for Iraq, unveiled two weeks ago, has also been criticized by Republicans such as Sen. John Warner of Virginia." But another USA Today (1/24, Page, 2.27M) story notes Robert Dallek, a presidential historian and author of Flawed Giant: Lyndon Johnson and His Times, says he "sees parallels between the situation Bush faces in Iraq and the one that Johnson faced in Vietnam -- including efforts by Johnson and his successor, Richard Nixon, to push the government that the United States was backing to adopt reforms and take charge, freeing US troops to come home. 'The echoes are so powerful,' he says."

Much of the local TV coverage last night after the speech also tended to focus on Bush's comments on Iraq. For example, WCBS-TV New York (1/23, 11:01 pm) said in its broadcast last night, "The Congress may be Democratic for the first time in 12 years and the American public may be skeptical, but President Bush used his annual State of the Union message to strike back at opponents who don't want him to send a new surge of troops to Iraq." KSAZ-TV Phoenix (1/23, 9:33 pm) said, "Despite the applause, the handshakes and ovations it was a tough room that greeted President Bush and his military surge into Iraq was a tough sell." WFTV-TV Orlando (1/23, 11:05 pm) reported Bush "refused to waiver on his decision to beef up the number of troops in Iraq," saying to the American people that "whatever you voted for, you did not vote for failure." That quote was often cited by local TV stations reviewing the President's address.

USA Today (1/24, 2.27M) also puts some of Bush's statements last night "in context." For example, to Bush's remark: "In the coming weeks, I will submit a budget that eliminates the federal deficit within the next five years. I ask you to make the same commitment. Together, we can restrain the spending appetite of the federal government and balance the federal budget," USA Today responds, "Bush inherited a $128 billion budget surplus. Within three years, a recession and the war on terrorism turned it into a $412 billion deficit. Rising tax receipts fueled by record corporate profits have since driven the deficit down to $248 billion. Getting back to balance won't be easy if the president is realistic about the future costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and the impact of extending his tax cuts, which he vows to do."

McClatchy (1/24, Thomma) says that while Bush "tried to go home Tuesday night," to what "he thought he left behind in Texas when he was a Republican governor with a Democratic legislature," the "mythical bipartisan place he tried to reach out to in his State of the Union address Tuesday was never like the one he romanticized in Texas. It's not what he's built in six years in Washington. And today it's as elusive as Oz."

USA Today (1/24, 7A, Gomez, 2.27M) and the Washington Times (1/24, Dinan, 88K), meanwhile, survey the numerous guests from both parties attending the speech last night. Says the Times, "Presidents use their State of the Union speeches to send a message to Congress, " but "lawmakers are increasingly using their guest tickets to send a message right back at him."

Instant Poll Finds 82% Back Bush Agenda, Support For "Surge" Jumps To 52%. The AP (1/24) reports that a "CBS News poll conducted by Knowledge Networks immediately after the speech found that 82 percent of viewers generally approved of the president's proposals while 18 percent disapproved. However, 68 percent of viewers said Mr. Bush will not be able to accomplish his goals, while 32 percent think he will." The AP goes on to say that according to the poll, Bush "rallied some support for his Iraq plan among those who watched the speech." Before the State of the Union, "43 percent of them backed the plan, while 52 percent of them supported it after the speech."

Bush Presentation "Arguably Misleading And Often Flawed." One of the most negative assessments of Bush's speech appears in today's Washington Post (1/24, A13, Kessler, 690K), under the headline "President's Portrayal of 'The Enemy' Often Flawed." The Post takes issue with Bush's "arguably misleading and often flawed description of 'the enemy' that the United States faces overseas, lumping together disparate groups with opposing ideologies to suggest that they have a single-minded focus in attacking the United States. Under Bush's rubric, a country such as Iran -- which enjoys diplomatic representation and billions of dollars in trade with major European countries -- is lumped together with al-Qaeda, the terrorist group responsible for the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. … Similarly, Bush asserted that Shia Hezbollah, which has won seats in the Lebanese government, is a terrorist group 'second only to al-Qaeda in the American lives it has taken.'"

No Consensus In Reviews Of Bush's Performance. Commentators disagreed on their assessment of the President's performance. On the positive side, on CBS (1/23), correspondent Bob Schieffer said "this was a much better speech and a much better argument for his position than he made when he made the speech announcing the troop increase two weeks ago." The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, appearing on Fox News (1/23), thought "it was a good night for the President. I think the foreign policy part of the speech was very strong. I think he is going to win this debate on Iraq." Likewise, GOP strategist Mike Murphy, on CNN, contended the "elephant in the room" was Iraq and the President "did a good job of trying to explain the consequences of immediate failure in Iraq, and thereby make the case for give his plan a chance to work. I think he bought some time, not much. He doesn't have a lot of support, but I think he brought realism into the debate, and asked for a little more time. I think on the Republican side where he's had some erosion, he'll get some time."

But Roll Call's Mort Kondracke, on Fox News (1/23), said it was "clearly not one of" Bush's "great nights. … The White House put out a talking points memo to Republican supporters saying that the President tonight would be 'exuberant and determined.' I think the determined part was right but I didn't see much exuberance from him. … I thought the President's delivery was tepid until he got to his foreign policy section."

On NBC (1/23), Washington Bureau Chief Tim Russert added, "The President had told his advisors he was going to be sober tonight. It was that and more, it was somber. It really did not have the energy or enthusiasm or passion that we have seen" from Bush in the past. NBC correspondent Cambell Brown added, "It was obviously a carefully worded speech to try to ensure, I think, as few awkward moments as possible. There was a lot in there that everyone could applaud for but it definitely felt, from inside the chamber, extremely subdued." NBC correspondent Andrea Mitchell (1/23) also remarked on "the somber quality" to the speech.

The New York Times (1/24, A1, Sanger, Rutenberg, 1.16M) says the speech "was limited in ambition and political punch at home, with no proposals to rival his call two years ago to remake Social Security, no mention of rebuilding New Orleans and no allusions to limiting stem cell research or banning gay marriage. And when it came to his plan to send additional troops to Iraq, he was forced to plead with the Democrats who now control Congress." The Financial Times (1/24, Daniel), meanwhile, calls Bush's defense of his Iraq policies "pessimistic and assertive."

In the Washington Post (1/24, C1, 690K), media critic Tom Shales writes Bush "flirted with eloquence only at the end of his so-so, nuts-and-bolts State of the Union speech last night: 'The state of our union is strong,' he said, 'our cause in the world is right, and tonight that cause goes on.' With a quick 'God bless' he bolted from the podium as members of Congress, almost applauded out by that time, gave him his final ovation of the night. … As seen on all the major and minor networks, the speech was workmanlike and the presentation presentable. Bush seemed determined to keep it low-key."

The Washington Post (1/24, A15, Murray, Kornblut, 690K) also notes "Bush's audience at the Capitol last night included at least 10 Republicans and Democrats who hope to succeed him, and their response to his State of the Union address ranged from enthusiastic to tepid. The most generous was Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a leading contender for the GOP nomination and Bush's chief defender on the Iraq war, including the administration's latest plan to deploy an additional 21,500 troops. 'This strategy ought to be given a chance, because the consequences of failure are immense, and we'll be back again some day,' McCain told ABC News in a post-speech interview. 'This is going to be long and hard and tough.'" Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "was more skeptical, urging Bush to seek a more 'comprehensive approach' to the Iraq crisis. Bush's troop escalation proposal, she said, was 'really more of the same. We've gone down this road before.'"

As is the norm, much of the post-speech commentary fell along partisan lines. One exception was Sen. Barack Obama, appearing on CNN after the speech, who said, "The President recognized that healthcare and energy are two critical issues facing the country, and I think he put forward some serious proposals, not necessarily ones I would have put forward, but they're serious ways to engage the problem. I think the Democrats should be constructive, we should sit down with the president and say 'we are ready and willing to sit down and see if we can make progress on those two critical issues."

House majority leader Steny Hoyer, on Fox News after the speech said he agreed with the president that "none of us voted for failure" in Iraq, but "his escalation is too little too late. That sentiment is shared by the overwhelming number of military personnel that I have talked to from all levels. I think he is going to have a tough time selling this as a change of policy."

Former NYC Mayor Rudy Giuliani, on Fox News (1/23) after the President's address, said he "thought the speech was a very good one and I thought it did what the President had to do, which was to get us kind of beyond Iraq, meaning there are a lot of other things we have to concentrate on. … I think he made seven or eight points on domestic policy, most important one being the health care program, which is, in my way of thinking, innovative and a very, very good way to increase the number of people covered by health insurance."

CBS (1/23) also spoke to Nicole Wallace, who "was until last year communications director for…Bush, and Joe Lockhart, who "was press secretary for President Clinton." Wallace said, "I think one of the most important things he did tonight…was what he addressed directly to the Speaker. I thought his rousing tribute to Speaker Pelosi was very George W. Bush and what people like to see when they remember why they liked him back when he was far more popular. I think he also set a tone throughout the speech. He talked about Iraq in a very frank way. And I think he went a long way toward earning back some of the trust and credibility that they know they need to finish the job in Iraq and to start a conversation on health care, immigration, and some of the other domestic issues that he rolled out today." Lockhart said, "I don't think that it was a bad speech but I think it was a missed opportunity. An unpopular president this late in the presidency really needs events like this to change the political dynamic. This speech was sober, subdued. I think at times timid when it came to policy. So I think it was a real missed opportunity for him. He has not changed the dynamic at all here in Washington."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/24, 1.16M) notes that the "White House spin" ahead of Bush's seventh State of the Union address "was that the president would make a bipartisan call to revive his domestic agenda with 'bold and innovative concepts.' The problem with that was obvious last night -- in six years, Mr. Bush has shown no interest in bipartisanship, and his domestic agenda was set years ago, with huge tax cuts for wealthy Americans and crippling debt for the country." Combined with the mounting cost of the war in Iraq, the Times says that makes "boldness and innovation impossible unless Mr. Bush truly changes course. And he gave no hint of that last night." Instead, the newspaper says he "offered up a tepid menu of ideas that would change little: a health insurance notion that would make only a tiny dent in a huge problem. More promises about cutting oil consumption with barely a word about global warming. And the same lip service about immigration reform on which he has failed to deliver."

The Los Angeles Times (1/24, 850K) editorializes this year's address "felt even more compulsory than usual" as Bush "seemed at times to be going through the motions, reasserting his position or making proposals on a number of issues -- immigration, healthcare, education, the war in Iraq, energy independence -- in an effort to remain relevant in the face of a Democratic Congress and plummeting public support. It's difficult to know how many of his ideas will amount to anything."

In an editorial, USA Today (1/24, 12A, 2.27M) says Bush "acknowledged" the "new reality" of Democratic majorities in both houses "in several ways," but "not on Iraq." Bush "appeared to be wedded Lyndon Johnson-like to a vision that is failing in the field, under bipartisan attack in Congress and opposed overwhelmingly by a public that expresses increasing restlessness in the polls." The newspaper said the President "argued for his new plan but largely with his old ideas."

On its editorial page, the Washington Post (1/24, A22, 690K) says Bush "offered the usual assurances last night about the healthy state of the union, but the state of his presidency has never been worse." The President now "faces a Democratic majority in both chambers of Congress and a public increasingly unhappy about the war in Iraq and disenchanted with his leadership" and "by the time he delivers next year's State of the Union address, the primaries will be underway, and Mr. Bush's relevance will be fading." Therefore, the Post says, "If he is to have a final chance to shape policy, this is it." Bush's goal last night "was not so much to argue anew for the troop increase but to drive home the point that the 'consequences of failure would be grievous and far reaching.' On this, Mr. Bush is assuredly correct."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/24, A12, 2.04M) writes, "You may have noticed that 2006 ended without a recession" and "the big economic story going into this New Year is that growth is accelerating." And "if Bill Clinton were still President, he'd have used last night's State of the Union address to hail all of this as a triumph, taking political credit and claiming it was all due to his policies, with supportive headlines to match. It hardly matters what President Bush said last night; he still won't get any credit."

Webb Says Bush Took Nation To War "Recklessly." The AP (1/24, Kellman) reports, "Democrats blistered President Bush's war policy Tuesday night, challenging him to redeem the nation's credibility -- and his own -- with an immediate shift toward a diplomatic end to the bloody conflict in Iraq. 'The president took us into this war recklessly,' the Democrats' chosen messenger, Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia, said in response to Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday evening. 'We are now, as a nation, held hostage to the predictable -- and predicted -- disarray that has followed.'" Webb, "a Vietnam veteran who was Navy secretary during Republican President Reagan's administration, called for a new direction. 'Not one step back from the war against international terrorism. Not a precipitous withdrawal that ignores the possibility of further chaos,' said Webb. 'But an immediate shift toward strong regionally based diplomacy, a policy that takes our soldiers off the streets of Iraq's cities and a formula that will in short order allow our combat forces to leave Iraq.'"

The Washington Post (1/24, A12, Shear, 690K) notes accused the President of "forcing" the country "to endure 'a mismanaged war for nearly four years.' 'Many, including myself, warned even before the war began that it was unnecessary; that it would take our energy and attention away from the larger war against terrorism; and that invading and occupying Iraq would leave us strategically vulnerable,' Webb said." Webb "held up a picture of his father as a young Air Force captain. As a small boy, he said, he took the picture to bed with him to remind him of his father's sacrifice. Now, Webb's son is serving in Iraq as a Marine infantryman."

McClatchy (1/24, Talev) reports Webb "delivered his harshest blows against the war in Iraq." But "he also jabbed at other openings, saying that now that Democrats control Congress for the first time in Bush's presidency, they'll hold him to deliver on promises to improve public education, health care, the plight of Hurricane Katrina survivors and economic conditions for the working class." USA Today (1/24, Kiely, 2.27M) notes Webb accused Bush of presiding "an imbalanced economy Tuesday in a bluntly worded speech that reflected the new Democratic majority's willingness to flex its muscle in Congress. … The aggressive note struck by Webb in the Democrats' official rebuttal reflected the changed political reality on Capitol Hill."

Webb's performance got generally positive reviews. The New York Times (1/24, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports, "The choice of Mr. Webb was intended to provide a symbol, through his words and appearance, for the new majority in Congress. In a commanding voice, the senator chastised the administration for its economic and foreign policies, but said Democrats would try to work with Mr. Bush to change course."

The New York Times' David Brooks, appearing on PBS (1/23) characterized Webb's speech as "intense," "eloquent," "forceful" and "well executed." However, Brooks noted, "There wasn't a hint of bipartisanship" in Webb's speech.

The Financial Times (1/24, Luce) says Webb "holds the ideal credentials to criticise Mr Bush's 'escalation' of the Iraq war while insulating the party against any charge of being soft on national security."

On CBS (1/23), Katie Couric said "the Democrats picked…Webb for, I think, very obvious reasons. His military credentials are above reproach." CBS correspondent Bob Schieffer added, "Absolutely. He has a son in Iraq. They did not want the President to draw attention away from the war. They want to keep the focus on this war because they believe it is George Bush's war." Webb "really ripped him tonight. saying he led us into this war recklessly. That's pretty tough talk."

On NBC (1/23), Washington bureau chief Tim Russert said Webb "threw down the gauntlet." Webb countered the President's speech "by saying, you brought us there recklessly, now it's time to get us out. If you don't do it, we're going to do it."

NBC (1/23) interviewed Sen. Hillary Clinton, who said Webb "eloquently articulated" the Democratic position. The "escalation proposed by the President is not" a "comprehensive" approach, "we need a full court diplomatic effort. We need to bring pressure and leverage on the Iraqi government to begin to deal with the political problems it has internally and what we have instead is a strategy that, by most accounts, by the experts with whom I've conferred, by public comments by many others, is really more of the same."

NBC (1/23) interviewed GOP Sen. Lindsey Graham, who said, "Here is my comment to Sen. Webb: I appreciate his service, I appreciate his son's service. … Those on the other side, our enemies are listening and see it as a weakening resolve. I would say to Senator Webb and anybody else, if you think this is a lost cause, this is folly, Vietnam, cut off funding. The worst thing anybody can do is pass a resolution declaring the war a loss, no confidence in the commander to fight it and the troop who will follow. So I hope that Republicans and Democrats will not send that message. If you really believe it's a bad idea, cut off funding."

DOJ:

Gonzales Sits Out State Of The Union Address. The AP (1/24) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales stayed away from the Capitol Tuesday night in case of a catastrophic attack or accident as President Bush delivered his sixth State of the Union address." The AP continues, "By long-standing tradition, a member of the president's Cabinet misses the speech to Congress as a precaution against the entire administration's being wiped out and to maintain the presidential line of succession. Last year, Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson did not attend."

Bloomberg Money and Politics (1/23, 9:03 p.m.) broadcasted, "The custom of course course for one member of the cabinet to remain behind just to have continuity of the government. The selection is the Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales, the lone member of the cabinet hanging back at the White House just in case. That's the procedure." CNN Paula Zahn Now (1/23, 8:01 p.m.) broadcasted, "Tonight CNN has learned it will be the Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales, as part of the Eerie Annual Ritual. What a difference a year makes. At this time last year the President stood before the congress and the nation and was talking and touting progress in Iraq, holding out the possibility of troops coming home in short order if that progress continued."

KPSP-TV, Palm Springs, CA (1/23, 11:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "As is customary, one of President Bush's cabinet members did not attend tonight's speech. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez stayed away from Capitol Hill. That is a precaution taken in case a catastrophic event should take place and wipe out the president and all his cabinet members. Should the President and all who follow in the line of succession be killed, the surviving cabinet member would become head of the United States government."

WFIE-TV, Evansville, IN (1/23, 10:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "By tradition, a member of the President's cabinet forgoes attending the State of the Union Address in case of an attack or accident that wiped out the entire administration. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is the one who stayed away tonight."

KWU-TV, Las Vegas, NV (1/23, 10:00 p.m.), KTXA-TV, Dallas, Ft. Worth, TX (1/23, 8:00 p.m.), WAVY-TV, Norfolk, Portsmouth, Newport News, Hampton, VA (1/23, 11:00 p.m.) and KJRH-TV, Tulsa, OK (1/23, 10:00 p.m.) also broadcasted this story.

Editorial Blasts DOJ Over US Attorney Dismissals. The Las Vegas Sun (1/24) editorializes, "Daniel Bogden, the U.S. attorney for Nevada, resigned last week, a victim of a Bush administration housecleaning. At least seven U.S. attorneys, most from the West, have been forced to resign, but no one will say why - not Bogden, not the Justice Department, not Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., who was briefed by the Justice Department." The Sun continues, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee last week that it was simply good management, so he could get the 'very best' people into office. … That strikes us as odd because those fired had done fairly well. Bogden, a well-respected career prosecutor confirmed by the Senate in October 2001, oversaw the successful prosecution of the G-sting political corruption case, as well as prosecutions that put more than 40 members of the violent Rolling 60s Crips gang in federal prison. Others fired include the U.S. attorney in San Francisco, who was leading the probe into steroid use among professional athletes, and the U.S. attorney in San Diego, who oversaw the successful political corruption prosecution of former Republican Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham." The Sun adds, "Democrats wonder if the Bush administration is trying to use a provision in the Patriot Act that lets the president appoint an 'interim' U.S. attorney without Senate approval. Gonzales denies the claim, but we note that one of the fired prosecutors was replaced with 38-year-old Tim Griffin, a former deputy to White House political guru Karl Rove, who would have little chance to survive confirmation in the Democratic-controlled Senate. … The sudden dismissal of these U.S. attorneys smacks of White House meddling. The justice system and the public deserve much better, starting with the truth."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Broadcom Restates Financial Results To Reflect Misdated Option Grants. Bloomberg (1/24, Brennan) reports, "Broadcom Corp., a maker of chips for consumer devices, restated financial results to reflect $2.2 billion in costs for misdated stock-option grants, a problem the company blamed on former Chief Executive Officer Henry Nicholas." Bloomberg continues, "Nicholas 'bears significant responsibility for the lack of adequate controls' in granting options, Irvine, California-based Broadcom said in a regulatory filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. The filing also placed blame on former Chief Financial Officer William Ruehle and former Vice President of Human Resources Nancy Tullos." Bloomberg adds, "Henry Samueli, who co-founded Broadcom with Nicholas and is still chairman and chief technical officer, 'reasonably relied' on outside experts when granting options, the filing said. Broadcom is being investigated by both the SEC and the U.S. Justice Department. … 'It makes sense because Henry Nicholas was very much in charge of the company during his tenure,' Stifel Nicolaus & Co. analyst Cody Acree said about the blame being placed on Nicholas. 'He was iconic in the industry, and he was Broadcom. Henry Samueli has always been more on the engineering side.' … Broadcom restated its financial results for 1998 to 2005 and said the costs were noncash. 'Substantially all' of the extra costs were recorded in the periods before 2004, the company said."

The Wall Street Journal (1/24, C6, Forelle, Bandler) reports, "The company noted 68 instances in which it couldn't find contemporaneous paperwork to document grant-approval meetings, and 18 cases when grant dates were selected after the fact. The restatement is the largest of any company of those forced to admit to errors or malfeasance in the options scandal. Broadcom's figure eclipses the up to $1.7 billion in charges insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc. has said it expects to take. Broadcom's disclosure may draw fresh attention to the role of Mr. Nicholas." The Journal adds, "Broadcom said its evidence indicates Mr. Nicholas, who didn't receive any tainted options himself, was 'at times involved with the selection of grant dates after the fact,' noting he sought advice from William Ruehle, the longtime finance chief who left last year. Broadcom said there is 'substantial evidence' Mr. Ruehle was involved in the backdating. Broadcom said the charges totaled $2.69 billion from 1998 through the first quarter of 2006; after adjusting for taxes and nearly $400 million of options forfeited because of employee terminations, the figure is $2.24 billion, the company said."

New York Pension Fund Leads Suit Over Apple Options. The Washington Post/AP (1/24, D2) reports, "A New York pension system will be the lead plaintiff in a shareholders lawsuit accusing Apple of illegally backdating stock options." The AP continues, "The New York City Employees' Retirement System was named the primary plaintiff in the lawsuit Friday by U.S. District Judge Jeremy D. Fogel, according to Grant & Eisenhofer, the law firm representing the group." The AP adds, "The system, which manages about $89 billion in retirement assets for more than 200,000 municipal employees, owns about 1 million shares of Apple stock. The plaintiffs are seeking class-action status for their case and want damages in connection with what they allege were illegally backdated stock options. … Fogel is also hearing a separate but similar securities case that consolidates a number of civil complaints about Apple's stock-options accounting. Apple has not yet responded to either case." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutors are investigating Apple's past stock-options practices, including a specific stock option award to chief executive Steve Jobs. Federal investigators last week questioned Jobs about the company's backdating practices."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Defense Says White House Made Him The Fall Guy. ABC World News (1/23, story 6, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "A jury, today, heard allegations of infighting at the highest levels of the Bush Administration. There were opening statements at the trial of former White House aide, Scooter Libby." ABC (Thomas) added, "Special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald issued a blistering assault on the Vice President's former chief of staff, calling him a liar who was part of a White House campaign to discredit critics of the war in Iraq. Fitzgerald told a transfixed jury, 'The evidence will show the defendant lied repeatedly' to FBI agents and a grand jury investigating who leaked the identity of Valerie Plame, a one-time covert CIA agent." But Libby's defense attorney "argued the government case is paper thin. He lashed out at the White House, accusing the Bush Administration of making Libby a fall guy to protect presidential adviser Karl Rove, who also had talked to reporters about Wilson's wife."

NBC Nightly News (1/23, story 6, 2:40, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "The prosecution says Libby repeatedly lied, including Libby's claim that NBC's Tim Russert was first to tell him who Valerie Wilson was. Prosecutors say Russert will testify that he did not tell Libby. The suggested motive, Libby was trying to deflect blame from the Vice President over the flawed intelligence." But defense attorney Ted Wells "made a stunning charge. In the frenzy to find out who had leaked Wilson's name, the White House chose to protect top Bush advisor, Karl Rove, saying he didn't do it." Scott McClellan, former White House Press Secretary: "It is totally ridiculous." O'Donnell: "But the President's people did not back up Libby in the same way." Libby's defense "says Cheney intervened and wrote a letter saying it was wrong to protect one staffer, meaning Rove, and sacrifice the guy who stuck his neck in the meat grinder, referring to Libby who was ordered by Cheney to refute negative stories."

The CBS Evening News (1/23, story 6, :30, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Lawyers for Libby, who used to be the top aide to Vice President Cheney, argued top White House officials wanted him to take the blame for the leak of a secret CIA agent's name so they could protect Karl Rove, the President's chief political strategist."

The Los Angeles Times (1/24, Schmitt, 850K) reports Wells "portrayed the former vice presidential aide as a sympathetic figure who was following his boss' orders to rebut an administration critic. But Wells said Libby came to believe that he had lost the support of the administration he had sought to defend." Wells said, "Karl Rove was President Bush's right-hand person in terms of political strategy. Karl Rove was the person most responsible that the Republican Party stayed in office. His fate was important to the Republican Party. He had to be protected." The Times adds the "defense suggestion of a high-level conspiracy, made on the opening day of the trial, was the first indication of a breach within the normally secretive White House over the handling of a case that had cast a legal and political cloud over the Bush administration for three years."

USA Today (1/24, Willing, 2.27M) reports Fitzgerald told "jurors that Libby learned of Plame's CIA job from Cheney, then from two other CIA employees, from a State Department official and from a Cheney spokesman in June or early July 2003, before Libby passed the information to two news reporters. Matt Cooper, formerly of Time magazine, and Judith Miller, formerly of The New York Times, are to testify for the prosecution." Fitzgerald said Libby "played a key role in helping Cheney deflect criticism beginning in July 2003 that he was responsible for 'twisting intelligence' to suggest that Iraq was in the process of acquiring uranium, possibly for a nuclear weapon."

The Washington Times (1/24, Curl, 88K) reports Wells "also sought to portray Mr. Libby, who faces 30 years in prison if convicted on five counts of lying to FBI agents, as incredibly busy, so busy that he forgot when and how he learned the identity of CIA employee Valerie Plame, the wife of a former ambassador who had been critical of the administration's Iraq invasion." But special prosecutor Fitzgerald "said in the government's opening argument that Mr. Libby consciously lied."

The Washington Post (1/24, A1, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) reports on its front page that Libby "was 'put through the meat grinder' by the White House shortly after the Iraq war began, scapegoated to conceal the fact that Karl Rove, the president's top political adviser, helped disclose an undercover CIA officer's identity," according to Wells. Wells and the special counsel "agreed that Vice President Cheney ordered Libby, then his chief of staff, to contact reporters early in the summer of 2003 in an effort to rebut criticism that the administration had selectively used intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq." The "dramatic opening statements in the first hours of the celebrated trial laid bare fissures deep inside the White House." The "two sides' accounts exposed jurors to handwritten notes by Cheney, the internal culture of major newsrooms, a tape recording of Libby speaking to grand jurors and a White House under fire as its justification for war was beginning to unravel."

The New York Times (1/24, Lewis, 1.16M) reports Wells' statement "was the first indication that Mr. Libby, who is facing five felony counts of lying to investigators, would seek to deflect some of the blame onto his former White House colleagues." Wells "did not, however, fully explain the connection between an effort to protect Mr. Rove and the actions that led to Mr. Libby's indictment. It was also the first sign that there had been fighting within the Bush administration over the C.I.A. leak investigation." Wells' "most startling comment was his assertion that Mr. Libby had become enmeshed in legal difficulty because of White House efforts to protect Mr. Rove. If Mr. Libby and his lawyers press their strategy of blaming the White House, it could prove risky, possibly even jeopardizing chances of a presidential pardon for Mr. Libby if he is convicted."

Under the headline "'Scapegoat:' Scooter's Stunning Defense," Newsweek (1/23, Isikoff, 3.12M) reported on its Web site, "Libby, it was widely thought by legal experts, was going to be the good soldier. He would play it safe at his trial in order to preserve his options; mainly, if convicted, to seek a presidential pardon before Bush leaves office. But no sooner did he start his opening statement Tuesday morning than defense lawyer Ted Wells shocked the courtroom and all but tossed the 'pardon strategy' out the window."

The Wall Street Journal (1/24, A4, Perez, 2.04M) reports Libby's attorneys "moved to muddy the prosecution's case by alleging a White House effort to protect Karl Rove and make Mr. Libby the fall guy." The defense strategy "shows that Mr. Libby is willing to part ways with his former colleagues at the White House." As both sides 'laid out their strategies yesterday in federal court, it became clear that Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's attempt to simplify a case that ended up far afield from its beginnings as a CIA leak investigation could be hampered by the defense's strategy to put the case in the context of the sharp-elbowed politics of the White House and the Iraq war."

The AP (1/24, Apuzzo) reports, "As the trial opened with a preview of each side's position, it was clear that the jury will have to sort through conflicting statements in a high-profile case that has opened a very public window on the behind-the-scenes Washington practice of leaking sensitive information to the news media. … Nobody, including Rove, has been charged with the leak. Libby is accused of lying to investigators and obstructing the probe."

The Legal Times (1/24, Schwartz) reports, "Libby, 56, is charged with five felony counts of false statements, obstruction of justice, and perjury in connection with what he told the FBI and a grand jury about conversations he had with three reporters in 2003. He was the only person charged as a result of Fitzgerald's 2 1/2-year investigation into whether classified information about Plame's CIA employment was illegally leaked to the press." The Times adds, "The arguments came on the eve of President George W. Bush's State of the Union address. It was in that speech, four years ago, that the president suggested Iraq had tried to purchase uranium from Africa. The veracity of that claim later served as the basis for attacks by Plame's husband, former Ambassador

Joseph Wilson, on the administration's decision to invade Iraq and allegedly led to a campaign within the White House to discredit Wilson. … Although the trial, expected to last about six weeks, will not answer the question of whether the Bush administration intentionally misled the public about the rationale for invading Iraq, the war hung heavy over Tuesday's arguments."

Wells To Attack Armitage Aide's Credibility. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/24, Apuzzo) reports, "Attorneys for former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby say the testimony of the government's first witness in the CIA leak trial may have been improperly influenced. Marc Grossman, the former No. 3 official at the State Department, took the stand Tuesday and testified that in June 2003 he was the first person to tell Libby that one of the Bush administration's most vocal critics on Iraq was married to a CIA operative." The AP adds, "Grossman's memory is spotty," and defense attorney Theodore Wells "believes his testimony may have been influenced by his former boss at the State Department, Richard Armitage. … As Grossman continued to the cooperate in the probe, defense attorneys say, he went back to Armitage and told him what the FBI was asking and discussed his answers."

Former Black Militants Charged In 1971 Murder Of Police Officer. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/24, Wohlsen) reports, "A Florida man and seven others were arrested Tuesday in the 1971 slaying of a police officer that authorities say was part of a black power group's five-year campaign to kill law enforcement officers in San Francisco and New York. Police said seven of the eight are believed to be former members of the Black Liberation Army, an offshoot of the Black Panther Party." The "shooting death of Sgt. John V. Young, 51, at a San Francisco police station was one in a series of attacks by BLA members on law enforcement officials on both coasts, police said." The AP notes, "The arrests were just the latest attempt in recent years to hold antiwar radicals and black-power militants responsible for crimes committed a generation ago.

The San Francisco Chronicle (1/24, A1, Derbeken, Lagos, 384K) reports, "The actions Tuesday -- carried out in cooperation with local, state and federal officials -- follow by two years a grand jury investigation of the Young killing that resulted in no arrests or indictments. Lawyers for defendants contended that investigators haven't found new evidence since then that justifies bringing charges at this time," and Attorney General Jerry Brown's spokesman, Nathan Barankin, "acknowledged Tuesday that no new scientific evidence had been unearthed in an investigation made difficult by the lack of solid eyewitness testimony tying the defendants to Young's shooting." The Los Angeles Times (1/24, Glionna, Chawkins, 850K) reports from San Francisco, "The racial tensions of the civil rights era marched back into this city" with the arrest of the "eight former radicals — some now husbands, grandfathers and community organizers." The Times notes, "Defense lawyers and justice advocates Tuesday questioned the charges, one calling the long-running case "a perversion of justice."

Newsday (1/24, Lowe) reports, "NYPD detectives coordinating with San Francisco police and the FBI arrested Francisco Torres, 58, at his home" on Tuesday, and the New York Times (1/24, McKinley, 1.16M) notes NYPD Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly "said the arrests dealt a blow to the legacy of the protest group," but "current and former defense lawyers for several of the men said they were skeptical of the charges in the nearly 36-year-old case, saying the police had harassed their clients for years." Torres lawyer Michael Warren said yesterday, "The F.B.I., as well as the San Francisco police, have known his whereabouts for all these years. He has been an integral part of this community." The New York Daily News (1/24, , 729K) adds, "After several failed prosecutions, a special FBI task force began looking into the Young killing again in 1999 after 'advances in forensic science led to the discovery of new evidence,' the San Francisco Police Department said in a statement." Kelly "said Torres has been 'off the radar' for three decades since serving time for a bank robbery."

The New York Sun (1/24, Solomont) also reports on Torres' arrest, and WMBB-TV Panama City, FL (1/23, Foster) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "Today around 8 a.m., a task force comprised of the FBI, San Francisco Police Department, Bay County Sheriff's Office and Panama City Police Department, operated under an arrest warrant and booked Harold Taylor, 58, into the Bay County Jail on murder and conspiracy charges" in Jones' murder. "'Panama City Police Department was contacted by the FBI and San Francisco PD about four years ago and at that time we located Mr. Taylor,' said Panama City Police Chief John Van Etten in a Tuesday's press conference. … Van Etten said Taylor had been living in Panama City since 1981 and had an no remarkable criminal history."

DOJ Has Not Decided On Details Of ISP Data Retention Requests. CNET News (1/24, Broache) reports, "The Bush administration hasn't settled on what data it would like Internet service providers to retain about their subscribers or for how long, a U.S. Department of Justice attorney said Tuesday." CNET continues, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made it clear last fall that he planned to seek national legislation requiring the controversial practice known as data retention, but 'we don't have any position officially about how long records would have to be retained or what records would have to be retained,' said Eric Wenger, a trial attorney with the Justice Department's computer crime unit." CNET adds, "During an event here hosted by the Federal Communications Bar Association, Wenger also said police already have ready access to other legal tools, such as the power to send letters to ISPs requesting 'preservation' of existing data for up to 90 days while law enforcement obtains the necessary court authority to obtain that data. … But he categorized the lack of consistent data retention by ISPs as a 'roadblock' to some investigations. He described, for example, a situation in which an investigator may be able to secure an IP address for a suspected phisher from Microsoft's Hotmail service. By the time the investigator took that IP address to the Internet service provider for more information about the suspect's identity, he may be told by the ISP that such information has already been purged. … 'We've been talking to some of the companies to explain the needs we have for the records,' he said, although he did not expressly urge adoption of new laws. Another possibility is that a data retention requirement could be extended beyond ISPs to search engines, which was discussed in private Justice Department meetings in October."

CREW Calls For Congressional Hearing On FBI Child Predator Probes. The Miami Herald (1/24, Clark, 286K) reports, "A watchdog group that blew the whistle on former Rep. Mark Foley, only to see the FBI decline to investigate, is asking the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, Rep. John Conyers, to hold a hearing on the agency's practice of investigating potential child sex predators. The request by Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), comes a day after an inspector general's report chided the FBI for failing to do more to alert the House about Foley's transgressions." The report "scolded the agency…saying it should have alerted House leadership to the e-mails or 'at least' told CREW that it was not going to investigate." The Herald adds, "CREW is asking Conyers to hold a hearing on the agency's practices 'as soon as possible, in order to help prevent other children from being victimized.'"

FEC Says Kolbe May Pay Foley Probe Legal Bills With Campaign Funds. The AP (1/24) reports former Rep. Jim Kolbe "may use campaign funds for legal expenses racked up while the House ethics committee and the Justice Department were investigating his connection to a scandal involving House pages, the Federal Election Commission wrote in a draft advisory opinion made public Tuesday." The AP adds, "FEC officials wrote that the legal fees count as 'ordinary and necessary expenses' incurred in connection with holding federal office. The commission will consider the case during a meeting Thursday."

Federal Prosecutors Say Idaho Suspect Admitted Three Slayings. The AP (1/24, Miller) reports from Boise, ID, "A man accused of kidnapping two Idaho children, killing one of them, after slaying their family has confessed to the killings of three other children a decade ago in Washington state and California, federal prosecutors said Tuesday." The AP continues, "The prosecutors cited the confessions to the old killings in court papers saying that intended to seek the death penalty against Joseph Edward Duncan III, who was indicted last week on charges involving the two northern Idaho children. … 'The defendant has engaged in a continuing pattern of violence, attempted violence, and threatened violence,' prosecutors said. Duncan 'is likely to commit criminal acts of violence in the future that would constitute a continuing and serious threat to the lives and safety of others.' … Roger Peven, Duncan's attorney, said he had not yet seen the filing and could not immediately comment on it." The AP notes, "Duncan is accused of kidnapping Dylan Groene, 9, and his sister Shasta, then 8, in May 2005, and taking them to the mountains of Montana, where prosecutors say he sexually abused them for weeks before killing Dylan. Duncan was arrested July 2, 2005, when he and Shasta were spotted at a Coeur d'Alene restaurant. The boy's body was found days later at a remote campsite. … The U.S. attorney's office said Duncan confessed that he killed Carmen Cubias, 9, and Sammiejo White, 11, in Washington state in 1996 and Anthony Martinez, 10, in California in 1997. Officials did not specify to whom Duncan made the confession."

Former Washington Teachers Union Chief Has Sentence Reduced. The Washington Times (1/24, Mcelhatton) reports U.S. District Court Judge Richard J. Leon "reduced the prison sentence of former Washington Teachers Union chief Barbara A. Bullock by more than two years, in exchange for her help in convicting former colleagues in a massive embezzlement scam." Bullock "pleaded for leniency" saying, "I am sorry for what I did, and I can't do any more than that." She "had been sentenced to nine years in prison after pleading guilty in 2003 to taking part in a scam that embezzled more than $5 million in teachers' dues." Now "Bullock is likely to be released in about three years." Judge Leon "rejected the defense request to cut Bullock's sentence by an additional two years, saying she reaped more of the rewards in the embezzlement scam compared with any other defendant."

Los Angeles City Council OKs Vote On Anti-Gang Tax. The Los Angeles Times (1/24, McGreevy, Hymon) reports, "Desperate to stem the rise of gang violence in Los Angeles, the City Council agreed Tuesday to draft a ballot measure that would impose a parcel tax to raise $50 million or more annually for intervention and prevention programs. … However, council members said it was unlikely the proposal would go onto the ballot until next year, skipping the municipal election in May." The Times continues, "Also Tuesday, City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo released his plan for reducing gangs, which includes a call for school uniforms to be required for all Los Angeles Unified School District students, legal action to shut down the headquarters of the 10 worst gangs, and expanding his assignment of prosecutors to every police station and to neighborhoods around gang-plagued schools." The Times adds, "Delgadillo also said he would seek to expand the city attorney office's truancy program to numerous of middle schools, obtain stay-away orders for those who do not live in the neighborhoods they terrorize and push for legislation to increase penalties for gang-related crime. … Councilwoman Janice Hahn, who wrote and championed the proposal for a parcel tax to fight gangs, said action was needed because of the 267 gang-related homicides last year and the 14% increase in gang crime citywide. … After a sometimes emotional debate, the council voted 13 to 0 to direct the city attorney to draft language for a ballot measure. Another vote will be necessary to put it to voters."

Mother, Children Found Safe After Indiana Abduction. The Chicago Tribune (1/24, Doyle) reports, "A mother and four children who police said were abducted from their Elkhart, Ind., home on Saturday were found safe in a motel in the same city Tuesday night, officials said." The Tribune continues, "The children's father, Jerry White, is accused of kidnapping them after shooting a man in their home Saturday morning. Police initially thought White might have fled to the Chicago area, where he once lived. … But on Tuesday night, Kimberly Walker, 31, and her children Jaylan, 9; Justin, 8; Kyara, 6; and Kayla, 16 months, were 'doing well' in the Elkhart area, police said. … White, 30, is in custody, police said." The Tribune adds, "White, Walker and the children were found at the Sleepy Hollow motel on Elkhart's north side about 7 p.m., police said. Police declined to say how they found the family in the motel. … An arrest warrant was issued charging White with attempted murder and several counts of confinement. White is the father of all four children, police said. … White, according to court records, allegedly has a history of kidnapping Walker. He pleaded guilty in 2003 to felony domestic battery for attacking Walker while she was leaving work on the South Side, according to court records. The more serious aggravated kidnapping charges were dropped."

Agent Denies FBI Threatened Vigil Defense Witness With Prosecution. The AP (1/24) reports, "A federal judge made no immediate decision Tuesday afternoon on a request for a new trial for former (NM) State Treasurer Robert Vigil. … The hearing will resume Wednesday morning, but the judge also told both sides they should be prepared to go forth with Vigil's scheduled sentencing." The AP notes, "Tuesday's hearing was called after defense attorney Sam Bregman raised concerns about a potential witness. That witness, former Deputy State Treasurer Ann Marie Gallegos, claimed she had been intimidated by the FBI. But FBI agent Marcus McCaskill testified…it was never intimated that Gallegos would be prosecuted if she testified for the defense."

Defense Suffers Setbacks At Coke Formula Theft Trial. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/24, Stanford, 379K) reports, "Defense attorneys in the Coca-Cola trade secrets trial suffered a pair of setbacks Tuesday during a second day of testimony full of fireworks. The federal judge in the case began by admonishing the attorney for former Coke secretary Joya Williams, who is accused of conspiring to sell confidential company documents and product samples to PepsiCo. The judge said attorney Janice Singer attempted to skirt the court's rules to 'attack' a prosecution witness," Edmund Duhaney. "As a result, the judge wouldn't allow Singer to introduce evidence the attorney said was at the 'core' of her case. Then jurors learned that Williams contacted another prosecution witness just days before the start of her trial to suggest how he should testify." The AJC notes, "Singer hammered away at Duhaney's credibility most of the morning. But Duhaney refused to say he was testifying to get a lighter sentence for his part in the crime."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/24, Weber) reports Joya Williams' former boyfriend, Sedrick Wilson testified that Williams "wanted him to lie for her about a package she had sent to another man accused in the case." Wilson said Williams "sent him a text message on Jan. 7, nine days before jury selection began in her trial, saying that it was 'beyond important' that he call her. The subject, Wilson said, was a package she sent via FedEx to Ibrahim Dimson, a co-defendant in the case, during the first half of 2006. Wilson said he was with Williams when the shipment was sent. 'She said, "Make sure you say that it was for the trucking company,"' Wilson recalled of his recent conversation with Williams."

Jurors Hear FBI Surveillance Tapes. WXIA-TV Atlanta (1/23, Shirek, King) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "Secretly-recorded phone calls portray" Williams "as a willing participant" in the conspiracy. Jurors yesterday "heard those taped phone calls, and saw an eyeful." WXIA added, "Williams insists Duhaney is the one who stole all those Coke trade secrets from her, and, on his own, offered them to Pepsi, without her knowledge. But in court Tuesday, with Duhaney on the witness stand, Williams and the jury listened to phone calls the FBI recorded between Duhaney and his confessed partner in crime, Ibrahim Dimson, when agents secretly tapped Dimson's cell phone last year. … In their taped phone calls, the men…portray her as an associate, a willing and active participant, in the scheme."

Indianapolis Police Officer Sentenced To Prison For Mortgage Fraud. The Indianapolis Star (1/19, Evanoff, 268K) reported, "Indianapolis Police Department veteran Michael C. Smith was sentenced Wednesday to 57 months in prison by U.S. District Judge Sarah Evans Barker for his role in a mortgage-fraud scheme. One of the longer prison terms given for mortgage fraud in the city, it follows a probe by a little-known federal task force set up in 2002 to look into Indianapolis' long rash of real estate scams. Smith is the 58th individual convicted of fraud since the federal task force was assembled to look into real estate fraud in Central Indiana, U.S. Attorney Susan Brooks' office reported." The Star noted, "Brooks organized the task force with the FBI, Internal Revenue Service, U.S. Postal Service and U.S. Secret Service, which looks into some white-collar crimes. … 'Indianapolis has more fraud than other cities,' said original task force member Kent Paulin, who retired as an FBI agent in 2004. 'It's almost like a networking thing.'" The AP (1/19) also reported on Smith's sentence.

Kulongoski Calls For Policy Review In Light Of Federal Kickback Probe. The Oregonian (1/24, Walsh, Green, 318K) reports, "Gov. Ted Kulongoski on Tuesday called for an internal review of state procurement policies in the wake of a federal probe into allegations that a food service administrator for the prison system took bribes from companies in return for buying their food." Kulongoski spokeswoman Anna Richter Taylor said, "Once the (federal) investigation is complete, we will be re-evaluating whether or not the procurement and management policies that we have in place are sufficient and identify what changes need to be made to strengthen oversight." The Oregonian notes, "Farhad 'Fred' Monem was placed on leave after IRS and FBI agents searched his Salem home and office earlier this month. A federal judge has unsealed court documents that describe a four-year kickback scheme that alleges Monem took hundreds of thousands of dollars from companies that sell food to the state for inmate meals."

The AP (1/24, McCall) adds that "Kulongoski said Tuesday a federal investigation into alleged kickbacks to the state prison food service administrator totaling at least $650,000 may lead to tougher oversight of the purchasing program. … No charges have been filed against Monem or others accused of involvement." The AP also notes that the FBI and IRS were conducting the investigation.

US Will Not Charge New York Post Contributor. The New York Times (1/24, Barron) reports, "Federal prosecutors have decided not to file charges against a former freelance contributor to The New York Post's Page Six gossip column after an investigation into whether he had demanded payments for favorable coverage, a lawyer for the contributor said yesterday." The Times continues, "The contributor, Jared Paul Stern, was suspended last April after The Post reported that the California supermarket billionaire Ronald W. Burkle had complained to the authorities. … At the time, people involved in the investigation said that Mr. Burkle had secretly videotaped Mr. Stern demanding a $100,000 payment and a $10,000 monthly stipend. Mr. Stern was heard saying that in return, he would keep unfavorable mentions of Mr. Burkle out of Page Six." The Times adds, "Yesterday, a person with knowledge of the decision confirmed that federal prosecutors in Manhattan had decided not to prosecute Mr. Stern. The decision was reported on The New York Observer's Web site yesterday afternoon. … A spokeswoman for the United States attorney's office in Manhattan declined to comment. But Mr. Stern's lawyer, Joseph Tacopina, said he had been told of the decision. … 'We've always been confident that there was no evidence of any crime,' Mr. Tacopina said."

Attorneys Question Massachusetts Police Lab's DNA Results. The Boston Globe (1/24, Saltzman) reports, "Showing the widening fallout from the mishandling of DNA test results at the State Police lab, the lawyers in three high-profile murder cases challenged the reliability of such test results and suggested the problems could help their clients." The Globe continues, "A lawyer for Neil Entwistle, whose DNA was allegedly found on the gun used to kill his wife and infant daughter, said the suspension of Robert E. Pino, the civilian administrator of the DNA database at the State Police forensic laboratory, "calls into question the reliability, trustworthiness, and integrity" of the lab and should be investigated by an independent forensic scientist." The Globe adds, "The FBI began an audit of the laboratory last week because Pino allegedly failed to report 11 matches in old unsolved rape cases until the statute of limitations had expired and reported four test results incorrectly. … But Entwistle's lawyer, Elliot M. Weinstein, said in an interview that the bureau has had its own deficiencies with DNA analysis in recent years and lacks credibility." The Globe notes, "Weinstein, who unsuccessfully asked a judge last fall to toss out DNA evidence against Entwistle, declined to say whether he intends to submit a new motion on the basis of Pino's suspension. But his comments indicate that defense lawyers will probably cite the lab's problems as reasons that judges should block DNA results from being introduced as evidence, that juries should discount such evidence, or that convictions should be overturned. … Also yesterday, lawyer Robert A. George said he expects that Pino's actions will form the basis of challenges in two other high-profile murder cases: Christopher M. McCowen's conviction in November of the murder of Christa Worthington, and Edward S. O'Brien's 1997 conviction in the slaying of his best friend's mother. George represented both defendants."

House Republicans Seek Berger Polygraph. The Washington Times (1/24, Seper) reports, "Eighteen House Republicans have urged the Justice Department to proceed with a polygraph test for Samuel R. Berger, the former national security adviser who agreed to take the test as part of a plea of guilty of stealing documents from the National Archives. … 'This may be the only way for anyone to know whether Mr. Berger denied the 9/11 commission and the public the complete account of the Clinton administration's actions or inactions during the lead-up to the terrorist attacks on the United States,' the congressmen said in their letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales." The Times adds, "The congressmen -- led by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III of Virginia -- said a prompt lie-detector test is needed to determine the extent of Mr. Berger's thievery, especially because the former Clinton administration adviser reviewed original documents for which there were no copies or inventory. … Other signers of the letter are Reps. Duncan Hunter, Darrell Issa and Brian Bilbray of California, John L. Mica of Florida, F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. of Wisconsin, Dan Burton and Mark Souder of Indiana, Christopher Shays of Connecticut, John M. McHugh of New York, Chris Cannon of Utah, John J. 'Jimmy' Duncan Jr. of Tennessee, Michael R. Turner of Ohio, Kenny Marchant of Texas, Lynn Westmoreland of Georgia, Patrick T. McHenry and Virginia Foxx of North Carolina and Bill Sali of Idaho. …Mr. Davis, former chairman and now ranking Republican on the House Government Reform Committee, released a report by his staff on Jan. 9, saying a Justice Department investigation of Mr. Berger's admitted document theft was 'remarkably incurious.' … The report said the theft compromised national security 'much more than originally disclosed' and resulted in 'incomplete and misleading' information to the September 11 commission. It said Mr. Berger was willing to go to 'extraordinary lengths to compromise national security, apparently for his own convenience.'"

State, Local Officials Take Action To Curb Cyber-Bullying. The Wall Street Journal (1/24, D1, Chaker) reports on "a growing problem for school administrators and local officials: how to handle so-called cyberbullying. As long as there have been kids, there have been bullies. Now, emboldened by the anonymity available online, a bully can be nastier -- and with the click of a mouse, have a far broader audience -- than in the past. What may once have been snickers in the hallway can now be an excruciatingly public humiliation spread via email, text messaging and online teen forums." The Journal continues, "Schools and local officials have been hearing increasing calls from parents to step in. But educators are torn between the desire to stop bad behavior and the limits on their ability to intervene. Much of the badmouthing takes place on home computers and off school grounds, where schools have little or no authority. … Now, school officials, states and even Web sites are taking action. Educators and state legislatures in Florida, South Carolina, Utah, Oregon and elsewhere are creating new policies that deal with cyberbullying, either incorporating electronic harassment into existing bullying policies, or spelling it out as an entirely new threat. In doing so, they are often crafting language that allows educators to intervene even in off-campus incidents if the activity affects the school environment." The Journal notes, "MySpace.com, the popular networking site, last fall released a guide for school administrators, advising them to contact the site about false or offensive user profiles or to report threats or cyberbullying. It also created a hotline and email address for the exclusive use of school officials to contact MySpace. … The challenge is that students, like everyone else, have First Amendment rights that school officials can't cross. In 1969, the Supreme Court ruled that to suppress student speech on campus, a public school must show it aims to prevent 'substantial disruption' in the classroom rather than 'a mere desire to avoid the discomfort and unpleasantness that always accompany an unpopular viewpoint.' … Later this year, the justices will consider whether public school officials can suppress student speech off campus, in a case where a Juneau, Alaska, high-school principal suspended a student for unfurling a banner reading 'Bong Hits 4 Jesus' on a sidewalk where students had gathered. The case could have implications for other forms of off-campus speech, such as online postings."

Attorneys Attend "Bankruptcy Boot Camps" To Prepare For Battle. The Wall Street Journal (1/24, B6D, Doss) reports, "Creditors beware: O. Max Gardner III is planning to train an army of consumer bankruptcy attorneys at his Bankruptcy Boot Camps this year." The Journal continues, "His mission isn't to beef up attorneys' muscles with a regimen of sit-ups or push-ups. Rather, Mr. Gardner's goal is to teach them the fine art of overcoming the hurdles put in place by bankruptcy legislation that creditors helped to pass in 2005. … Mr. Gardner, who started the boot camps last August, believes the new law is punitive toward debtor attorneys and makes it harder for consumers to file for bankruptcy-court protection." The Journal adds, "The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act, which took effect in October 2005, ushered in sweeping changes to the federal bankruptcy code that affected both consumers and businesses in financial trouble. … Critics contend that the new law made it harder for consumers to file for bankruptcy protection and that it was essentially drafted by lobbyists for banks and credit-card companies. … Some judges have expressed that view, too. In a court opinion last year, Judge Frank R. Monroe of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Austin, Texas, said that 'the parties pushing the passage of the Act' appeared to have 'an agenda to make more money off the backs of the consumers in this country.' … Mr. Gardner, who has been a consumer-bankruptcy attorney for nearly three decades, said he plans to help boot-camp attendees fight back by putting them through a four-day seminar to 'de-program' and 're-engineer' their practices. … Consumer-bankruptcy attorneys tend to focus on filing a bankruptcy petition for their clients and getting their debts discharged, he said."

DOJ Clears Louisiana Party Primary System. The Baton Rouge (LA) Advocate (1/24, Schuler) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has cleared the way for Louisiana to return to a party primary system for congressional elections starting in 2008." The Advocate continues, "Justice Department Voting Rights Chief John Tanner's office advised state officials of the sign-off on legislation the Legislature approved in June. … The state Attorney General's Office released the letter Tuesday." The Advocate adds, "Sen. Cleo Fields, D-Baton Rouge, pushed the law to end the practice of Louisiana electing its congressmen after other states across the nation. … 'The issue should be squarely behind us and we can elect members of Congress at the same time as everybody else does,' Fields said Tuesday. … Under the plan, Democrats and Republicans would hold party primary elections with winners facing each other in a general election along with nonparty candidates who want to make the race." The Advocate notes, "The election schedule would allow winners of the party primaries and other party candidates to face each other on federal Election Day — the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November. … That's a move away from the open primary system, where all candidates regardless of party have vied against one another on the November ballot. … If nobody won outright, the two top vote-getters would face off in a December election. .. .U.S. District Judge Frank Polozola set the schedule in 1998 to prevent Louisiana from electing its U.S. senators and representatives before Election Day."

Courts Give Mixed Reviews To Voter ID Laws. USA Today (1/24, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports voter identification laws, "adopted by states in recent years amid concerns about fraud, are getting mixed reviews as courts weigh whether they unconstitutionally keep some people from the polls." State courts in Georgia and Missouri "last fall invalidated laws that required voters to show photo ID each time they cast ballots. Georgia and Missouri are among 11 states that have passed such laws since 2003, inspired partly by allegations of voter fraud raised in Florida and elsewhere during the 2000 elections." Elsewhere, however, "federal appeals courts have not been as willing to reject voter ID laws."

Media Outlets Embroiled In Debate Over Free-Speech Rights. USA Today (1/24, 2A, Kasindorf) reports, "In a dispute between the 'new media' of the Internet and the 'old media' of broadcasting, liberal bloggers and conservative talk-radio hosts are accusing each other of trampling the First Amendment's guarantees of free speech." USA continues, "Hundreds of blogs are exhorting national advertisers not to buy commercial time on Disney-owned KSFO-AM in San Francisco because some on-air hosts have made comments that the bloggers allege are racist or encourage violence. … KSFO personalities say the bloggers are trying to muzzle their political views. The bloggers say they're rallying behind the free-speech rights of a colleague whose website was briefly shut down after Disney's ABC network threatened to sue over alleged copyright violations." USA adds, "Some advertisers, including Bank of America and MasterCard, have deserted KSFO since an anonymous media critic identifying himself online as Spocko began posting recordings of the station's 'Hot Talk' hosts. Spocko and some of his readers have been e-mailing the audio to KSFO advertisers since 2005, asking the companies whether they want to be associated with the controversial rhetoric. … The First Amendment flap was debated Sunday on CNN's Reliable Sources. Dan Riehl, a blogger critical of Spocko, said some of the radio hosts' comments 'were blown out of proportion or misrepresented' in the complaints to sponsors. Mike Stark, another blogger and a Spocko ally, said: 'The way to fight free speech that you disagree with is to engage in more free speech. And that's exactly what Spocko did.'"

Antitrust Issues Loom Large In Proposed Delta Merger. The Financial Times (1/24, Cameron) reports, "Antitrust concerns have re-emerged as the key barrier in US Airways' hostile pursuit of Delta Air Lines, according to aviation financiers surveyed by the Financial Times." The Times continues, "The airlines' chief executives will face off on Wednesday before a Senate hearing on airline consolidation, which both sides view as a key test of political sentiment for deals involving the largest US carriers." The Times adds, "Doug Parker, US Airways' chairman and chief executive, is adamant that a deal which would create the world's largest airline would be cleared by the Justice department. .. He is expected to provide assurances to the Senate commerce, science and transportation committee that the merger with its larger rival would not lead to higher fares or reduced service to smaller communities." The Times notes, "Jerry Grinstein, his opposite number at Delta, argues the airlines' overlap on the US east coast would see it blocked on competition grounds, though has entertained discussions with Northwest about a potential combination when both emerge from bankruptcy protection. .. Delta is reviewing final bids from banks to provide exit financing for its planned exit from bankruptcy as a standalone carrier, which could include private equity investment."

Georgia Legislators Ask Gonzales To Investigate Delta Bid. WSB-TV, Atlanta, GA (1/23, 6:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "Several Georgia lawmakers signed a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez urging him to review the situation. They support Delta's stand-alone plan for getting out of bankruptcy. However, they say it will negativively impact jobs and our state's economy."

WCIV-TV, Charleston, SC (1/23, 6:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "Georgia lawmakers are rallying around Delta airlines in opposition to the hostile takeover by USAirways. The newest chapter in Delta's public voiced opposition to the merger is a letter from Georgia lawmakers to US Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez USAirways recently bolstered its takeover bid from $8.4 billion to $10.3 billion. The legislators say Georgia could lose thousands of jobs if the hostile takeover succeeds."

WCJB-TV, Gainesville, VA (1/23, 12:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "The newest chapter in delta's public opposition to the merger is a letter from Georgia lawmakers to US Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez. It states the merger would be bad for Georgia and for the nation. The legislators want a quote 'full land careful review' of the takeover attempt."

KSTU-TV, Salt Lake City, UT (1/23, 11:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "Georgia lawmakers are sending a request to US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales calling for a complete review of the US Airways hostile take-over bid of Delta airlines."

Bank Of America Halts Effort To Change Law Limiting Growth. The New York Times (1/24, Dash) reports, "Bank of America's chairman and chief executive, Kenneth D. Lewis, said yesterday that the company was backing away from a quiet lobbying effort to change a federal law that could prevent it from making major acquisitions." The Times continues, "Just weeks after agreeing to initiate discussions with lawmakers to raise the possibility of lifting the 10 percent federal deposit cap, Kenneth D. Lewis said that he had told bank representatives to 'back off' from those plans. … 'I thought we had gotten out there a little too far in terms of our level of aggressiveness, and it sent the wrong signals,' Mr. Lewis said in an interview yesterday. About two weeks ago, he made the decision to halt the political effort, he said." The Times adds, "Bank of America, which has about $693.5 billion, or just over 9 percent of the nation's deposits, had argued in a position paper that the law restricting a bank to no more than 10 percent of the nation's deposits is 'antiquated, conceptually flawed' and anticompetitive." The Times notes, "While American banks are prevented from increasing their deposit base through acquisitions that might push them over the federal threshold, foreign banks face no similar restrictions. The bank also argues that the law is unnecessary because of antitrust laws, state regulations and market forces. … But as the only bank near the 10 percent limit, Bank of America has found itself with virtually no allies. JPMorgan Chase, the next largest deposit holder, could acquire all but the five biggest banks and still remain under the federal cap. Wachovia, Wells Fargo and Citigroup, the next banks in line, have potentially even more room and time. … Smaller community banks, meanwhile, have vowed to fight any move to lift the cap."

Stolt-Nielsen Sues DOJ For Access To Antitrust Amnesty Agreements. Corporate Counsel (1/24, Reisinger) reports, "The Stolt-Nielsen Transportation Group wants to know why it's been singled out for special treatment by the government. The Norwegian shipping giant has sued the U.S. Department of Justice under the Freedom of Information Act, demanding that antitrust officials release scores of confidential deals that they've reached with other companies. Of the roughly 100 businesses that have signed amnesty agreements with Justice's antitrust division, Stolt-Nielsen is the only one to have subsequently been indicted." CC continues, "Why does Stolt-Nielsen want to pore through these deals? For one thing, it wants to know whether any of these other agreements specified a date by which companies had to cease their alleged wrongdoing. Antitrust officials indicted Stolt-Nielsen's U.S. subsidiary in September, claiming that it continued to engage in price-fixing even after it said it had stopped. Stolt-Nielsen responds that the subsidiary halted the misconduct by the time that it signed its amnesty agreement in January 2003 and that the deal didn't set a deadline for when it had to clean up its act." CC adds, 'Stolt-Nielsen's attorneys declined to comment for this story, but lawyers close to the case say that the company hopes to compare the text of its deal with those that the antitrust division struck with other businesses, as well as with the division's model amnesty agreement. These attorneys say that Stolt-Nielsen wants to show that other agreements usually included a date by which illegal conduct had to be halted. … Justice spokeswoman Gina Talamona says that the antitrust division considers amnesty applicants to be 'confidential sources,' and will disclose their agreements 'only if required to do so by a court in connection with litigation.'"

Judge Dismisses Suit Over Online Phone Service. The AP (1/24, Veiga) reports, "A federal judge has thrown out an antitrust lawsuit filed by the distributor of Morpheus file-sharing software against Internet phone service provider Skype Technologies SA, eBay Inc. and other defendants." The AP continues, "StreamCast Networks Inc. had sought more than $4.1 billion in unspecified damages and a court order blocking eBay from selling Skype services. StreamCast claimed the founders of Skype broke an agreement to give StreamCast the right of first refusal for the technology behind Skype's Voice over Internet Protocol, or VoIP, service." The AP adds, "In her ruling Thursday on a motion for dismissal, U.S. District Court Judge Florence-Marie Cooper concluded that StreamCast failed to make its case for relief under federal antitrust laws and dismissed all claims against Skype, eBay and more than a dozen other defendants. … Cooper declined to exercise discretionary jurisdiction to consider state law claims such as unfair competition and fraudulent transfer."

German Truck Maker Withdraws Bid For Scania. The Financial Times (1/24, Milne, Ibison) reports, "German truckmaker MAN on Tuesday withdrew its €10.3bn hostile bid for Scania, handing Sweden's powerful Wallenberg family victory in one of Europe's bitterest recent takeover battles." The Times continues, All parties to the bid saga said they now hoped to conduct friendly discussions to see if a tie-up would be possible between the two truckmakers, as well as the truck assets of carmaker Volkswagen, the biggest shareholder of both MAN and Scania." The Times adds, "The withdrawal of the offer just eight days before it was due to expire puts VW and particularly Investor in a position to stamp their mark over any future discussions. … Several people on the German side said they now expected a new company to be established into which all the groups would be merged. … Both VW and Investor would hold large stakes in such a group, according to people briefed on the plans. But advisers on all sides said first there would be a cooling off period and that any eventual tie-up would 'take months, not days or weeks.'"

Dutch Court Rules Against Bid For Dofasco. The Baltimore Sun (1/24, Connolly) reports, "A Dutch court yesterday tossed out a bid by ThyssenKrupp AG to force Arcelor Mittal to honor a pledge to sell Canadian steelmaker Dofasco, but it's not clear whether Mittal will sell either its steel plant in Sparrows Point or Weirton, W.Va." The Sun continues, "The Justice Department gave Mittal until Jan. 28 to sell Dofasco Inc. to ensure it would not have a monopoly on tin production in the United States after its $33 billion merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA. … If Mittal is unable to sell Dofasco, a manufacturer of high-grade sheet metal for the North American auto industry, the Justice Department has said Mittal must sell either its Sparrows Point or Weirton facility." The Sun adds, "Arcelor placed the profitable Dofasco in a Dutch trust early last year in an effort to fend off Mittal's hostile takeover bid. While Arcelor finally agreed to merge with Mittal, creating the world's largest steelmaker with annual production topping 110 million tons, it has no control over the trust. … The three trustees have already rejected a proposal by Mittal to sell Dofasco to Germany's ThyssenKrupp for $4.6 billion, less than the $4.86 billion that Arcelor paid for it. … Mittal said this month that it would not sue the trust to release Dofasco." The Sun notes, "It appears Mittal has given up trying to sell Dofasco. Last week, Mittal confirmed it was in negotiations with a Chicago-based steel distributor, Esmark Inc., to sell all or parts of Weirton, a large producer of tin plate. The two parties have signed a nonbinding memorandum of understanding, but any sale hinges on approval from the Justice Department. Late last year, Esmark gained control over nearby Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. and promised cash for Weirton if Mittal put it up for sale. … However, Justice has the final say about which plant is sold and to whom. … Gina Talamona, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said yesterday in an e-mail response that 'the matter is still pending.'"

Bush Seeks To Curb US Gasoline Demand With Renewable Fuels, Greater Efficiency. The New York Times (1/24, Andrews, Barringer, 1.16M) reports, "President Bush, vowing to reduce the nation's thirst for foreign oil, called on Tuesday for a huge government-mandated increase in renewable fuels -- mainly ethanol -- and tougher mileage standards for cars and light trucks." The proposals "were more ambitious, and perhaps less achievable, than those he made a year ago when he said the nation was 'addicted to oil.' The centerpiece of Mr. Bush's proposal, which he said would cut the projected use of gasoline by 20 percent over the next decade, was a nearly fivefold mandatory increase in the production of ethanol and other alternative fuels for cars and trucks." Bush "called for a mandatory requirement that makers of fuel produce 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels a year by 2017, replacing about 15 percent of the projected gasoline use in that year. A second major plank of Mr. Bush's energy proposal calls for increasing fuel-efficiency standards of cars and trucks by 4 percent a year -- about one mile per gallon -- starting in 2010 for cars and 2012 for trucks." Bush also "called for doubling the amount of oil in the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to about 1.5 billion barrels of oil. The doubling would take place at a snail's pace over the next 20 years. Even so, advance word of the idea helped push up oil prices by $2.46 a barrel on Tuesday to $55.04." Bush's proposals "face a slew of obstacles, both practical and political."

USA Today (1/24, Healey, 2.27M) reports, "The energy portion of President Bush's State of the Union speech Tuesday included some eye-popping numbers that would amount to a boon for the ethanol industry and could begin boosting the fuel economy of cars and trucks as soon as 2009." The "most stunning number in Bush's plan is 35 billion gallons -- the amount of renewable and alternative fuels that the petroleum industry would have to blend with gasoline by 2017. That would displace one-fourth of the gasoline Americans use."

The Chicago Tribune (1/24, Neikirk, 617K) reports, "President Bush sought Tuesday night to counter criticism that he has failed to do enough to tackle global warming and energy security as he unveiled a 10-year plan to slash U.S. gasoline consumption by 20 percent." If "initial assessments of his new proposal are any guide, the president has more persuading to do. Critics said that while his plan had many good elements, it either does not go far enough or might not be practical in some cases." Bush "presented an ambitious proposal that goes far beyond anything else he has previously offered to address what he called America's addiction to oil."

The Los Angeles Times (1/24, Simon, Douglass, O'Dell, 850K) reports, "President Bush's proposals to reduce U.S. gasoline consumption by 20 percent in 10 years include more specific and ambitious new goals than in previous White House statements, but they also appear to rely on assumptions about energy markets, politics and technology that some experts say are debatable, and include some apparent contradictions." The Times adds, "In general, Bush's proposal to boost alternative fuels such as ethanol was greeted with conditional enthusiasm by many scientists, environmentalists and members of Congress." Congressional "Democrats and their environmental allies assailed Bush for failing to endorse mandatory limits on emissions blamed for global warming, commit to stricter vehicle miles-per-gallon rules or reconsider his past opposition to requiring a percentage of the nation's electricity to be generated from alternative energy sources such as solar and wind power." But "any effort to go beyond what Bush is proposing could be politically difficult." Bush's "call for ramping up production of ethanol and other alternative fuels generated more enthusiasm, especially on Capitol Hill among farm-state Democrats and Republicans."

The Wall Street Journal (1/24, A2, Ball, Etter, 2.04M) reports, "President Bush's call for the U.S. to reduce projected gasoline demand by 20% over the next decade faces a hurdle: a volatile energy market." The "economics both of alternative fuels and of more-efficient vehicles depend largely on the price of oil as well as other commodities, leaving them vulnerable to market shifts." The Journal adds, "The volatility ethanol producers have encountered underscores the uncertainty faced by companies and investors trying to develop alternate sources of energy. Lower prices can hurt the economic argument underpinning their development, and added supplies can bring prices down."

The Financial Times (1/24, Cameron) reports that the renewable fuels targets outlined in the speech "are expected to inflame the food-versus-fuel debate over the competing use of corn-based ethanol, while environmentalists have also expressed concern over plans to increase domestic oil production." The Times adds, "The president is expected to commit more funds to renewable fuel research – a call matched by the Democratic leaders – in a bid to meet the targets and make other feedstocks such as sawgrass more commercially viable. However, the target could also renew calls for the existing tariff on ethanol imports to be lifted."

The Washington Post (1/24, A14, Mufson, 690K) reports, "The energy proposals President Bush outlined last night break new ground for his administration. ... Each proposal, though, immediately prompted questions about its ultimate effectiveness." The Post outlines four energy proposals from the State of the Union speech and gives what it calls the "fine print" of each.

The Financial Times (1/24, Daniel) reports, "The speech marked Mr Bush's strongest effort yet to slow the growth of greenhouse gases." But "the White House energy policy fell short of hopes that it would engage in international discussions about a post-Kyoto accord after 2012 to control greenhouse gases or support tougher economy wide mandatory caps on carbon dioxide."

Plan To Double Petroleum Reserve Causes Big Jump In Oil Prices. NBC Nightly News (1/23, story 10, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported that oil prices "shot up today after the government announced it will boost this nation's emergency oil stockpiles. That word sent crude oil up $2.48 a barrel. A gain of nearly 5% in one day to close at $55.04 a barrel."

The Financial Times (1/24, Daniel) reports, "President George W. Bush triggered the biggest one-day jump in oil prices in 16 months on Tuesday when he set out plans in his State of the Union address to double US strategic oil reserves." Energy Secretary Sam Bodman "said his department would start 'purchasing crude oil in the spring at a rate of about 100,000 barrels per day.'"

Samuelson Warns Against "Infatuation" With Biofuels. Washington Post (1/24, A23, 690K) columnist Robert J. Samuelson writes, "President Bush joined the biofuels enthusiasm in his State of the Union address, and no one can doubt the powerful allure." But it "may be a mirage. The great danger of the biofuels craze is that it will divert us from stronger steps to limit dependence on foreign oil: higher fuel taxes to prod Americans to buy more gasoline-efficient vehicles and tougher federal fuel economy standards to force auto companies to produce them." The "administration's ultimate target of 60 billion gallons in 2030" would "offset less than half of the projected increase in annual oil use." And the "60 billion-gallon goal -- and the 35 billion-gallon interim target -- are also probably unrealistic." Although biofuels "are certainly worth pursuing," there is "a real threat that the infatuation with biofuels is a political expediency that will turn into a classic government boondoggle, benefiting selected constituencies and providing few genuine public benefits."

Predictions Of US Action On Climate Change Doubted. Wall Street Journal columnist Holman W. Jenkins, Jr. (1/24) writes this morning, "Pundits tell us the mood shift, with Democrats now in control, favors action on climate change. Don't bet on it. It's still going to be hard for the legislative process to get past the fact that nothing on the table or capable of commanding majority support would make the slightest difference to climate change." Jenkins adds, "A carbon tax would be the efficient way of encouraging businesses and consumers to make less carbon-intensive energy choices." But "because a carbon tax would lead to a direct (rather than surreptitious) increase in the cost of gasoline, the path of enlightenment will not be the path of politics." US policy "will consist of symbolism on global warming but nothing so costly and radical as to require true climate worrywarts to brighten up."

Congress May Revise Federal Mercury Pollution Policy. The Christian Science Monitor (1/24, Spotts, 59K) reports several "draft bills in Congress – as well as a suit in federal court – are challenging the Bush administration's mercury pollution program, which took effect last year. A key reason, they charge, is that the plan's emissions-trading scheme – which has worked to curb other pollutants that spread far and wide – doesn't work for mercury, which accumulates locally as well as spreading over long distances." Lawmakers on Capitol Hill are "preparing bills that would tackle the toxic pollutant in a more direct manner. They aim to reduce mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants by 90 percent, rather than the Environmental Protection Agency's (EPA's) target of 70 percent. The bills also would set up a nationwide monitoring network to track airborne mercury and its effects on the environment."

US Fines Cruise Line In Whale's Death. The Anchorage (AK) Daily News (1/24, Hunter) reports, "Princess Cruise Lines has agreed to pay $755,000 in fines and restitution to resolve accusations that one of its ships struck and killed a humpback whale near Glacier Bay more than five years ago." The News continues, "A court date to finalize a plea agreement is set for Monday in U.S. District Court in Anchorage. According to documents filed last week, Princess is expected to plead guilty to a single misdemeanor of 'failing to operate at a slow, safe speed while near humpback whales.' Under a plea agreement yet to be filed, the company would pay a $200,000 fine to the government and $550,000 in 'community service restitution' to the National Park Service Foundation, court papers say. That money would go to an account for Glacier Bay National Park." The News adds, "John Quinley, an Alaska spokesman for the National Park Service, said Justice department attorneys have told Park Service officials not to discuss the case at least until next week. The body of a 45-foot humpback was found floating near the mouth of Glacier Bay in mid-July 2001. A necropsy conducted at the time showed the animal died of massive skull fractures. A Princess vessel, the Dawn Princess, had been operating near two humpback whales a few days before, according to the court papers and news reports at the time."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexico's Attorney General Says Extradited Drug Suspects Could Return To Mexico. The AP (1/23) reported Mexico's attorney general "said an alarming increase in drug use in Mexico is leading cartels to fight primarily for markets and territory rather than shipping routes, as cocaine finds an easier market [in Mexico] than in the United States. Attorney General Eduardo Medina Mora also said Tuesday that a group of alleged drug traffickers extradited to the U.S. over the weekend could be returned to Mexican prisons once they are tried abroad, noting 'that possibility has not been discarded.'" The AP says his comments to congressional members that "some of the 15 extradited late Friday might wind up back in Mexico to serve unfinished sentences or face new trials seemed at odds with the expectations of U.S. officials, who apparently plan to keep them for life. On Monday, Karen Tandy…said that 'on behalf of the DEA, I have one last thing to say to these 15 criminals: Welcome to the first day of the rest of your lives.'" The AP story was used by the International Herald Tribune, France.

The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/23, Soto) reported that four "drug cartel leaders" extradited from Mexico "are expected to appear in San Diego federal court within weeks. Officials refused to give details about their transfer…for security reasons. … Tandy said the greatest coup was the extradition of Osiel Cárdenas, a former police officer accused of running the Gulf Cartel, and of having corrupted specially trained Mexican federal officers. 'For the past eight years, Osiel Cárdenas Guillen commanded one of the most brutal and powerful drug cartels in the world,' she said." Mexico's attorney general "has said the cartel leaders…were extradited to stop their communications from behind bars and to reduce risks of violence and escape."

Former Texas Police Officer Among Extradited Fugitives. In McAllen, Texas, the Monitor (1/23) reported one of the 15 fugitives Mexico "extradited to the United States Friday was a former officer in the Donna and Weslaco police departments whose confession nine years ago helped bring down a powerful Mexican cartel. Gilberto Salinas-Doria's arrival at Ellington Field Friday outside Houston capped 16 years on the run from a federal indictment in Brownsville. … Salinas-Doria skipped bail on a 1990 charge in Brownsville that he tried to buy thousands of pounds of marijuana. Drug cases were later opened against him in Georgia and Houston."

Violence Expected Due To Extraditions. The San Antonio Express-News (1/23) reported the removal of alleged Mexican "drug kingpin" Osiel Cárdenas Guillén from communication with his organization "raised questions about whether a power vacuum would usher in a wave of violence in Gulf Cartel territory, which reaches from Matamoros, across from Brownsville, to west of Nuevo Laredo. 'This is going to add to the ongoing war between these groups,' said Bruce Bagley, an expert on drug trafficking at the University of Miami. 'It happens every time you behead one of these organizations.' Violence in the short term is almost assured as the Gulf Cartel restructures itself and as the rival Sinaloa Cartel may perceive the group as vulnerable, Bagley said."

Calderón's Efforts Called Extraordinary. In an editorial, the Christian Science Monitor (1/24) writes, "A new Mexican president, Felipe Calderón, has taken extraordinary steps to give fresh hope to a country that needs it. He's extradited drug kingpins to the US and sent troops into violent drug zones. This just may be a Mexican leader the US can get behind." The U.S. "should back Calderón's bold moves. For starters, it can reduce its consumption of illegal drugs and make it more difficult for Mexicans to cross the border and abandon their country. But now may be the time for the US to ask what more it can do to finally help fix its neighbor's seemingly intractable social and economic problems."

Eleven Suspected Gang Associates Arrested In Massachusetts. In Springfield, the Republican (1/24) reports a local gang task force "arrested 11 suspected gang associates early yesterday morning, billing the effort as a coordinated attempt to beat back rising street crime. … In addition to the FBI and Springfield police, agents with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives joined in the sweep, plus U.S. Marshals, Massachusetts State Police and members of the Hampden County Sheriff's Department." The Republican says more arrests are expected to be announced today.

Prosecutors Say Chicago Car Dealers Created Haven For Drug Runners. The Chicago Sun-Times (1/23) reported two West Side auto dealer owners

"lined their pockets by selling luxury SUVs for cash to drug dealers, who used them to smuggle cocaine or heroin. … The accusations came as the trial for Amir Hosseini and Hossein Obaei began in federal court. The men's dealerships...were shuttered by authorities in 2005 and more than 100 vehicles…were seized. … While seizing SUVs at the U.S.-Mexico border, the Drug Enforcement Administration and FBI discovered many were purchased at the West Side dealerships." The Sun-Times says Hosseini and Obaei "are accused of using their businesses as a haven for drug runners and gang-bangers, laundering millions of dollars."

Tennessee Newspaper Notes Cost Of Illegal Immigrant's Prosecution In Marijuana Case. The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (1/24, Satterfield) reports Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck "said [Juan] Lino-Gomez in a single transaction last July sold 100 pounds of marijuana. Unlucky for him, though, his customer turned out to be an undercover agent, and he and his alleged cohorts were arrested." But Lino-Gomez's case "is a primer on the price tag that prosecutions involving illegal immigrants can carry. Start with the salaries of lead investigators, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Todd Lee and Knoxville Police Department Investigator Bruce Conkey. Next, add in cash taxpayers fork out to cover Winck's salary."

Big City Mayors Hold Gun Summit In DC. The AP (1/24, Barrett) reports, "Dozens of mayors from around the country gathered Tuesday to urge the new Democratic Congress to fight crime by allowing wider tracking of illegal guns." The AP continues, "New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Boston Mayor Thomas Menino were joined by 50 other mayors, who argue more access to gun sales data would reduce crime in the streets of their cities. … Minneapolis, Miami, Newark, N.J., and Omaha, Neb., were among the cities represented." The AP adds, "Bloomberg, a moderate Republican, said it was time to 'begin showing Congress that it is possible to find common ground on common sense issues.' … 'We refuse to fall into the same old trap that it is an either-or: either respect the rights of gun owners or keep illegal guns out of the hands of criminals,' Bloomberg said. 'That's ideological nonsense, and we've just got to move past it.' … To buttress their case, several of the mayors cited the recent rises in violent crime across the country." The AP notes, "FBI data show that violent crime rose 3.7 percent nationwide in the first six months of 2006 compared to the previous year. .. In New York, the murder rate rose almost 10 percent in 2006, though the overall crime rate continued to decline."

The Washington Times (1/24, DeBose, 88K) reports "more than 120 of the nation's mayors urged Congress yesterday to allow federal and local law enforcement to share gun database tracking information in an effort to curtail the illegal sale of firearms." City executives "said they have run out of options to keep guns off their streets. Gun-buyback programs and stings on vendors who violate laws haven't solved the problem, they said." Mayors Michael R. Bloomberg of New York and Thomas M. Merino of Boston, "who in April formed a coalition called Mayors Against Illegal Guns, have crafted a policy agenda for Congress." The Mayors are "attempting to avoid serious conflicts with pro-gun groups, sportsmen and advocates of the Second Amendment, which protects Americans' right to bear arms."

Former ATF Agents Sue Chicago, Charging Police Corruption. The AP (1/24, Robinson) reports, "Chicago police retaliated with harsh reprisals against two government agents who blew the whistle on one of the city's most corrupt police officers ever, a federal court jury was told Tuesday." The AP continues, "Diane V. Klipfel and Michael V. Casali, a married couple who were agents with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, found their lives in ruins after they leveled corruption charges in 1992 at decorated narcotics investigator Joseph Miedzianowski, attorney Sally H. Saltzberg said. … 'They went to enormous lengths to retaliate against Diane and Mike for their allegations,' Saltzberg said during opening statements in the couple's civil lawsuit against the city." The AP adds, "Klipfel and Casali are seeking almost $10 million apiece in damages from the city, saying they were not only the targets of retaliation but the victims of a 'blue wall of silence' designed to cover up corruption. … City of Chicago attorney Stephen Baker scoffed at the notion that the city had any responsibility for the problems that beset the couple. … He told jurors that police officials all but begged ATF for information about wrongdoing on the part of Miedzianowski. But it was the Chicago police who were met with silence, Baker said."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Urges Congress To Pass Immigration Reform. The Washington Times (1/24, Dinan, 88K) reports, "President Bush last night said his administration has made huge strides clamping down on illegal border crossings, and called on Congress to finish the job this year by passing a guest-worker bill and extending citizenship rights to illegal aliens." In a State of the Union address "designed to highlight areas where he could work with the new majority Democrats, Mr. Bush put immigration front and center, along with education, health care and energy policy -- all domestic issues where he thinks he can find common ground. 'Convictions run deep in this Capitol when it comes to immigration. Let us have a serious, civil and conclusive debate -- so that you can pass and I can sign comprehensive immigration reform,' Mr. Bush said." But "the president's push will isolate many conservative Republicans who oppose his immigration and education plans, and shows the precarious balancing act Mr. Bush will have to do with his own party as he works with Democrats to try to achieve legacy accomplishments."

The Wall Street Journal (1/24, A2, Kronholz, Lueck, 2.04M) says "Bush's call for an overhaul of immigration law is largely a reprise of earlier plans, but with a twist: With his party out of power on Capitol Hill, it could pass." Bush" elevated immigration to one of four domestic-policy priorities in his State of the Union address, even while offering an agenda similar to last year's plan. He proposed a temporary-worker plan, a path to legalization for some of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants, tougher border enforcement and measures to ensure employers hire only legal workers." Bush and congressional Democrats "agree on the outlines of a bill, but they are far apart on details. Both agree on helping employers fill jobs with temporary workers. Without that, they say, the US economy will remain a magnet for illegals. But the president insists those workers must eventually leave, a key demand of conservatives who fear the growing Hispanic population is undermining American culture. Generally, Democrats want to let them stay and eventually become citizens."

Rohrabacher's Body Language During Speech Noted. CNN's John Roberts noted he was watching Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R) who was "shaking his head through much of what the President was saying, particularly about the guest worker program. … Rohrabacher shook his head and refused to stand up."

Immigration Raids In South California Net 761 Arrests. The AP (1/24, Flaccus) reports from Santa Ana, CA, "Federal immigration officials said Tuesday they arrested more than 750 illegal immigrant fugitives from 14 countries in what they described as one of the biggest such sweeps in U.S. history." The AP continues, "The weeklong series of raids in the five-county Los Angeles region targeted illegal immigrants who had previously been deported for crimes or had ignored final deportation orders." The AP adds, "The raids netted 338 illegal immigrants who were arrested at their homes and apartments and 423 who were identified in area jails since Jan. 17. Those already jailed will be transferred to federal custody when they finish serving their state sentences, said Virginia Kice, spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. … The sweep netted illegal immigrants from Mexico, Honduras, Ukraine, India, Japan, Poland and Trinidad, among others. Of the 761 people arrested, more than 450 have already been deported, Kice said." The AP notes, "The raids were a major push within 'Operation Return to Sender,' a crackdown that has resulted in 13,192 arrests nationwide since late May. Immigration officials have also identified 3,000 inmates in state and local jails who will be deported. … The operation targets those illegal immigrants who hide after skipping their voluntary deportation proceedings and criminals who have re-entered the United States after being previously deported for crimes in the U.S."

TAX:

DOJ Seeks Back Taxes From Closed New York Center. The Buffalo News (1/24) reports, "In an attempt to recoup back taxes from the closed St. Augustine Center, the Tax Division of the U.S. Justice Department has filed a federal suit seeking to block state court action in the case." The News continues, "The Tax Division served papers Friday on State Supreme Court Justice John A. Michalek, who shut down the center last February, and Adam W. Perry, the attorney he assigned to close the books on the center and pay off unpaid workers. … U.S. District Judge John T. Elfvin has scheduled a hearing on the suit for Wednesday." The News adds, "Perry noted this is the third time in recent months that the Justice Department has sought to intervene in the state court action, in which he is seeking to partially compensate 85 employees, each now entitled to about $1,500, for their work during the final months. … The Justice Department lawsuit describes the court action as an effort to block Perry from distributing any funds collected for St.

Augustine employees and 'enjoin the New York State Supreme Court, Erie County, from proceeding further in the receivership action.' … The federal government hopes to secure at least partial funding of the $699,553 in unpaid federal employment taxes, federal income tax liabilities and interest that continue to accumulate against the center."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Say Bush Healthcare Proposal "Dead On Arrival." In his State of the Union address yesterday evening, President Bush offered a new federal healthcare plan as part of his domestic agenda. Media coverage of Bush's speech focused primarily on Iraq, but national newspapers devoted some secondary stories to the healthcare plan. USA Today (1/24, 1B, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "Bush's State of the Union health care proposal couples an old idea, capping tax-free benefits for health care, with a new one: a standard deduction for all who buy health insurance. If approved, and the plan faces a chilly reception in the Democrat-controlled Congress, the administration says it would give people who buy their own health insurance equal tax breaks with those who get coverage through their jobs. The tax savings could help 3 million to 5 million of the nearly 47 million now-uninsured people buy coverage, the administration says. … A similar plan to cap tax-free health benefits offered by employers was proposed by President Reagan in 1986 but failed to pass Congress."

According to reports, Democrats have categorically rejected President Bush's healthcare plan. Under the headline "Bush's Insurance Plan Looks DOA," Roll Call (1/24, Stanton) reports, "Bush's call for a major overhaul of the employer-based health insurance system is unlikely to see much, if any, action in the Senate this year in the face of near-universal opposition from Democrats and a GOP base still stinging from the Social Security debacle in the 109th Congress. … Senate Democrats have largely dismissed the proposal, charging it will cause a significant tax burden on middle-class families."

USA Today (1/24, 1B, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif., chairman of a key health subcommittee in the House, said he would not even consider hearings on the proposal. He says it would give wealthier Americans with health insurance a far larger tax break than the lower-income uninsured that the plan purportedly aims to help."

The New York Times (1/24, Toner, Pear, 1.16M) reports "Congressional Democrats described the plan as a middle-class tax increase that would penalize people with good health benefits. They praised the new focus on health care, but said the Bush proposal was more likely to yield partisan debate than a search for consensus."

The Washington Times (1/24, Curl, 88K) reports, " As evidence of the partisanship in the House, Rep. Pete Stark, California Democrat and chairman of the Ways and Means health subcommittee, said he would not even consider holding hearings on the plan."

The Washington Post (1/24, A14, Weisman, Fletcher, 690K) reports "Democrats said they did not see much movement toward them beyond the rhetoric."

The Los Angeles Times (1/24, McManus, Reynolds, 850K) reports Democrats "criticized his healthcare plan as a threat to traditional employer-provided insurance."

The Wall Street Journal (1/24, Meckler, 2.04M) says the plan "could spell trouble for less-healthy workers who would likely pay higher premiums than they would if they were part of a group plan, critics say. … Critics also argue it would also do little to help those without insurance now. Most of the uninsured have relatively low incomes, meaning the new tax deduction for purchasing insurance on the open market is less valuable for them than for those who earn more."

The Chicago Tribune (1/24, Graham, 617K) summarizes the program and offers reaction from figures in the insurance agency and at think tanks. Karen Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans: "I think the president is jump-starting a national discussion over expanding health-care coverage." Meanwhile, Paul Fronstin, director of health research at the Employee Benefit Research Institute, "envisions a series of serious consequences. More employers would stop offering health insurance and younger and healthier workers would opt out of company plans if they could get better deals elsewhere." Also, "Robert Reischauer, president of the Urban Institute, worries that the president's plan would push more people into the individual insurance market, which is notorious for being expensive and excluding people with pre-existing medical conditions."

More Commentary. Editorials and op-eds offer a range of reaction to the plan, significantly, however, commentators also rap the Democrats for their immediate opposition to the president's plan. In a column appearing in the Washington Post (1/24, D1, 690K) Business section, Steven Pearlstein notes that Bush "last night in his State of the Union address that he is ready to come to the negotiating table on a range of domestic issues" including healthcare. Pearlstein writes, "[T]he most surprising and encouraging development is that a president who for six years has only nibbled around the edges of health-care issues has weighed in with some bold ideas to expand coverage, rein in costs and bring some fairness to the tax code. And get this: It actually involves raising taxes on the rich and lavishly insured and giving the money to the working poor and the uninsured. Given that, you'd think Democrats would have welcomed a politically courageous proposal to put a cap on one of the biggest and most regressive features of the individual income-tax code. But instead, they've shifted reflexively into partisan attack mode, mischaracterizing the impacts of the proposal and shamelessly parroting the propaganda from the labor dinosaurs at the AFL-CIO."

In her column in the Washington Post (1/24, A23, 690K), Ruth Marcus writes, "Listening to Democratic reaction to Bush's new health insurance proposal, you get the sense that if Bush picked a plank right out of the Democratic platform -- if he introduced Hillarycare itself -- and stuck it in his State of the Union address, Democrats would churn out press releases denouncing it. This sad situation is largely of Bush's own making. He is reaping the poisonous state of affairs that he helped sow for six years."

The New York Times editorializes, "Last night, Mr. Bush...acted as if he were really doing something to help the 47 million people in this country who don't have health insurance. What he offered, by the White House's own estimate, would take a few million off that scandalously high number and shift the burden to the states. Mr. Bush's plan would put a new tax on Americans who were lucky enough to still have good health-care coverage through their employers. Some large portion of those are middle class and represented by the labor unions that Mr. Bush and the Republicans are dedicated to destroying."

The Washington Post (1/24, A22, 690K) editorializes, "On health care, Mr. Bush would cap the currently unlimited tax deduction for employer-sponsored health insurance; he'd replace that with a standard deduction -- $15,000 for a family policy -- available for all insurance, whether offered by employers or bought privately. This would improve progressivity and fairness, and help contain health-care costs. As written, the proposal has flaws, but those can be addressed -- if Democrats are willing to do more than hurl criticism."

The Wall Street Journal (1/24, 2.04M) editorializes, "For all the griping about our system, Americans have the most advanced health care in the world in part because we still have something resembling a private market for insurance. But it is not a truly efficient market because current tax policy lets businesses -- but not individuals -- deduct the cost of health expenditures. Thus most Americans with private insurance get it from their employers, which leads to inequities and insulates individuals from the real cost of their treatment decisions. Mr. Bush's 'standard deduction' for health care would move in the direction of solving both problems." The Journal adds, "[T]he biggest problem with Mr. Bush's plan is that it wasn't offered two years ago, when it had a better chance to pass. The White House wasted its first term health energies on a failed attempt to buy votes with the Medicare drug benefit. Now the GOP is a minority in Congress, and Democrats aren't likely to favor Mr. Bush's ideas because they think health care is a winner for them in 2008."

The Washington Times (1/24, 88K) adds, "[T]his proposal to make the tax code fair and health care affordable comes from President Bush with a Congress under Democratic control in the run to a presidential election year. So it will be attacked for failing to be everything that everyone else's proposal is not. … It's not the entire answer, of course. Using existing monies to fund health care for children as tax credits for insurance would help, too. But you won't find the president's critics supporting his fair and compassionate plan."

The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (1/24) editorializes, "Because many today have health insurance that covers even ordinary medical expenses, they have insufficient cause to restrain their use of services and demand efficiency and cost accountability from providers. … The Bush plan would institute some free-market-oriented elements. And that's why it's worth exploring further."

The Detroit Free Press (1/24, 373K) editorializes, "The details of the domestic agenda — on which Bush's advisers set up the speech to be judged — fell short of inspiration." On healthcare, the Free Press writes, "Bush offered a plan that would leave in the lurch those who need it most, punish those who have good coverage and discourage employers from offering top-notch benefits."

In an op-ed appearing in USA Today (1/24, 13A, 2.27M), Alan M. Webber, co-founding editor of Fast Company magazine, examines the healthcare debate in the context of

US companies and competitiveness, particularly in the auto industry. He writes, "What if the real diagnosis of the competitive problems of GM, Ford and Chrysler, as well as many other deeply entrenched industrial companies, isn't really about health care costs? What if their problems aren't even about their products?... So how would reforming health care coverage change corporate culture? Imagine a shift in health care coverage that de-couples it from your job. … Imagine a chance to join a more entrepreneurial company, maybe even a start-up, without having to worry about health care costs. Imagine being the CEO of one of the old, ailing companies and suddenly realizing that, while your prayer for relief from your health-care-cost headache has been answered, all of a sudden, you've got a bigger malady: Your best employees no longer feel the need to put up with your stagnant organization just for the security of a lavish health care plan"

Bolten Hopeful White House, Congress Can Cooperate. The Politico (1/23, Allen) interviewed White House chief of staff Joshua B. Bolten. Asked for a "realistic assessment of what the president and Congress can accomplish this year," Bolten said, "I'm optimistic that the president's instinct to take on large issues will continue to be rewarded, even in the last two years of his term. The president's State of the Union is going to put on the table important reforms in health care, in energy, in the reauthorization of No Child Left Behind and in immigration. I think we have a good shot at substantial legislation in all of those." Bolten added what the "change in control means is that Democrats now will be under more pressure than they have been in the minority to deliver actual accomplishments." Bolten added there have been "good signs" for White House-congressional relations, such as "some of the personal relationships. The new leaders have been here to the White House and I think have established a pretty good dialogue directly with the president. There's been reasonably good tone in that dialogue."

House GOP Divisions First Test For Boehner. The Politico (1/23, O'Connor) reported last night that as House Republicans "depart today for a caucus retreat on Maryland's Eastern Shore, GOP ranks are increasingly divided over the best strategy for taking on the new Democratic majority." The dispute "is the first major test for new House Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, who is under pressure from some colleagues who believe he is too docile in challenging Democrats and laying the political foundation for a GOP comeback in 2008." Some Republicans are "advocating a wait-in-the-weeds strategy -- projecting an air of civility and selective cooperation with Speaker Nancy Pelosi and fellow Democrats, while waiting for the right moment to pounce for partisan gains." But many "backbench Republicans, joined by some members of the leadership team, believe it makes more sense to pounce early and often." Former Speaker Dennis Hastert "received a rousing ovation at a closed-door meeting in the Cannon Caucus Room last week when he urged colleagues to stand up and fight. Some members interpreted that as a veiled shot at Boehner." But Boehner said "the party can afford to be patient." Boehner said, "It's their honeymoon. We're not in a sprint here. We're in a marathon Chill out." The Politico adds President Bush "is scheduled to address the retreat on Friday, and some Republicans expect the three-day conference to be a contentious discussion about the direction of the party."

Roll Call (1/24, Duran, Drucker) reports some GOP strategists "say the party must woo independent voters and concentrate on issues important to them, such as economic matters, while others prefer the base-driven political tactics honed by Karl Rove and recently departed Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman in the past three elections." Those Republicans "espousing a more inclusive message say the results of the 2006 midterm elections repudiated the base-only strategy and signaled that if the GOP does not focus on rebuilding a governing coalition that elevates policy accomplishments above politics, they should get comfortable as the House and Senate's minority party."

House Votes To Block Pensions Of Convicted Lawmakers. The Washington Post (1/24, A4, Layton, 690K) reports the House "voted unanimously yesterday to deny federal pensions to lawmakers convicted of bribery, perjury and other related felonies." But the "punishment of those who betray the public trust will not be far-reaching. The measure is similar to one approved by the Senate last week and comes in the wake of major congressional scandals last year that led to the conviction of former Republican congressmen Randy 'Duke' Cunningham (Calif.) and Robert W. Ney (Ohio). The House passed the bill 431 to 0, with four members not voting." The bills "passed by the House and the Senate are not retroactive, which means that Cunningham and Ney will collect substantial pensions for the rest of their lives, courtesy of taxpayers." Both bills would also "allow the Office of Personnel Management, which calculates the pensions of members of Congress, to award the pensions of convicted lawmakers to their families, in cases of demonstrated financial need."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (1/24, A4) reports the "431-0 House vote comes four days after former Rep. Bob Ney (R., Ohio) received a 30-month prison term for taking political favors from Jack Abramoff, whose influence-peddling tactics helped make corruption a major issue in the November elections. Mr. Ney, as past chairman of the House Administration, backed similar legislation last year." The House bill, "like its Senate counterpart, isn't retroactive and wouldn't affect the benefits of Mr. Ney, who is eligible for a pension of about $29,000 a year if he waits until 2016, when he turns 62."

Pelosi Consolidating Power Within Democratic Caucus. Roll Call (1/24, Yachnin) reports that just "weeks into her tenure, Democratic Members and aides see" Speaker Nancy Pelosi "taking subtle steps to consolidate her power within the new House majority, provoking some grumbling, but largely avoiding any serious internal revolts as Democrats settle into their new roles." Pelosi has "made herself the Democratic Caucus' clear leader in formulating an agenda and message strategy, also while installing key staff at the party's campaign committee. At the same time, she is working to rein in the chamber's chairmen, an effort that aims to prevent the resurgence of largely autonomous chairmen that dominated the House chamber during the previous Democratic majority." Pelosi's efforts so far "are drawing largely muted reactions from the party's 21 newly installed chairmen — many of whom held gavels in the party's last majority 12 years ago. That initial response may not prevent troubles ahead, but for now, many are chalking up any discord to their new roles."

Presidential Race Could Prove Distraction For Democratic Leaders. Roll Call (1/24, Billings) reports, "Less than a month into their newly elected leadership roles," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and Speaker Nancy Pelosi "already are confronting a vocal and prominent cast of Congressional Democratic presidential hopefuls who quickly are capturing the national spotlight." While many congressional Democrats "say publicly they have grown used to Members and Senators using Capitol Hill as a platform for White House runs, they privately acknowledge the early 2008 campaign could become a distraction, and the window will be narrow for Reid and Pelosi to drive the party agenda and set the tone in the early days of the 110th Congress." Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) "said the early primary season has 'got to be a distraction' for the Senate leadership and 'at times can be an annoyance,' but also said it can serve to help drive the debate and encourage discussions among political players."

Proposed Bush Library Generates Debate At SMU. ABC World News (1/23, story 7, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Southern Methodist University, SMU, in Dallas, is hardly a hotbed of protest. But plans to place the George W. Bush Presidential library at SMU has sparked a fierce debate on campus." ABC (Von Fremd) added, "At the heart of the debate here at SMU, the Bush legacy versus academic integrity versus a golden opportunity." Reverend William McElvaney, "Professor emeritus at SMU's school of theology, is 1 of 68 faculty members who oppose the Bush institution." Rev. William McElvaney, SMU: "I think the think tank has the danger of developing a political philosophy that is identified with the school that could well compromise our academic integrity." Von Fremd: "Scholars say the few schools fortunate enough to have" a presidential library "consider them a treasure. But scholars say it will enhance the reputation of the university, attract scholars from around the world as well as top students from across the country."

GAO Criticizes Administration For Declining Drug Subsidy For Federal Workers. The Washington Post's (1/24, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports that the Bush administration declined to participate in a "2003 law that allows employers to receive subsidies for prescription drug coverage on the condition that they provide a benefit for their Medicare-eligible retirees that is at least as good as the Medicare drug plan. The government, of course, is an employer, operating a medical-insurance program, but Bush officials decided it made little sense for the government, in effect, to pay a subsidy to itself." The Post adds that the GAO has "questioned" that decision in "a report" in which "GAO analysts think that allowing Uncle Sam to move money from one pocket to another would probably lower premiums in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, which provides medical coverage to about 8 million people." The

Post adds that OPM "has ruled out applying for the Medicare subsidy," and adds that "the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association has criticized the OPM for refusing to seek the Medicare subsidy, contending that the OPM is missing out on $1 billion annually." NARFE president Margaret L. Baptiste, "said yesterday that the White House budget office and the OPM 'should explain to federal workers, retirees and survivor annuitants, who often struggle to pay their steadily increasing premiums, why the federal government failed to do what a multitude of other employers have done to reduce this burden.'"

NYTimes Print Lyrics Of Song Mocking Bush. Under the headline "State of the Union: Another Take," the New York Times (1/24, 1.16M) prints on its editorial page the lyrics to a song performed by Randy Newman at Carnegie Hall in 2006 titled "A Few Words in Defense of Our Country." In the song, Newman jests, "Now the leaders we have, while they're the worst that we've had, are hardly the worst this poor world has seen."

WSJournal Critical Of Democratic Senators For Not Supporting Rescission Bill. The Wall Street Journal (1/24, A12, 2.04M) writes in an editorial about New Hampshire Sen. Judd Gregg's (R) bill to offer the president "'rescission' authority" that the bill "is nearly identical to a rescission amendment offered by former Democratic Senator (and one-time Majority Leader) Tom Daschle in 1995" that was supported by "37 Democrats…and 20 of them are still in the Senate." The Journal notes prior support by Democratic Sens. Robert Byrd, Dianne Feinstein, Russ Feingold, Patty Murray, Byron Dorgan, Chris Dodd, Carl Levin and Joe Biden, adding "if this crowd meant what they said, Mr. Gregg will easily get the 60 votes he needs to overcome a filibuster. Yet so far not a single Democrat has publicly supported the measure."

WPost Urges Democrats To Support Full House Representation For DC. The Washington Post (1/24, A22, 690K) writes in an editorial, "An early test of the courage and leadership of the new Democratic-controlled Congress will come on the question of extending full voting rights in the House of Representatives to the District of Columbia." The Post urges Democrats to support "a bipartisan measure co-sponsored by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and D.C. Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D)" that "would add two full-voting seats to Congress -- one for the mostly Democratic District and one for mostly Republican Utah." So "why is the Democratic leadership dithering?"

NYTimes Calls For Reform Of Drug-Manufacturing Loophole. The New York Times (1/24, 1.16M) editorializes, "Two excessively lenient court decisions have allowed the manufacturers of brand-name drugs to resume the underhanded practice of paying generic competitors to keep their drugs off the market. It is a costly legal loophole that needs to be plugged by Congressional legislation. … The Federal Trade Commission, which has been waging a valiant fight, succeeded for several years in eliminating such settlements. But two appeals court decisions in 2005 held that they are a legitimate way to resolve patent disputes. And sure enough, the F.T.C. reported last week that — after a five-year hiatus — brand-name companies made 3 such do-not-compete settlements in fiscal year 2005 and 14 more last year."

NBC Nightly News (1/23, story 11, :15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street, those energy stocks were up on that news, which pushed the Dow higher by almost 57 points [to close at 12,533.80]. NASDAQ at the end of the day up less than 1 point [to close at 2,431.41]."

Tennessee High Court Rules Against US Foster Parents. The Washington Post (1/24, A3, Jones) reports, "The Tennessee Supreme Court ruled yesterday that a 7-year-old girl raised by an American couple since infancy must be returned to her Chinese parents, who say they never intended to give her up for adoption." The Post continues, "Shaoqiang He, a 42-year-old restaurant manager in Memphis, said he will probably return to China with his family after a transition period for Anna Mae He. She turns 8 on Sunday and has spent all but the first three weeks of her life with foster parents Jerry and Louise Baker. … 'We have a big bedroom for her in our apartment, and we're going to buy clothing and furniture for her,' He said in the telephone interview. 'She knows by her face that she is Chinese, and she must be asking the Bakers, "Where is my mom? Where is my dad?"' … Neither the Bakers nor their attorneys could be reached for comment. The Bakers have the option of appealing on the federal-court level. Tuesday's ruling set no timetable or conditions for Anna's return, leaving that for a lower court to iron out."

USA Today (1/24, 6D, Davis) reports, "The court ordered the Juvenile Court of Shelby County to reunite the child with her parents, who have been aided by pro bono lawyers. Psychologists will help her make the transition, lawyers say." USA continues, "The custody fight, which made headlines around the world, pitted the Hes against Jerry and Louise Baker of Cordova, Tenn. The Bakers took Anna Mae in soon after she was born at the Hes' request as they struggled with legal, financial and health problems. … The Hes have insisted they never intended to permanently relinquish custody. But the Bakers have long wanted to legally adopt Anna Mae and originally accused the Hes of abandoning the child. They have maintained that she would have a better life with them." USA adds, "The Hes had visited Anna Mae for a time, but things came to a head on her second birthday, on Jan. 28, 2001, when Casey refused to leave without her daughter. The Bakers called the police and five months later petitioned a court to revoke the Hes' parental rights. .. In its ruling Tuesday, the court said that 'the evidence overwhelmingly shows that the parents' voluntary relinquishment of custody was entered as a temporary measure to provide health insurance.'"

Jennings Receives Help From Democrats In Challenge To FL13 Election. The Miami Herald (1/24, Clark, 286K) reports 2006 FL13 Democratic candidate Christine Jennings, who is contesting the election, "wasn't able to line up and shake President Bush's hand when he walked down the House aisle Tuesday night to deliver his State of the Union address, but she did get a chance to make her point." She "sat in the House gallery to the president's right -- a symbol of the fact Democrats are not relinquishing dibs on the seat -- despite the presence of Rep. Vern Buchanan, R-Sarasota, who, as a member of Congress, got a seat on the floor." She "remains a favorite on Capitol Hill. She attended a breakfast Tuesday for new Democratic members of Congress and spent some of the day working the phones at the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, which helped her set up a fundraising account for the election challenge." Jennings "said she was warmly greeted at the breakfast and encouraged to keep waging the battle. One member, she noted, has received more than 100 letters from constituents alarmed about the lack of paper ballots for voting machines."

Obama Refusing Donations From Registered Lobbyists. Roll Call's "K Street Files" (1/24, Ackley) reports, "Any penny-pinching lobbyists looking to save a few thousand dollars in the sure-to-break-records 2008 presidential race have the perfect candidate to throw their theoretical support behind: Sen. Barack Obama. Not only has Obama's presidential exploratory committee said it will refuse all donations from political action committees, but it also is barring cash from registered federal lobbyists. Word has just started to spread among K Street's Democrats that when it comes to the candidate's coffers, they're off the hook." An unidentified lobbyist "said Obama can likely succeed in raising the $50 million he'll need to be competitive in early primaries through online donations and grass-roots support from beyond the Beltway, other Democratic contenders such as Sens. Chris Dodd (Conn.) and Joseph Biden (Del.) would find that banning lobbyists' contributions 'could potentially affect their ability to remain competitive' since both have large donor networks in the advocacy world. The party's frontrunner, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) will cash lobbyists' campaign donations, too. But former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) won't. "

Watergate Burglar Hunt Dies. The AP (1/24, Reynolds) reports E. Howard Hunt, "who helped organize the Watergate break-in, leading to the greatest scandal in American political history and the downfall of Richard Nixon's presidency, died Tuesday. He was 88." Hunt was "many things: World War II soldier, CIA officer, organizer of both a Guatemalan coup and the botched Bay of Pigs invasion, and author of more than 80 books, many from the spy-tale genre. Yet the bulk of his notoriety came from the one thing he always insisted he wasn't — a Watergate burglar. He often said he preferred the term 'Watergate conspirator.'"

The Washington Post (1/24, A1, Sullivan, 690K) reports on its front page that Hunt, "the shadowy former CIA man who organized the Watergate break-in and other 'dirty tricks' that ultimately brought down the presidency of Richard M. Nixon, died of complications from pneumonia yesterday at a hospital in Miami." Hunt "spent 33 months in prison for his role in the Watergate burglary. He was bitter that Nixon did not stand up for him. President Ronald Reagan rejected a pardon request for Hunt in 1983."

Conservatives Said To Have More Optimistic View Of Economy. Arthur C. Brooks, professor of public administration at Syracuse University's Maxwell School of Public Affairs and author of "Who Really Cares: The Surprising Truth About Compassionate Conservatism" (Basic Books, 2006), writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/24, A13, 2.04M), "Conservatives are relatively untroubled by inequality, and unsupportive of government income redistribution, because they believe the American economy provides private opportunities to succeed. Liberals are far more pessimistic than conservatives about the possibility of a better future for Americans of modest means." So "conservatives' lack of anxiety about income inequality -- and perhaps even their opposition to redistributive government policies -- is evidence of a light heart, not a hard one."

NYTimes Critical Of Schumer-Bloomberg Report Calling For "Looser Regulations." The New York Times (1/24, 1.16M) writes in an editorial, "A healthy financial sector is crucial to the economic well-being of this country and to New York City in particular" but "beware of the doomsayers who argue that American markets are in free fall and…contend that looser regulations are the only way to save them." The paper is critical of a report by New York Sen. Charles Schumer (D) and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg (R) which "seems to cull facts to prove predetermined conclusions." The Times favors "loosening restrictions on work visas for talented foreigners" and "efforts under way to reduce the costs associated with complying with Sarbanes-Oxley regulations" but it concludes, "financial firms might take a look in the mirror and ask whether lower underwriting fees and smaller bonuses could also contribute to their long-term health and the health of America's financial markets."

Petraeus Expresses Confidence In Bush's Plan For Iraq. The CBS Evening News (1/23, story 3, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, "the man chosen to command what may well be the last chance to salvage victory in Iraq had this stark warning of what to expect from the troop surge ordered by President Bush." Petraeus was shown testifying that "the way ahead will be neither quick nor easy, and there undoubtedly will be tough days." CBS went on to report, "Famous for challenging 20-year-old soldiers to push-up contests and winning, Petraeus has a near-perfect resume for the job. … Petraeus seems certain to be confirmed as the next commander in Iraq. But his chances of success are anything but certain." NBC Nightly News (1/23, story 3, , Williams, 9.87M) reported Petraeus "insisted the mission to stem the violence in Baghdad can and must succeed. … But even by his own numbers, the current plan comes up short. Petraeus himself wrote the Army's new doctrine on counter-insurgency, which suggests it would take 120,000 US and Iraqi troops to secure Baghdad, but Petraeus will have only 85,000 combined forces."

The AP (1/24, Burns) reports Petraeus "cautioned…against expecting quick results and used bleak terms to describe a country engulfed in war for nearly four years. Yet, he said the strategy can work as long as the Iraqis do their part." The New York Times (1/24, Gordon, 1.16M) adds that Petraeus contended "the new military strategy to secure Baghdad can work, and that he had asked that the additional troops the administration promised be deployed as quickly as possible. He asserted that the 'persistent presence' of American and Iraqi forces in strife-ridden Baghdad neighborhoods was a necessary step, but also cautioned that the mission would not succeed if the Iraqi government did not carry out its program of political reconciliation." ABC World News (1/23, story 3, :35, Gibson, 8.78M) noted Petraeus "warned it will take months to know if the mission is successful."

According to the Washington Post (1/24, A10, Tyson, 690K) Petraeus "voiced confidence…in a new approach that would shift the focus to protecting the population by pushing tens of thousands of additional U.S. and Iraqi troops deep into Baghdad neighborhoods, one aimed at allowing Iraq's government to 'come to grips with' what he called an 'exceedingly difficult situation.'" Petraeus "promised simply to provide 'the best leadership and direction I can muster' and 'forthright' military advice, even if he concludes the mission is lost. 'Should I determine that the new strategy cannot succeed, I will provide such an assessment,' he said, reassuring senator after senator that he would speak up if he believed U.S. civilian leaders were making false statements about Iraq." Sen. Bill Nelson "asked if Petraeus had a 'high degree of confidence' that the new plan would work. 'I believe this plan can succeed if in fact all of those enablers and all the rest of the assistance is provided,' Petraeus said, adding that interagency help for the war effort 'needs to be substantially more robust than it is.'" The Christian Science Monitor (1/24, Grier, 59K) contends Petraeus "was bluntly critical about the current situation in Iraq –perhaps more so than any Bush administration or military witness, ever."

Petraeus Peppered With Questions On Anti-Surge Resolutions. The AP (1/24, Burns) reports that though Petraeus "was warmly received by members of the panel, the war he will help lead -- and Bush's plan to prevail in it -- faced a rougher reception." The Los Angeles Times (1/24, Barnes, 850K) reports Petraeus admitted the situation in Iraq is "dire" and predicted "tough days" ahead, but "he pleaded for time to begin executing a new strategy." The Times characterizes Petraeus as "forthcoming and occasionally blunt" and goes on to point out that "throughout his hearing, Petraeus appeared assured and confident, answering questions crisply and directly." Asked by Sen. Joe Lieberman if "passage of a resolution denouncing the new Bush strategy would show the enemy that the American people are divided, Petraeus answered yes, it would. After other senators -- both Republicans and Democrats -- objected, Petraeus backed away." When Sen. John Thune "tried to get him to take another swipe at the resolution, Petraeus became more diplomatic. 'Learning that mine fields are best avoided and gone around rather than walked through on some occasions, I'd like to leave that one there, senator,' Petraeus said."

The Washington Times (1/24, Scarborough, 88K), in an article titled, "Anti-surge Efforts Called Enemy Hope," reports Petraeus testified that "pending Senate resolutions against a surge…give the enemy hope by depicting America as divided on winning the war." The Hill (1/24, Tiron) reports that "in a rare move for a uniformed officer…Petraeus, considered a shoo-in to become America's next top commander in Iraq, jumped into the political fray of his nomination hearing. … Petraeus spoke out against congressional attempts to pass resolutions of disapproval on the new White House strategy in Iraq." The New York Times (1/24, Gordon, 1.16M) add that Sen. John Warner, "who is promoting a resolution opposing Mr. Bush's troop reinforcement plan, cautioned General Petraeus to be sure that 'this colloquy has not entrapped you into some responses that you might later regret.'" Sen. Carl Levin, chairman of the panel, "said later that he was satisfied that the general had not intended to involve himself in the debate." The Times adds that the "exchanges at the hearing did not appear to have any ill effect on the prospects for the confirmation of General Petraeus." Sen. John McCain "said he hoped the commander would 'catch the next flight' to Iraq after winning Senate confirmation." The Washington Post (1/24, A21, Ricks, 690K) runs a separate piece on the exchange between Warner and Petraeus, noting Warner "explained to the general that he needed to be more careful about appearing to wade into a political debate and warned Petraeus to not let himself be trapped into portraying members of Congress as unpatriotic for disagreeing with President Bush:"

USA Today (1/24, Brook, 2.27M) reports that during the hearing Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "said Bush's plan 'inspires skepticism for good reason.' She accused former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld of refusing to adapt to increasing violence in Iraq and the previous Republican-led Congress for failing to challenge the administration's strategy there. She said she disapproved of the plan and called it a 'dead end.'" Sen. McCain "also criticized the administration's approach in Iraq. 'We've made many, many mistakes in this war,' McCain said. Among them, he said, were sending too few troops for the initial invasion in March 2003 and not responding to the 'hostile actions' of Iraqi religious sects." The Politico (1/24) reports Sen. Susan Collins "told Petraeus…that she wished success for the surge strategy -- and its other economic and political components -- and seemed to express hope that her resolution wouldn't be needed. 'Nothing divides us in our common support that we hope we're wrong,' she admitted, 'and that this strategy is a success.'"

The Financial Times (1/24, Sevastopulo) says, "Appearing more confident before the committee than Gen George Casey, the outgoing commander, Gen Petraeus waded into the political debate by agreeing…that congressional resolutions of opposition would send the wrong message to US troops and the enemy in Iraq." Sen. Lindsey Graham is quoted as saying, "No matter how well-intentioned, a resolution…opposed to this new strategy is a vote of no confidence. … Those people going to fight this war are going to say, well, I'm going, but the Congress says good luck, but you're going to lose."

Senators Said To Have Extended An Extraordinarily Warm Welcome To Petraeus. The Washington Post's David Ignatius (1/24, A23) writes that though "fundamentals on the ground appear as bleak as ever, and polls show the public doubts the war is winnable. But Petraeus offers something new: He is the last frail hope for a bipartisan consensus on Iraq. Petraeus won plaudits yesterday from nearly every member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, continuing the celebratory tone that greeted his nomination by President Bush. Even Sen. Edward Kennedy, one of the sharpest critics of the war, had good things to say about the new commander."

The New York Times' Maureen Dowd (1/24) writes "senators happily blew a chance to grill…Petraeus, W.'s choice to try to rescue Iraq, on whether those 21,500 additional troops will be cavalry to the rescue or lambs to the slaughter. Why dwell on the most consequential elements of American strategy when they can linger over something even more repercussive: their own political reputations?"

Senate Democrats Advocate Merging Anti-Surge Resolutions. The New York Times (1/24, Hulse, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports, "As they prepared for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to consider the issue on Wednesday, both Democrats and Republicans said the two bipartisan resolutions were in fundamental agreement on objecting to the troop increase. 'The resolutions are so close in terms of the key issue: whether or not we support an increase in military involvement and increasing the number of troops in Iraq or not,' said Senator Carl Levin…a co-author of one proposal. 'There are other language issues, obviously, but they are not particularly significant. The likeness and the similarities far, far, far outweigh any language differences.'" Majority leader Sen. Harry Reid "said a hybrid version of the resolutions would produce a clearer sign of the depth of opposition to the president's plan than either of the proposals could individually." However, Sen. John Warner, "lead author of the other proposal, said he saw important distinctions between them. He said he was not prepared to enter any negotiations until after he saw wording approved by the Foreign Relations Committee." The Times notes that the proposal from Mr. Warner, and Sens Susan Collins and Ben Nelson, "declares that the president is the commander in chief and that it is not the Senate's intent to contravene his authority — wording that drew the attention of some lawmakers."

The Hill (1/24, Schor) reports Senate Democrats "worked to bridge the gap between the chamber's two resolutions…although the stronger language of Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) will form the basis of that panel's markup today. Ongoing negotiations are intended to combine Biden's measure, cosponsored by Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and GOP Sens. Olympia Snowe (Maine) and Chuck Hagel (Neb.), with a less critical resolution released this week by Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and three senior Republicans, all up for reelection in 2008."

Biden, Hagel Outline Alternative To Bush's Strategy. In an op-ed for the USA Today (1/24, 13A, 2.27M) Sens. Joseph Biden and Chuck Hagel write, "We agree with the president that our previous strategy in Iraq was failing. Equally, we are convinced that to succeed in Iraq, America's objective and strategy must enjoy the support of the American people and a bipartisan support in Congress. … The primary objective of America's strategy should be to help Iraqis achieve a political settlement in Iraq, secure support for that settlement from Iraq's neighbors and refocus the mission of our remaining troops on achievable objectives."

McCain Lashes Out At Cheney, Pentagon's "Bureaucratic Resistance" To Surge. In a piece from The Politico (1/23, Simon) that reverberated through the blogosphere yesterday, Sen. John McCain "blamed Vice President Cheney for what McCain calls the 'witch's brew' of a 'terribly mishandled' war in which U.S. forces are on the verge of defeat. … Although McCain had once lavished praise on the vice president, he said in an interview in his Senate office: 'The president listened too much to the Vice President…of course, the president bears the ultimate responsibility, but he was very badly served by both the Vice President and, most of all, the Secretary of Defense.' McCain added: 'Rumsfeld will go down in history, along with McNamara, as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history.'" According to The Politico, McCain "is making clear his frustrations with the Bush administration, the Iraqi military and 'bureaucratic resistance' in the Pentagon to a troop surge. … He said, 'There is still enormous bureaucratic resistance (to the troop surge) in the Pentagon, and it bothers me a great deal. The bureaucrats in the military are saying this is a terrible strain on the (National) Guard and the active duty forces, and it is. There is only one thing worse than an over-stressed military, and that's a defeated military. And we are on the verge of that.'"

Sen. Trent Lott, appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (1/23) told host Chris Matthews that he is backing Sen. John McCain's presidential bid, but he acknowledged being surprised by McCain's criticism of Vice president Cheney in yesterday's Politico. Lott added, "we all say things sometimes that maybe went a little further than we would want to, in retrospect. … I know he's unhappy that we should have done a surge or increase in numbers earlier. He's made that clear for three years.

Gingrich Accuses Bush Of Basing Iraq Policy On "Inherent Contradiction." Fox News' Special Report (1/23, Hume) reported former House Speaker Newt Gingrich "blasted the White House for basing its new Iraq policy on what he called an 'inherent contradiction.' Gingrich: "If Iraq is genuinely a matter of vital national interest, then, as Americans, we have an obligation to do what it takes to win. If Iraq is so unimportant that it is up to a new, relatively incompetent Iraqi government, then why are we risking a single young American? They cannot both be true."

US Officials Confirm Fewer Bodies Have Been Found Around Baghdad Recently. The Los Angeles Times (1/24, Daragahi, 850K) reports, "Iraqi authorities found 19 bodies of young men scattered around Baghdad on Tuesday, a sharp drop from the scores found each day several weeks ago. The reported daily body count for the last week or so has hovered around 30 or lower. The bodies of late also have not shown signs of torture often associated with Shiite Muslim militias, morgue and hospital officials say. Officials cautioned that the casualty figures were preliminary and sketchy. Previous drops in Baghdad violence have been followed by upsurges. … U.S. military officials in the capital's tumultuous northern district of Adhamiya confirmed the statistical drop shown in morgue and police casualty figures collected daily by the Los Angeles Times." The Times adds, "Some observers speculated that the drop in the number of bodies bearing marks of torture indicated a decline in Shiite militia activity."

US Cracks Down On Shia Militants. The Financial Times (1/24, Negus) reports, "More than 600 members of Iraq's Mahdi Army are in detention awaiting prosecution, the US military announced in a statement late on Monday – the latest indication that operations against the radical Shia militia have been stepped up and that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has withdrawn political protection from the group. The statement is unusual in that it detailed the number of operations against specific organisations and seems intended to show that there is a new emphasis on neutralising the Mahdi Army." Maliki "may have decided that he needed to move against the militia to avoid losing US support and to avoid further alienating Iraq's Sunni Arab neighbours, or because he feels that his support among the Shia has been strengthened after the execution of Saddam Hussein." The FT continues, "The Sadrists' apparent acquiescence to the dismantling of their military wing however might not last, if Sunni insurgents succeed in striking at Shia civilian targets."

Baghdad Bombing Wave Tied To US Troop Increase. The Christian Science Monitor (1/24, Grier, 59K) reports, "Sectarian violence in Iraq's capital has spiked in recent days, even as the first US and Iraqi government military reinforcements have deployed into the embattled city. The car bombs that racked Baghdad Monday may not have been a response to the presence of new troops, strictly speaking. But if nothing else, they emphasize the chaos into which the city has sunk, and the prospect that the new US and Iraqi troops may be at just the beginning of what promises to be a difficult and protracted counterinsurgency campaign."

Five Americans Killed After Insurgents Fire On Their Helicopters. ABC World News (1/23, story 4, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "And a helicopter, owned by the private security firm, Blackwater USA, crashed in central Iraq. Five civilians were killed. A senior Iraqi defense official said the aircraft was shot down over a predominately Sunni neighborhood. And an insurgent group did claim responsibility." NBC Nightly News (1/23, story 4, :30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, There are conflicting reports tonight from the US military in Iraq and here in Washington about whether or not that chopper had been shot down."

The New York Times (1/24, Santora, Glanz, 1.16M) reports several helicopters "came under attack, and one plummeted to the pavement through a tangle of electrical wires in one of Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods. The four-man crew in one helicopter was killed, and the gunner in a second helicopter apparently died when he was struck by gunfire, American officials said. The crash set off a chaotic five-hour battle in which American attack helicopters crisscrossed the skies over Baghdad and fired at least one Hellfire missile into the streets below. It is unclear if the first helicopter, nicknamed a Little Bird because it is small and nimble, crashed as the result of gunfire, because it got tangled in the wires or as it was trying to land because a passenger was wounded. But an American military official said that at least four of the victims had suffered gunshot wounds to the head, raising the prospect that some of them had been shot on the ground."

The Washington Post (1/24, A10, Londono, Partlow, Deyoung, 690K) reports, "The helicopter crashed after being 'riddled with small-arms fire,' a State Department official said. The official said it was unclear whether the men aboard died from gunfire or from the impact of the crash. No State Department employees were hurt in the attack, but some vehicles were destroyed, according to the summary of events in the report. Other vehicles in the convoy returned safely to the Green Zone. Two separate Sunni insurgent groups, Ansar al-Sunnah and the Islamic Army in Iraq, asserted responsibility for the attacks on Web sites used by the groups. The accounts differ in significant detail, although Ansar published photos of what it said were the U.S. Embassy badge, credit cards and dog tags of one of the men killed in the attack."

ABC Crew Witnesses IED Blast. ABC World News (1/23, story 5, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "We had a very stark reminder today of the dangers that American soldiers face on a daily basis in Iraq. It occurred as ABC's Chris Cuomo and his camera man, Bartley Price, traveled with an American patrol in one of the most dangerous neighborhoods." ABC added, "This is what soldiers refer to as a routine patrol in Iraq. Ghazaliya, in northwest Baghdad. ... Suddenly, a deafening blast. The bodies were booby-trapped. The blast cripples two Humvees. Blowing out their tires. ... The gunner spits out glass but never misses a beat. Bullets fly, but the patrol recovers quickly, making it back to the Iraqi police station."

Medical Care For Wounded Troops In Iraq Described. NBC Nightly News (1/23, story 5, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported its chief science correspondent Robert Bazell "has traveled to the US Army's 28th Combat Support hospital in Baghdad's Green Zone, where he has seen the extraordinary work of some extraordinary doctors and nurses."

Friedman Deplores Muslim World's Indifference To Mass Killing In Iraq. The New York Times' Thomas Friedman (1/24) writes, "It's hard to know what's more disturbing: the barbaric sectarian murders by Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq, or the deafening silence with which these mass murders are received in the Muslim world. How could it be that Danish cartoons of Muhammad led to mass violent protests, while unspeakable violence by Muslims against Muslims in Iraq every day evokes about as much reaction in the Arab-Muslim world as the weather report? … Without a Muslim counternihilism strategy that delegitimizes the mass murder of Muslims by Muslims, there is no hope for decent politics there."

Maliki's Capacity To Rise Above Sectarian Divisions Questioned. USA Today (1/24, 1A, Jervis, 2.27M), in a front-page story titled, "Can Al-Maliki Make The Bush Plan For Iraq Work?: Critics ask whether prime minister will go after Shiite militias," reports, "For most of his life, Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite Arab, says he has been persecuted and hunted by the Sunnis who dominated the government of Saddam Hussein. Now, as Iraq's prime minister, al-Maliki must make peace between the two bitterly divided Muslim factions. President Bush has said that al-Maliki's ability to do that, and to shift responsibility from U.S. forces to Iraq's military and police, may determine the nation's fate." USA Today goes on to report, "Al-Maliki's critics accuse him of protecting Shiite allies with blood on their hands. Since taking office last May, al-Maliki has blocked several attempts by U.S. and Iraqi troops to confront the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia group led by one of al-Maliki's key political supporters, the rebel cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Al-Maliki's 'personality and background make reconciliation impossible,' says Saleh al-Mutlaq, a leading Sunni politician."

Draft National Intelligence Estimate Finds Maliki Faces Long Odds. The Washington Post (1/24, A4, Pincus, 690K) reports the draft of a new National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq "says it will be 'very difficult' but 'not impossible'" for the Maliki government "to succeed in providing better governance," said Thomas Fingar, the deputy director of national intelligence for analysis and chairman of the National Intelligence Council. Fingar gave the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence "a rare preview of what the classified National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) will say when it is completed at the end of the month. 'Gains in stability could open a window for gains in reconciliation among and between sectarian groups and could open the possibilities for a moderate coalition that could permit better government,' Fingar said, but "it will be very difficult for the Maliki government to do this."

Prolonged Absence Of Most MPs Cripples Iraq's Parliament. The New York Times (1/24, Cave,

1.16M) reports Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, the speaker of Parliament, "read a roll call of the 275 elected members with a goal of shaming the no-shows. Ayad Allawi, the former prime minister? Absent, living in Amman and London. Adnan Pachachi, the octogenarian statesman? Also gone, in Abu Dhabi. Others who failed to appear Monday included Saleh Mutlak, a senior Sunni legislator; several Shiites and Kurds; and Ayad al-Samaraei, chairman of the finance committee, whose absence led Mr. Mashhadani to ask: 'When will he be back? After we approve the budget?'" According to the Times, "Parliament in recent months has been at a standstill. Nearly every session since November has been adjourned because as few as 65 members made it to work, even as they and the absentees earned salaries and benefits worth about $120,000. Part of the problem is security, but Iraqi officials also said they feared that members were losing confidence in the institution and in the country's fragile democracy."

Security Concerns And Debate Over Revenue Hold Up Iraq Oil Projects. The Washington Post (1/24, D1, Mufson, 690K) reports, "Four months ago, about 80 oil company executives and consultants packed an office on St. James's Square in London for a briefing on exploration prospects in Iraq's Kurdish region and a Kurdish draft of an Iraqi national petroleum law. Despite the immense risks of working in Iraq -- pipeline explosions, kidnappings, insurgency, political infighting -- the oil company executives were lured by the potential rewards, which are immense, too. Outside Saudi Arabia, no country has proven oil reserves as big as Iraq's." However, "Four months after the London meeting, however, security remains elusive and so does the national petroleum law. Barham Saleh, Iraq's deputy prime minister, said in a recent telephone interview that a compromise was 'very, very close.' The proposed law has taken on significance beyond oil. While Iraq and foreign oil companies are eager to tap new revenue, the Bush administration and many Iraqis also hope that the law can be a model for resolving disputes and can bind Iraq's warring factions together."

Suicide Bomber Kills Eight Outside Of NATO Base In Afghanistan. The New York Times (1/24, Wafa, 1.16M) reports, "A suicide bomber wearing an explosive vest blew himself up Tuesday at the entrance to a NATO base in the southeastern province of Khost, killing 8 to 10 people, officials said. The attack occurred as Afghan laborers were lining up for security checks at the pedestrian entrance of the base known as Camp Salerno. The bomber was trying to enter the base, NATO said, but detonated the vest when he reached the search point."

General Says Larger Army Would Cost $70 Billion. The AP (1/23, Jelinek) reports, "Increasing the size of the Army, strained by America's two ongoing wars, will cost an estimated $70 billion, a top Army general said Tuesday. And if yet another conflict were to develop before the force can be bolstered, it would take longer to fight and cost more American casualties than otherwise might be expected, said Lt. Gen. Stephen Speakes, a deputy chief of staff. ... Speakes said the $70 billion figure includes everything — from equipment to pay to health benefits. No figure was immediately available for the increase in the Marine Corps." More than 70 sites carried this story.

Lack Of Medal Of Honor Winners Attributed To Pentagon's Quest For Accuracy. NBC Nightly News (1/23, story 7, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported that "the highest honor this nation can bestow on those who wear the uniform" is the Medal of Honor. However, "It's so far been awarded to two heroes of the Iraq war and in both cases, after their deaths. ... Why have there been so few of them awarded in our current wars when compared to past conflicts?" NBC added, "Former Marine Joseph Kinney told the Congressional committee it's shameful the war on terror has seen so few awards for valor including only two posthumous Medals of Honor when Vietnam produced 245 and World War II, 464. ... In the wake of too hasty official stories about Jessica Lynch and Pat Tillman, Marine General Richard Mills told that same committee, accuracy is our number-one priority as opposed to timeliness."

US Launches 2nd Airstrike As Ethiopian Troops Begin Withdrawal From Somalia. The CBS Evening News (1/23, story 4, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "US Special Forces have once again attacked terrorist targets in Somalia. CBS News has learned they conducted their second air strike in two weeks. The US is targeting three Al Qaeda operatives wanted for the bombing of two US Embassies in Africa in 1998."

The Washington Post (1/24, A9, Deyoung, McCrummen, 690K) reports, "A US Air Force AC-130 gunship staged an airstrike against suspected al-Qaeda operatives in southern Somalia on Monday," US officials said Tuesday. There was no immediate information on specific targets or the strike's results. News of the new attack came the same day Ethiopian troops began "a withdrawal from a fragile capital that many residents fear will now slip further into chaos." A spokesman for Somalia's transitional government, Abdirahman Dinari, said that the Ethiopians "may take several weeks to complete a full withdrawal from the country and that a large force would remain on the Ethiopian side of the Somalia-Ethiopia border."

The New York Times (1/24, Gettleman, 1.16M) adds, "Many Somalis say they now fear that a power vacuum will form and that the country will slip back into the lawlessness that has dominated it for much of the past 16 years." Although several African countries have" mused about sending peacekeepers to help quell Somalia's volatile mix of warring clans, well-armed thugs and now a growing insurgency, a comprehensive peacekeeping force may be months away."

The AP (1/24, Duhul) reports Ambassador Michael Ranneberger in Nairobi plans to meet with Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, an Islamic militant who surrender earlier this week, to "urge Sheik Sharif to counsel his supporters not to carry out violence and to support the development of an inclusive government," the US Embassy said.

China Breaks Silence Over Missile Test. The Washington Post (1/24, A8, Cody, 690K) reports, "Breaking 12 days of silence, China confirmed Tuesday that it had fired a guided missile into space to destroy one of its satellites in a test that generated protests from the United States and other nations." Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao "said the United States and other governments have now been informed about the secret test through diplomatic channels." Speaking to reporters, Liu said, "I should stress at this time that the test was not targeted against any country and does not pose a threat to any country." He also noted that he knew of no plans for another such test by the Chinese military.

The Wall Street Journal (1/24, A5, Dean, 2.04M) says that despite breaking "its public silence" about the test, China's "lack of openness has damaged its efforts to polish its international image, analysts said." Liu, it writes, "confirmed that the test] had occurred -- but offered no additional detail or explanation." Similarly, the Financial Times (1/24, Dickie, Nakamoto, Hille) notes that "even as Mr Liu insisted that Beijing's opposition to any space arms race remained undimmed, his refusal to shed any further light on the test or his government's intentions offered ready ammunition to those who say China's military policy is all about concealment."

The New York Times (1/24, Kahn, 1.16M) reports, "Senior Bush administration officials raised the possibility that the silence might have reflected the autonomy and isolation of the Chinese military. They said they could not be sure that President Hu Jintao, who oversees the military as well as the Communist Party, had personally authorized or overseen the test."

The Washington Times (1/24, A1, Gertz, 88K) notes the Jan. 11 test "also alarmed military and defense officials because it undermined American intelligence estimates that China's military trails the US military in terms of weapons and war-fighting capabilities by 10 years."

LATimes Calls On US Government To Contemplate Space Weapons Treaty. The Los Angeles Times (1/24, 850K) editorializes, "a ban on all weapons in space that could be enforced, while desirable, may be as utopian as some science fiction scenarios. Official U.S. space policy instructs the Pentagon 'to ensure freedom of action in space and, if directed, deny such freedom of action to adversaries.' The Chinese test, as well as other technological developments, suggest that a rethinking of this position is in order." The editorial adds, "It is in the U.S. interest to work to keep space clean and safe. It will be difficult to design, negotiate, verify and enforce international agreements that both protect U.S. and global security concerns and prevent the weaponization of space. But the Chinese test demonstrates the futility — and danger — of refusing to try."

China Reduces Fines For Violations Of One-Child Policy. The Washington Post (1/24, A7, Fan, 690K) reports, "Fines imposed on Chinese who violate the country's one-child-only policy may be reduced for the poor, a top family planning official said Tuesday, as authorities stressed a broader approach to population management." The announcement came a day after state media reported that "many Chinese believe it is unfair that the wealthy can 'buy' a second child by simply paying fines for breaking the one-child-only rule for most urban couples." The announcement "appeared to be part of a broader attempt by officials to put a more human face on China's much-maligned family planning policies."

Ban To Press Sudan On Darfur. The AP (1/24, Bergman) reports U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon "will pressure Sudan's president next week to speed up the peace process in Darfur, which has been delayed by months of wrangling over the makeup of a larger peacekeeping force," U.N. officials said Tuesday. On his first overseas trip as head of the world body, Ban will meet with Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir on the sidelines of an African Union summit in Ethiopia. Their meeting "could be crucial to pushing through a three-phase U.N. plan to beef up the 7,000-member AU force that is struggling to maintain peace in the vast desert region."

US Condemns Assault Of UN Staff, Aid Workers. AFP (1/24) reports Washington "condemned the Sudanese government's arrest and subsequent assault of 20 staff from the U.N., African Union and non-governmental organizations in strife-torn Darfur." On Friday, Sudanese police raided the International Non Governmental Organization (INGO) compound in Nyala, southern Darfur, arresting 20 U.N. staff members and aid workers. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in a statement the US "condemns" their arrest and said, "There is no justification for these appalling recent attacks on humanitarian aid workers."

Protests In Lebanon Raise Fears Of Sectarian Conflict. The Financial Times (1/24, England) reports supporters of Hezbollah and its Christian allies "paralyzed Lebanon on Tuesday as they dramatically escalated their campaign to overthrow the government, blocking highways with burning cars and tires and triggering clashes that killed three people and injured dozens." The protests, called "a conspicuous show of strength by the opposition," took place in "most parts of the country and ramped up a political confrontation between the Shia militant group and its allies and the pro-western government." As a result of the demonstrations, Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, "cancelled a planned flight to Paris, where the government is to present an economic reform package at a donor conference on Thursday."

The New York Times (1/24, Bakri, Fattah, 1.16M) says the protests raised "fears that the political crisis might lead to open sectarian conflict." Police said "at least three people died and 100 more were wounded throughout the country in the violence, the worst since Hezbollah began demanding more political power late last year." Similarly, the Washington Post (1/24, A6, Shadid, 690K) reports, "There is a certain cynicism among many Lebanese that the deadlock will be broken only with more bloodshed, forcing a compromise short of civil war." The Posts says that "by any standard, Tuesday's campaign was a feat of logistics on parallel with December's protests. In addition to shutting down the capital, the vital thoroughfare to the Syrian capital, Damascus, was cut, and allied groups blocked roads in predominantly Sunni Muslim areas such as Tripoli and Akkar."

The Washington Times/AP (1/24, Karam) says the protests "gave a frightening glimpse of how quickly the confrontation…could spiral out of control, enflame tensions among Sunnis, Shiites and Christians and throw Lebanon into deeper turmoil."

The Los Angeles Times (1/24, Stack, 850K) says the "swift seizure of the country's roads took many here by surprise, and marked a major escalation in the militant group Hezbollah's campaign to overthrow Lebanon's US-backed government." The Christian Science Monitor (1/24, Peterson, 59K) also says the Hezbollah-led opposition "sharply escalated its campaign to topple the Western-backed government with a nationwide general strike."

Kamen Notes Errors Made By Rice During Exchanges With Reporters. The Washington Post's (1/24, A21) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's trip last week to the Middle East "produced some odd moments." For example, in London, Rice chatted with reporters, explaining how "the removal of Saddam Hussein set in motion a number of other circumstances, other changes in the Middle East: the removal of an eastern-front threat for Israel, for instance." Kamen "suggest[s] that perhaps a map of the region be consulted," noting that Iraq "would have had to go through hundreds of miles of desert -- not a lot of ground cover -- or through Damascus -- to get there." Meanwhile, during questions from Barbara Slavin of USA Today about the Mideast peace process, Rice said in 2000 Hamas was "sitting out as a resistance movement." Kamen notes that in "State's 2000 list of terrorist groups and find that, in Section H, Hamas, which now controls the Palestinian legislature, is listed as a terrorist group."

through Israel on the way to New Hampshire this week, seemingly competing to see who could be strongest in defense of the Jewish state." Speaking in person or by video link to the Herzliya security conference outside Tel Aviv earlier this week, the politicians "spelled out tough measures they said were necessary to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons." Stressing the "strong US-Israeli relationship," the candidates "called for the United States to step up sanctions on Iran and leave the possibility of a military attack 'on the table.'" Edwards, the only Democratic candidate to address the conference, "similarly called to toughen sanctions on Iran and hold out the threat of military force, but he broke with the others by suggesting that Washington open a dialogue with Iran."

Ahmadinejad Says US Won't Succeed In Effort Against Nuclear Program. The AP (1/24, Dareini) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Tuesday Washington "had not stepped up its campaign against Tehran, despite the standoff with the West over Iran's defiance of UN demands to halt uranium enrichment." In an interview with Iranian state television, he said, "US rhetoric against Iran has not increased. In 2003, they openly threatened to attack Iran. Now they have indirectly made such threats." Ahmadinejad also "spoke with confidence" over Iran's ability to withstand a strike, saying, "The United States is unable to inflict serious damage on Iran." Also Tuesday, during a meeting Tuesday with Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem, Ahmadinejad accused the US of "stirring up conflict between rival Muslim sects to maintain influence" in the Middle East. "The US intends to cause insecurity and dispute and weaken independent governments in the region to continue with its dominance over the Middle East and achieve its arrogant goals," Ahmadinejad said, according to the state-run Islamic Republic News Agency, or IRNA.

Journalist Says Democracy Key To Withstanding Iran's Influence On Arab States. Michael Young, opinion editor at Lebanon's Daily Star newspaper, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/24, A13, 2.04M) that a "recurrent theme in history, literature and, lately, engagé academics is that of brash Westerners trying to possess the East and failing -- or at best leaving a transitory mark. From Alexander the Great to George W. Bush, few have successfully reshaped the Middle East in their own image." While "Western grand projects frequently succumbed to Middle Eastern intransigence," Young writes, "as Shiite Iran makes a bid for regional hegemony, its leadership should consider that the mostly Sunni Arabs may be as resistant to hubris coming from the East as from the West." Young asserts that "only democracy could prepare Arab states to withstand Iran without recourse to sectarianism. But the Bush administration seems to have abandoned that inventive undertaking for the region."

Israeli President Faces Indictment On Rape Charges. The AP (1/24, Nessman) reports Israeli President Moshe Katsav faced indictment Tuesday on charges of rape and abuse of power "in the most serious accusation against a top Israeli official in the country's history." The allegation that Katsav "used his position as Israel's ceremonial head of state…to force himself on his female employees has left the nation reeling." However, news of the indictment is "only the latest corruption scandal roiling the government, with accusations reaching as high as Prime Minister Ehud Olmert."

Carter Continues To Stand By Controversial Book. The Washington Post (1/24, C1, Powell, 690K) reports former president Jimmy Carter 'flew north to Brandeis University to speak on Tuesday of his hurt at the personal attacks by some American Jews" that followed publication of his latest book, "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid." In an address, Carter said, "This is the first time that I've ever been called a liar and a bigot and an anti-Semite and a coward and a plagiarist." At the same time, he acknowledged that he "did not simply stumble into the title of his new book," rather saying he "chose that title knowing that it would be provocative."

Author Says Syrian-Israeli Peace Accord Could Anger US. Michael B. Oren, author and senior fellow at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, writes in the New York Times (1/24, 1.16M), "Israel's newspapers are rife with reports of a peace agreement secretly forged between Israeli and Syrian negotiators. Though both the Syrian and Israeli governments have denied any involvement in the talks, past experience shows that such disavowals are often the first indication of truth behind the rumors." Oren says there is "nothing new about the details of the purported plan," but "what is new is the Bush administration's apparent opposition to a Syrian-Israeli accord and the possibility that Israel, by seeking peace with one of its Arab neighbors, risks precipitating a crisis with the United States." Oren warns that the "potentially disparate positions of Israel and the United States on the question of peace with Syria could trigger a significant crisis between" Israel and the US. Although Syrian President Bashar Assad "has made no Sadat-like gestures to Israel, and many Israelis agree with Mr. Bush that Syria should not be rewarded for its assistance to terrorism and its denial of Lebanese liberty," Oren says "if trust is established on both sides and the conditions are conducive to peace, a settlement between Syria and Israel may yet be attained -- and a clash between Israel and Washington ignited."

Noriega Set To Be Released In September. The Miami Herald (1/24, Reyes, Weaver, 286K) reports former Panamanian dictator Manuel Antonio Noriega, "imprisoned in South Miami-Dade on drug-trafficking and racketeering convictions since 1990, will be released on Sept. 9 -- due in part to good behavior and other credits." Noriega was "automatically eligible for parole after serving close to two-thirds of his 30-year federal sentence." However, when Noriega "steps out of his specially built, apartment-like cell at the Federal Correctional Institution in Southwest Miami-Dade," he will face charges in Panama and in France.

Lawmakers Urge Easing Of Cuba Embargo. The Financial Times (1/24, Dinmore) reports, "Members of Congress who believe Cuba is making a smooth transition of power said on Tuesday they would propose legislation to ease US embargo and travel restrictions." Missouri Rep. Jo Ann Emerson, who visited the nation last month as part of a congressional delegation, said, "Contrary to the notion that once Fidel Castro was gone there would be uproar and the Americans would come marching in, I didn't sense that at all." Emerson and James McGovern (D-MA) "said the House Cuba working group, equally represented by both parties, was agreed on the need to remove travel restrictions and loosen the embargo."

Russian Court Backs Closing Of Chechen Rights Group. The Washington Post (1/24, A8, Finn, 690K) reports the Russian Supreme Court Tuesday "upheld a lower court ruling that shut down the Russian-Chechen Friendship Society, a Western-funded grass-roots organization that had challenged the Kremlin's interpretation of events in the continuing conflict in Chechnya." The group's leadership called the decision "a chilling example of the government using a recently enacted law on nongovernmental organizations to quash activism that clashes with official policy." Oksana Chelysheva, one of the group's leaders, promised to fight the ruling, taking its case "to the European Court of Human Rights and, possibly, our Constitutional Court."

Breakthrough Unlikely At WTO Talks At Davos. Echoing comments made Tuesday by US trade representative Susan Schwab, the Wall Street Journal (1/24, A7, Miller, 2.04M) reports, "Global trade negotiators hope to restart the Doha round of world trade talks at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, this week, but a return to the bargaining table will likely be more symbol than substance." According to the Journal, the "key players -- the US and the European Union -- remain unwilling to cut farm subsidies enough to satisfy emerging economies like Brazil and India."

Top Administration Officials Absent From This Year's Forum. On the front page of its business section, the New York Times (1/24, C1, Landler, 1.16M) reports the World Economic Forum convenes its annual conference Wednesday minus "Davos regulars like Bill Clinton, as well as marquee names from the Bush administration, which is sending only its trade negotiator, a deputy secretary of the Treasury, and a few other officials." Klaus Schwab, the forum's Swiss organizer, "played down the absence of a top Bush administration official like Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who was invited to speak but could not find time." Davos also says it is "shunning Hollywood celebrities, even though they have lent this sober event a dash of sex appeal."

Head Of Venezuelan TV Station Condemns Closure. Marcel Granier, chairman of Radio Caracas Television, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/24, A12, 2.04M) that Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez's decision to shut down Radio Caracas Television "continues a long series of attacks against journalists, employees, management and shareholders of many independent media companies," the aim of which it "to limit the citizens' right to seek information and entertainment in the media of their choice, to impede public access to those media where they might express or encounter criticism of the government or their proposals for reform, to stifle the pluralism of opinion in news and talk programs, and to cut off the free flow of information and debate in Venezuela." Granier says Chavez's actions "are in violation of the Venezuelan constitution, the American Convention on Human Rights, and the Inter-American Democratic Charter" and represent "a clear example of abuse of power, and violate the right to work of all those in the media industry, not to mention a violation of the freedom of thought and expression of millions of citizens who seek information and ideas of their own free choice."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Judge Denies Bond For Rhode Island Terror Suspect. The Providence Journal (1/24, Ziner, 167K) reports, "Mohammed Yousuf Mullawala, a central figure in a national antiterrorism investigation, admitted lying to Rhode Island state police numerous times about his whereabouts and activities since he arrived in this country in 2002, according to a state police affidavit made public yesterday. Federal Immigration Judge Matthew J. D'Angelo cited those alleged lies and Mullawala's 'evasive and far-fetched explanations' in denying bond yesterday for Mullawala, whom he called a danger to the community and 'an extreme flight risk.'" The Journal notes, "Mullawala's behavior at the Nationwide Tractor-Trailer Driving School, in Smithfield, triggered Homeland Security concerns that have since widened into an investigation by an FBI Joint Terrorism Task Force. According to the school's instructor, that behavior included Mullawala's expressed interest in buying software or videos on hazardous materials and his stated interest in only learning how to drive the truck forward — not how to back it up or any other required technical maneuvers."

Al Arian Begins Hunger Strike Over Contempt Ruling. The Tampa Tribune (1/24, Silvestrini) reports, "Sami Al-Arian has begun another hunger strike after being held in contempt for refusing to testify before a grand jury in Virginia, his supporters say. In the meantime, Al-Arian has appealed an order with the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that says his plea agreement in Tampa does not protect him from having to testify in Virginia." The Tribune notes, "During the trial, the government presented evidence that Al-Arian's think tank, World and Islam Studies Enterprise, received funding from the International Institute of Islamic Thought, based in Herndon, Va. … At the time of the plea agreement, his attorneys stressed Al-Arian would not cooperate with the government. In September, the U.S. attorney's office in the Eastern District of Virginia contacted attorneys for Al-Arian seeking his testimony before a grand jury investigating the institute."

House Democrats To Question Gates On Guantanamo Contractors. The Hill (1/24, Tiron) reports "several" House Democrats intend to "grill" Secretary of Defense Robert Gates on "the Pentagon's use of private contractors in interrogations at the military prison in Guantánamo Bay.' Chief Deputy Democratic Whip Jan Schakowsky and 26 other members "wrote to Gates Tuesday asking for a briefing on interrogation practice after the FBI revealed allegations this month of torture by contractors at Guantánamo.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Judge Mulls CSX Challenge To DC Hazmat Rail Ban. The Washington Post (1/24, B3, Cauvin) reports, "The fate of a District law banning rail shipments of hazardous materials was back before a federal judge yesterday, nearly two years after the prohibition was enacted by the D.C. Council." The Post continues, "The law, which was prompted by fears that the Capitol and other landmarks are vulnerable to a terrorist attack on rail lines that skirt downtown, was quickly challenged in 2005 by CSX Transportation Inc., which controls the key freight routes through the District. The law has never taken effect. Yesterday, a judge heard arguments to determine whether it ever will." The Post adds, "U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan set no timetable for a decision in the case, which is being monitored by cities and states throughout the country. … CSX said that the District is overstepping its legal authority and that the law, if allowed to stand, could lead other local governments to pass similar bans, crippling the transportation of hazardous materials nationwide. … Under federal regulations, rail operators bear much of the responsibility for assessing risks and determining how to deal with them -- an arrangement that critics say puts public safety at the mercy of profit-driven businesses." The Post notes, "After gathering evidence and taking preliminary steps for nearly a year, lawyers for the two sides appeared before Sullivan yesterday for nearly two hours -- on one side, Robert Utiger of the D.C. attorney general's office and James R. Wrathall of WilmerHale for the Sierra Club; on the other, Virginia Seitz of Sidley Austin for CSX and Arthur R. Goldberg of the Justice Department."

FBI Arrests Suspect In Los Angeles Subway Mercury Incident. The AP (1/24) reports, "The FBI on Tuesday arrested a man they believe spilled toxic mercury on a subway platform. Armando Bustamante Miranda, 27, was being questioned but it did not appear he was involved in any terrorist activity, FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller said. He was arrested and held for a parole violation unrelated to last month's spill, Eimiller said." However, she added, "We're not going to have anything more until we sort this thing out." The AP notes, "The county is conducting an investigation to determine why transit officials waited eight hours to alert authorities after they were told about the spilled mercury." The Los Angeles Times (1/24, Blankstein, Guccione, 850K) adds that "Miranda was being questioned by FBI agents and Los Angeles County sheriff's investigators," and the Times notes, "Detectives expressed frustration at the difficulty in finding the suspect, at one point creating more than a dozen potential profiles, including a prankster, a screenwriter working on a script, an actor seeking attention, a student working on a project and even a terrorist. Officials repeated Tuesday that they doubt the incident was related to terrorism." Fox News' Fox Report with Shepard Smith (1/23) also briefly reported on the arrest.

Group Attempting To Simplify Rules Concerning SBU Documents. The Washington Post (1/24, A21, Williamson, 690K) reports, "Inside an unmarked, secured office near the White House, intelligence officials, lawyers and police work to close a gaping hole in the nation's counterterrorism system: the failure of people in the government to communicate with one another." In coming days, the group, "known as the 'information-sharing environment' (ISE) program," is set to "send the president its recommendations for taming an explosion of 'sensitive but unclassified' (SBU) documents." ISE program manager Thomas McNamara says the presence of more than 100 "markers" dictating the rules for handling these documents results in "chaos." He said the group would like to reduce that number to "a dozen or fewer, develop one set of handling rules, and make the documents available to all who need them."

Few Difficulties Encountered Under New Travel Security Rules. The Washington Post (1/24, A3, Aizenman, 690K) reports, "Passengers experienced few difficulties yesterday as new border security rules went into effect requiring citizens of the United States, Canada, Mexico, Bermuda and some Caribbean islands to present a passport when entering the United States by air, officials said." The "smooth transition was largely because of the high percentage of travelers who had obtained a passport, said authorities." The Department of Homeland Security said "90 percent of US citizens flying into the country over the last week arrived with passports, compared with 81 percent during the week of Dec. 11."

Pilots Who Carry Guns On Jetliners May Leave Program Over Training. The Washington Post (1/24, D2, Wilber, 690K) reports a program for pilots aboard US jetliners "is showing signs of growing pains," as the pilots "and their labor groups complain about a lack of supervision and the difficulty in finding time to participate in training courses. Worried that pilots' handgun skills may be eroding, federal security officials are launching a refresher training program next month. … 'Using a weapon is a perishable skill, and we want to ensure they have the appropriate training,' said John A. Novak, an assistant director with the air marshal service." The Post continues that pilots said the course "could prompt some to leave the program," adding that participants "are not paid for their time," or "reimbursed for travel, lodging or food expenses."

DHS General Counsel Resigns. The Washington Post's (1/24, A21) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column that Homeland Security general counsel, Philip J. Perry, will resign effective Feb. 6, Secretary Michael Chertoff announced "after business hours yesterday," adding that he fully supported Perry's decision "to put his family first." Kamen notes, "That would include wife Elizabeth Cheney, daughter of Vice President Cheney, and their five children, the youngest of whom arrived last summer." Perry is expected to "rejoin the Washington office of his old firm, Latham & Watkins, as a partner in its litigation department."

WPost Says Report On Poor Conditions For Detainees Requires Action From ICE. Under the headline "Locked In Squalor," the Washington Post (1/24, A22, 690K) editorializes that Immigration and Customs Enforcement "has had guidelines on the books governing the treatment of detainees" for years, and the agency is "very good at meeting its standards," according to a spokesman. But "a report released by the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general last week suggests the opposite," having "found violations of basic ICE guidelines in every one" of the five facilities it examined. The Post adds, "In a written response to the report, ICE agreed that it needs to review its inspection regimen. That's a start. The next step should be promulgating the guidelines it professes to have no problem meeting as agency regulations, which would give them the force of law and provide a greater incentive to comply. … If the inspector general's portrait is indicative, the nation is failing a basic standard of human decency."

State Farm Settles With Mississippi Homeowners. NBC Nightly News (1/23, story 9, :30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "State Farm insurance agreed today to settle hundreds of lawsuits by policyholders in Mississippi whose homes were wrecked by Hurricane Katrina. The company will put up $500 million to resolve the suits for refusing to cover damage from Katrina's storm surge nearly 17 months ago now. This settlement will end the Mississippi Attorney General's criminal probe of State Farm's claims practices." The Washington Post (1/24, D3, Kunzelman, 690K) notes, "The settlement comes less than two weeks after a federal jury in Gulfport awarded $2.5 million in punitive damages to a couple who sued State Farm for denying their claim after Katrina.

USA Today (1/24, Chu, 2.27M) reports the "landmark settlement" is "expected to reverberate across the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast." Meanwhile, State Farm "will settle more than 600 individual Mississippi homeowners' Katrina claims for roughly $80 million, according to a person with direct knowledge of the negotiations who didn't want to be named because the settlement is confidential." USA Today adds that the company "is fighting hundreds of other Katrina-related lawsuits along the Gulf Coast, including in Louisiana. Attorneys in those cases said they hoped the Mississippi development would cause State Farm and other insurers to settle quickly."

Calling the settlement "a move that is expected to jump-start rebuilding along the Mississippi Gulf Coast," the New York Times (1/24, Treaster, 1.16M) reports that it would also "remove a major public relations headache" for the insurer. "While State Farm and the other insurers may have had some strong legal arguments, they have been widely perceived as insensitive. In many cases, residents whose houses were reduced to concrete slab foundations received just a few thousand dollars in payments. Some received nothing."

WAR NEWS:

Bush Asks Congress To Give His Iraq Strategy "A Chance." While President Bush devoted much of his State of the Union speech to domestic policy proposals, national media stories focused on his comments about Iraq. A major theme in the coverage is Bush's political "weakness" as he enters the final two years of his presidency. In that context, the speech is being generally portrayed as an attempt to revive a Bush presidency against very tough odds – mainly the unpopularity of his Iraq policies. For example, under the headline "A Bid To Rescue A Presidency," the Los Angeles Times (1/24, Hook, 850K) asks, "Can this presidency be saved? That's the question that loomed Tuesday as…Bush gave his State of the Union speech in the most inhospitable climate he has ever faced for his annual address to Congress." Bush's domestic agenda "was potentially more appealing to Democrats," but "his plans may be too modest to accomplish the broader challenge facing Bush: How to rescue the last quarter of his presidency from irrelevance and patch his tattered legacy." Bush, adds the Times, "is trying to regain his footing when Iraq is littered with carnage."

The Washington Post (1/24, A1, Balz, 690K), in a front-page story titled "The State Of The President: Beleaguered," says Bush "used his State of the Union address last night to try to revive his presidency against what may be the greatest odds any chief executive has faced in a generation. … Bush's problems all stem from the same issue. The public has lost confidence in his Iraq war policy, and, in the face of evidence that Americans are looking for a change in course, the president has chosen with his new plan to deploy additional troops to the conflict -- a direction the public overwhelmingly opposes." But "his response last night was a speech that was very much in keeping with the style of leadership he has demonstrated repeatedly in office. If he was humbler in tone and rhetorically generous to his Democratic opponents in calling for cooperation, he was anything but defensive."

Another Washington Post (1/24, A1, Baker, Abramowitz, 690K) story describes Bush as "politically wounded but rhetorically unbowed," adding he "gave no ground on his decision to dispatch 21,500 more troops to Iraq despite a bipartisan cascade of criticism." Democrats "seemed unimpressed by his latest governing blueprint and signaled that they are in no mood to meet him in the middle."

The Wall Street Journal (1/24, A1, McKinnon, Fialka, Dreazen, 2.04M) says the speech was "weighted heavily to domestic issues," as "the politically weakened" Bush moves to "try to define himself as something other than a lame-duck president, facing a hostile Democrat-led Congress and consumed largely with Iraq." The Chicago Tribune (1/24, Tackett, 617K) titles its report "Bush Turns Domestic, But War Won't Go Away," and reports that "after several years of using war and terror as the defining themes of his State of the Union message, the president who came to office with little inclination toward foreign affairs tried to recast his presidency Tuesday night with a notable emphasis on domestic issues. Indeed, the president was more than 3,100 words into his speech before his first invocation of Iraq." But Bush confronts a "formidable reality. No matter the merits of his plans offered Tuesday night, his presidency almost certainly seems destined to be defined by his stewardship of the war in Iraq."

The Baltimore Sun (1/24, Davis, 257K) reports Bush sought "to revive his waning influence," adding he "offered a conciliatory tone," singling out House Speaker Nancy Pelosi when he said "he had the 'high privilege and distinct honor' of being the first president to begin his annual address with the words 'Madam Speaker.'" Pelosi and Senate Majority Harry Reid "said they welcomed the bipartisan spirit in which Bush spoke but said he 'continues to ignore the will of the country' on Iraq and promised an 'up-or-down' vote on his plan."

The New York Times (1/24, Zernike, 1.16M) also notes Bush's comments about Pelosi, and says "the day was full of such reminders of how power has flowed away from the president in the new Washington. Not just because he spoke before a Democratic-led Congress for the first time in his presidency. Not just because his poll numbers are dismal. Not just because the mayor of the nation's capital had rejected the White House's invitation to sit with the first lady, Laura Bush, in her box and instead came as Ms. Pelosi's guest. Even Republicans, while noting that it was 'the president's day,' as Senator John W. Warner of Virginia described it, yielded him only a share of the spotlight."

The Los Angeles Times (1/24, McManus, Reynolds, 850K) reports Bush "sought to demonstrate that in the final two years of his presidency, he can still command enough popular support to compel both Democrats and Republicans to pay him heed." The Washington Times (1/24, Curl, 88K) says Bush's "domestic goals" last night "were relatively modest," and "focused…on Democrat-friendly issues." The Washington Post (1/24, A14, Weisman, Fletcher, 690K) makes the same point in a story titled "President Strays Into Democrats' Priorities, Themes."

The AP (1/24, Hunt) reports "a politically weakened President Bush implored a skeptical Congress Tuesday night to embrace his unpopular plan to send more US troops to Iraq, saying it represents the best hope in a war America must not lose. 'Give it a chance to work,' he said." Bush "was unyielding on Iraq," and "Democrats -- and even some Republicans -- scoffed at his…policy. Unmoved by Bush's appeal, Democrats said the House and Senate would vote on resolutions of disapproval of the troop buildup." McClatchy (1/24, Hutcheson) also terms Bush a "politically weak president," and like the AP says he was "unyielding on Iraq." On the White House's domestic agenda, McClatchy adds "the war is so divisive that it may overwhelm chances for bipartisan compromise on anything." Democrats reacted to the speech "with skepticism and, on some issues, outright hostility."

USA Today (1/24, Jackson, 2.27M) notes Bush "said failing in Iraq would create 'a nightmare scenario,'" adding his "plan for Iraq, unveiled two weeks ago, has also been criticized by Republicans such as Sen. John Warner of Virginia." But another USA Today (1/24, Page, 2.27M) story notes Robert Dallek, a presidential historian and author of Flawed Giant: Lyndon Johnson and His Times, says he "sees parallels between the situation Bush faces in Iraq and the one that Johnson faced in Vietnam -- including efforts by Johnson and his successor, Richard Nixon, to push the government that the United States was backing to adopt reforms and take charge, freeing US troops to come home. 'The echoes are so powerful,' he says."

Much of the local TV coverage last night after the speech also tended to focus on Bush's comments on Iraq. For example, WCBS-TV New York (1/23, 11:01 pm) said in its broadcast last night, "The Congress may be Democratic for the first time in 12 years and the American public may be skeptical, but President Bush used his annual State of the Union message to strike back at opponents who don't want him to send a new surge of troops to Iraq." KSAZ-TV Phoenix (1/23, 9:33 pm) said, "Despite the applause, the handshakes and ovations it was a tough room that greeted President Bush and his military surge into Iraq was a tough sell." WFTV-TV Orlando (1/23, 11:05 pm) reported Bush "refused to waiver on his decision to beef up the number of troops in Iraq," saying to the American people that "whatever you voted for, you did not vote for failure." That quote was often cited by local TV stations reviewing the President's address.

USA Today (1/24, 2.27M) also puts some of Bush's statements last night "in context." For example, to Bush's remark: "In the coming weeks, I will submit a budget that eliminates the federal deficit within the next five years. I ask you to make the same commitment. Together, we can restrain the spending appetite of the federal government and balance the federal budget," USA Today responds, "Bush inherited a $128 billion budget surplus. Within three years, a recession and the war on terrorism turned it into a $412 billion deficit. Rising tax receipts fueled by record corporate profits have since driven the deficit down to $248 billion. Getting back to balance won't be easy if the president is realistic about the future costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and the impact of extending his tax cuts, which he vows to do."

McClatchy (1/24, Thomma) says that while Bush "tried to go home Tuesday night," to what "he thought he left behind in Texas when he was a Republican governor with a Democratic legislature," the "mythical bipartisan place he tried to reach out to in his State of the Union address Tuesday was never like the one he romanticized in Texas. It's not what he's built in six years in Washington. And today it's as elusive as Oz."

USA Today (1/24, 7A, Gomez, 2.27M) and the Washington Times (1/24, Dinan, 88K), meanwhile, survey the numerous guests from both parties attending the speech last night. Says the Times, "Presidents use their State of the Union speeches to send a message to Congress, " but "lawmakers are increasingly using their guest tickets to send a message right back at him."

Instant Poll Finds 82% Back Bush Agenda, Support For "Surge" Jumps To 52%. The AP (1/24) reports that a "CBS News poll conducted by Knowledge Networks immediately after the speech found that 82 percent of viewers generally approved of the president's proposals while 18 percent disapproved. However, 68 percent of viewers said Mr. Bush will not be able to accomplish his goals, while 32 percent think he will." The AP goes on to say that according to the poll, Bush "rallied some support for his Iraq plan among those who watched the speech." Before the State of the Union, "43 percent of them backed the plan, while 52 percent of them supported it after the speech."

Bush Presentation "Arguably Misleading And Often Flawed." One of the most negative assessments of Bush's speech appears in today's Washington Post (1/24, A13, Kessler, 690K), under the headline "President's Portrayal of 'The Enemy' Often Flawed." The Post takes issue with Bush's "arguably misleading and often flawed description of 'the enemy' that the United States faces overseas, lumping together disparate groups with opposing ideologies to suggest that they have a single-minded focus in attacking the United States. Under Bush's rubric, a country such as Iran -- which enjoys diplomatic representation and billions of dollars in trade with major European countries -- is lumped together with al-Qaeda, the terrorist group responsible for the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. … Similarly, Bush asserted that Shia Hezbollah, which has won seats in the Lebanese government, is a terrorist group 'second only to al-Qaeda in the American lives it has taken.'"

No Consensus In Reviews Of Bush's Performance. Commentators disagreed on their assessment of the President's performance. On the positive side, on CBS (1/23), correspondent Bob Schieffer said "this was a much better speech and a much better argument for his position than he made when he made the speech announcing the troop increase two weeks ago." The Weekly Standard's Bill Kristol, appearing on Fox News (1/23), thought "it was a good night for the President. I think the foreign policy part of the speech was very strong. I think he is going to win this debate on Iraq." Likewise, GOP strategist Mike Murphy, on CNN, contended the "elephant in the room" was Iraq and the President "did a good job of trying to explain the consequences of immediate failure in Iraq, and thereby make the case for give his plan a chance to work. I think he bought some time, not much. He doesn't have a lot of support, but I think he brought realism into the debate, and asked for a little more time. I think on the Republican side where he's had some erosion, he'll get some time."

But Roll Call's Mort Kondracke, on Fox News (1/23), said it was "clearly not one of" Bush's "great nights. … The White House put out a talking points memo to Republican supporters saying that the President tonight would be 'exuberant and determined.' I think the determined part was right but I didn't see much exuberance from him. … I thought the President's delivery was tepid until he got to his foreign policy section."

On NBC (1/23), Washington Bureau Chief Tim Russert added, "The President had told his advisors he was going to be sober tonight. It was that and more, it was somber. It really did not have the energy or enthusiasm or passion that we have seen" from Bush in the past. NBC correspondent Cambell Brown added, "It was obviously a carefully worded speech to try to ensure, I think, as few awkward moments as possible. There was a lot in there that everyone could applaud for but it definitely felt, from inside the chamber, extremely subdued." NBC correspondent Andrea Mitchell (1/23) also remarked on "the somber quality" to the speech.

The New York Times (1/24, A1, Sanger, Rutenberg, 1.16M) says the speech "was limited in ambition and political punch at home, with no proposals to rival his call two years ago to remake Social Security, no mention of rebuilding New Orleans and no allusions to limiting stem cell research or banning gay marriage. And when it came to his plan to send additional troops to Iraq, he was forced to plead with the Democrats who now control Congress." The Financial Times (1/24, Daniel), meanwhile, calls Bush's defense of his Iraq policies "pessimistic and assertive."

In the Washington Post (1/24, C1, 690K), media critic Tom Shales writes Bush "flirted with eloquence only at the end of his so-so, nuts-and-bolts State of the Union speech last night: 'The state of our union is strong,' he said, 'our cause in the world is right, and tonight that cause goes on.' With a quick 'God bless' he bolted from the podium as members of Congress, almost applauded out by that time, gave him his final ovation of the night. … As seen on all the major and minor networks, the speech was workmanlike and the presentation presentable. Bush seemed determined to keep it low-key."

The Washington Post (1/24, A15, Murray, Kornblut, 690K) also notes "Bush's audience at the Capitol last night included at least 10 Republicans and Democrats who hope to succeed him, and their response to his State of the Union address ranged from enthusiastic to tepid. The most generous was Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a leading contender for the GOP nomination and Bush's chief defender on the Iraq war, including the administration's latest plan to deploy an additional 21,500 troops. 'This strategy ought to be given a chance, because the consequences of failure are immense, and we'll be back again some day,' McCain told ABC News in a post-speech interview. 'This is going to be long and hard and tough.'" Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "was more skeptical, urging Bush to seek a more 'comprehensive approach' to the Iraq crisis. Bush's troop escalation proposal, she said, was 'really more of the same. We've gone down this road before.'"

As is the norm, much of the post-speech commentary fell along partisan lines. One exception was Sen. Barack Obama, appearing on CNN after the speech, who said, "The President recognized that healthcare and energy are two critical issues facing the country, and I think he put forward some serious proposals, not necessarily ones I would have put forward, but they're serious ways to engage the problem. I think the Democrats should be constructive, we should sit down with the president and say 'we are ready and willing to sit down and see if we can make progress on those two critical issues."

House majority leader Steny Hoyer, on Fox News after the speech said he agreed with the president that "none of us voted for failure" in Iraq, but "his escalation is too little too late. That sentiment is shared by the overwhelming number of military personnel that I have talked to from all levels. I think he is going to have a tough time selling this as a change of policy."

Former NYC Mayor Rudy Giuliani, on Fox News (1/23) after the President's address, said he "thought the speech was a very good one and I thought it did what the President had to do, which was to get us kind of beyond Iraq, meaning there are a lot of other things we have to concentrate on. … I think he made seven or eight points on domestic policy, most important one being the health care program, which is, in my way of thinking, innovative and a very, very good way to increase the number of people covered by health insurance."

CBS (1/23) also spoke to Nicole Wallace, who "was until last year communications director for…Bush, and Joe Lockhart, who "was press secretary for President Clinton." Wallace said, "I think one of the most important things he did tonight…was what he addressed directly to the Speaker. I thought his rousing tribute to Speaker Pelosi was very George W. Bush and what people like to see when they remember why they liked him back when he was far more popular. I think he also set a tone throughout the speech. He talked about Iraq in a very frank way. And I think he went a long way toward earning back some of the trust and credibility that they know they need to finish the job in Iraq and to start a conversation on health care, immigration, and some of the other domestic issues that he rolled out today." Lockhart said, "I don't think that it was a bad speech but I think it was a missed opportunity. An unpopular president this late in the presidency really needs events like this to change the political dynamic. This speech was sober, subdued. I think at times timid when it came to policy. So I think it was a real missed opportunity for him. He has not changed the dynamic at all here in Washington."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the New York Times (1/24, 1.16M) notes that the "White House spin" ahead of Bush's seventh State of the Union address "was that the president would make a bipartisan call to revive his domestic agenda with 'bold and innovative concepts.' The problem with that was obvious last night -- in six years, Mr. Bush has shown no interest in bipartisanship, and his domestic agenda was set years ago, with huge tax cuts for wealthy Americans and crippling debt for the country." Combined with the mounting cost of the war in Iraq, the Times says that makes "boldness and innovation impossible unless Mr. Bush truly changes course. And he gave no hint of that last night." Instead, the newspaper says he "offered up a tepid menu of ideas that would change little: a health insurance notion that would make only a tiny dent in a huge problem. More promises about cutting oil consumption with barely a word about global warming. And the same lip service about immigration reform on which he has failed to deliver."

The Los Angeles Times (1/24, 850K) editorializes this year's address "felt even more compulsory than usual" as Bush "seemed at times to be going through the motions, reasserting his position or making proposals on a number of issues -- immigration, healthcare, education, the war in Iraq, energy independence -- in an effort to remain relevant in the face of a Democratic Congress and plummeting public support. It's difficult to know how many of his ideas will amount to anything."

In an editorial, USA Today (1/24, 12A, 2.27M) says Bush "acknowledged" the "new reality" of Democratic majorities in both houses "in several ways," but "not on Iraq." Bush "appeared to be wedded Lyndon Johnson-like to a vision that is failing in the field, under bipartisan attack in Congress and opposed overwhelmingly by a public that expresses increasing restlessness in the polls." The newspaper said the President "argued for his new plan but largely with his old ideas."

On its editorial page, the Washington Post (1/24, A22, 690K) says Bush "offered the usual assurances last night about the healthy state of the union, but the state of his presidency has never been worse." The President now "faces a Democratic majority in both chambers of Congress and a public increasingly unhappy about the war in Iraq and disenchanted with his leadership" and "by the time he delivers next year's State of the Union address, the primaries will be underway, and Mr. Bush's relevance will be fading." Therefore, the Post says, "If he is to have a final chance to shape policy, this is it." Bush's goal last night "was not so much to argue anew for the troop increase but to drive home the point that the 'consequences of failure would be grievous and far reaching.' On this, Mr. Bush is assuredly correct."

In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (1/24, A12, 2.04M) writes, "You may have noticed that 2006 ended without a recession" and "the big economic story going into this New Year is that growth is accelerating." And "if Bill Clinton were still President, he'd have used last night's State of the Union address to hail all of this as a triumph, taking political credit and claiming it was all due to his policies, with supportive headlines to match. It hardly matters what President Bush said last night; he still won't get any credit."

Webb Says Bush Took Nation To War "Recklessly." The AP (1/24, Kellman) reports, "Democrats blistered President Bush's war policy Tuesday night, challenging him to redeem the nation's credibility -- and his own -- with an immediate shift toward a diplomatic end to the bloody conflict in Iraq. 'The president took us into this war recklessly,' the Democrats' chosen messenger, Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia, said in response to Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday evening. 'We are now, as a nation, held hostage to the predictable -- and predicted -- disarray that has followed.'" Webb, "a Vietnam veteran who was Navy secretary during Republican President Reagan's administration, called for a new direction. 'Not one step back from the war against international terrorism. Not a precipitous withdrawal that ignores the possibility of further chaos,' said Webb. 'But an immediate shift toward strong regionally based diplomacy, a policy that takes our soldiers off the streets of Iraq's cities and a formula that will in short order allow our combat forces to leave Iraq.'"

The Washington Post (1/24, A12, Shear, 690K) notes accused the President of "forcing" the country "to endure 'a mismanaged war for nearly four years.' 'Many, including myself, warned even before the war began that it was unnecessary; that it would take our energy and attention away from the larger war against terrorism; and that invading and occupying Iraq would leave us strategically vulnerable,' Webb said." Webb "held up a picture of his father as a young Air Force captain. As a small boy, he said, he took the picture to bed with him to remind him of his father's sacrifice. Now, Webb's son is serving in Iraq as a Marine infantryman."

McClatchy (1/24, Talev) reports Webb "delivered his harshest blows against the war in Iraq." But "he also jabbed at other openings, saying that now that Democrats control Congress for the first time in Bush's presidency, they'll hold him to deliver on promises to improve public education, health care, the plight of Hurricane Katrina survivors and economic conditions for the working class." USA Today (1/24, Kiely, 2.27M) notes Webb accused Bush of presiding "an imbalanced economy Tuesday in a bluntly worded speech that reflected the new Democratic majority's willingness to flex its muscle in Congress. … The aggressive note struck by Webb in the Democrats' official rebuttal reflected the changed political reality on Capitol Hill."

Webb's performance got generally positive reviews. The New York Times (1/24, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports, "The choice of Mr. Webb was intended to provide a symbol, through his words and appearance, for the new majority in Congress. In a commanding voice, the senator chastised the administration for its economic and foreign policies, but said Democrats would try to work with Mr. Bush to change course."

The New York Times' David Brooks, appearing on PBS (1/23) characterized Webb's speech as "intense," "eloquent," "forceful" and "well executed." However, Brooks noted, "There wasn't a hint of bipartisanship" in Webb's speech.

The Financial Times (1/24, Luce) says Webb "holds the ideal credentials to criticise Mr Bush's 'escalation' of the Iraq war while insulating the party against any charge of being soft on national security."

On CBS (1/23), Katie Couric said "the Democrats picked…Webb for, I think, very obvious reasons. His military credentials are above reproach." CBS correspondent Bob Schieffer added, "Absolutely. He has a son in Iraq. They did not want the President to draw attention away from the war. They want to keep the focus on this war because they believe it is George Bush's war." Webb "really ripped him tonight. saying he led us into this war recklessly. That's pretty tough talk."

On NBC (1/23), Washington bureau chief Tim Russert said Webb "threw down the gauntlet." Webb countered the President's speech "by saying, you brought us there recklessly, now it's time to get us out. If you don't do it, we're going to do it."

NBC (1/23) interviewed Sen. Hillary Clinton, who said Webb "eloquently articulated" the Democratic position. The "escalation proposed by the President is not" a "comprehensive" approach, "we need a full court diplomatic effort. We need to bring pressure and leverage on the Iraqi government to begin to deal with the political problems it has internally and what we have instead is a strategy that, by most accounts, by the experts with whom I've conferred, by public comments by many others, is really more of the same."

NBC (1/23) interviewed GOP Sen. Lindsey Graham, who said, "Here is my comment to Sen. Webb: I appreciate his service, I appreciate his son's service. … Those on the other side, our enemies are listening and see it as a weakening resolve. I would say to Senator Webb and anybody else, if you think this is a lost cause, this is folly, Vietnam, cut off funding. The worst thing anybody can do is pass a resolution declaring the war a loss, no confidence in the commander to fight it and the troop who will follow. So I hope that Republicans and Democrats will not send that message. If you really believe it's a bad idea, cut off funding."

DOJ:

Gonzales Sits Out State Of The Union Address.

The AP (1/24) reports, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales stayed away from the Capitol Tuesday night in case of a catastrophic attack or accident as President Bush delivered his sixth State of the Union address." The AP continues, "By long-standing tradition, a member of the president's Cabinet misses the speech to Congress as a precaution against the entire administration's being wiped out and to maintain the presidential line of succession. Last year, Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson did not attend."

Bloomberg Money and Politics (1/23, 9:03 p.m.) broadcasted, "The custom of course course for one member of the cabinet to remain behind just to have continuity of the government. The selection is the Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales, the lone member of the cabinet hanging back at the White House just in case. That's the procedure." CNN Paula Zahn Now (1/23, 8:01 p.m.) broadcasted, "Tonight CNN has learned it will be the Attorney General, Alberto Gonzales, as part of the Eerie Annual Ritual. What a difference a year makes. At this time last year the President stood before the congress and the nation and was talking and touting progress in Iraq, holding out the possibility of troops coming home in short order if that progress continued."

KPSP-TV, Palm Springs, CA (1/23, 11:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "As is customary, one of President Bush's cabinet members did not attend tonight's speech. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez stayed away from Capitol Hill.

That is a precaution taken in case a catastrophic event should take place and wipe out the president and all his cabinet members. Should the President and all who follow in the line of succession be killed, the surviving cabinet member would become head of the United States government."

WFIE-TV, Evansville, IN (1/23, 10:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "By tradition, a member of the President's cabinet forgoes attending the State of the Union Address in case of an attack or accident that wiped out the entire administration. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales is the one who stayed away tonight."

KWU-TV, Las Vegas, NV (1/23, 10:00 p.m.), KTXA-TV, Dallas, Ft. Worth, TX (1/23, 8:00 p.m.), WAVY-TV, Norfolk, Portsmouth, Newport News, Hampton, VA (1/23, 11:00 p.m.) and KJRH-TV, Tulsa, OK (1/23, 10:00 p.m.) also broadcasted this story.

Editorial Blasts DOJ Over US Attorney Dismissals. The Las Vegas Sun (1/24) editorializes, "Daniel Bogden, the U.S. attorney for Nevada, resigned last week, a victim of a Bush administration housecleaning. At least seven U.S. attorneys, most from the West, have been forced to resign, but no one will say why - not Bogden, not the Justice Department, not Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., who was briefed by the Justice Department." The Sun continues, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee last week that it was simply good management, so he could get the 'very best' people into office. … That strikes us as odd because those fired had done fairly well. Bogden, a well-respected career prosecutor confirmed by the Senate in October 2001, oversaw the successful prosecution of the G-sting political corruption case, as well as prosecutions that put more than 40 members of the violent Rolling 60s Crips gang in federal prison. Others fired include the U.S. attorney in San Francisco, who was leading the probe into steroid use among professional athletes, and the U.S. attorney in San Diego, who oversaw the successful political corruption prosecution of former Republican Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham." The Sun adds, "Democrats wonder if the Bush administration is trying to use a provision in the Patriot Act that lets the president appoint an 'interim' U.S. attorney without Senate approval. Gonzales denies the claim, but we note that one of the fired prosecutors was replaced with 38-year-old Tim Griffin, a former deputy to White House political guru Karl Rove, who would have little chance to survive confirmation in the Democratic-controlled Senate. … The sudden dismissal of these U.S. attorneys smacks of White House meddling. The justice system and the public deserve much better, starting with the truth."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Broadcom Restates Financial Results To Reflect Misdated Option Grants. Bloomberg (1/24, Brennan) reports, "Broadcom Corp., a maker of chips for consumer devices, restated financial results to reflect $2.2 billion in costs for misdated stock-option grants, a problem the company blamed on former Chief Executive Officer Henry Nicholas." Bloomberg continues, "Nicholas 'bears significant responsibility for the lack of adequate controls' in granting options, Irvine, California-based Broadcom said in a regulatory filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. The filing also placed blame on former Chief Financial Officer William Ruehle and former Vice President of Human Resources Nancy Tullos." Bloomberg adds, "Henry Samueli, who co-founded Broadcom with Nicholas and is still chairman and chief technical officer, 'reasonably relied' on outside experts when granting options, the filing said. Broadcom is being investigated by both the SEC and the U.S. Justice Department. … 'It makes sense because Henry Nicholas was very much in charge of the company during his tenure,' Stifel Nicolaus & Co. analyst Cody Acree said about the blame being placed on Nicholas. 'He was iconic in the industry, and he was Broadcom. Henry Samueli has always been more on the engineering side.' … Broadcom restated its financial results for 1998 to 2005 and said the costs were noncash. 'Substantially all' of the extra costs were recorded in the periods before 2004, the company said."

The Wall Street Journal (1/24, C6, Forelle, Bandler) reports, "The company noted 68 instances in which it couldn't find contemporaneous paperwork to document grant-approval meetings, and 18 cases when grant dates were selected after the fact. The restatement is the largest of any company of those forced to admit to errors or malfeasance in the options scandal. Broadcom's figure eclipses the up to $1.7 billion in charges insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc. has said it expects to take. Broadcom's disclosure may draw fresh attention to the role of Mr. Nicholas." The Journal adds, "Broadcom said its evidence indicates Mr. Nicholas, who didn't receive any tainted options himself, was 'at times involved with the selection of grant dates after the fact,' noting he sought advice from William Ruehle, the longtime finance chief who left last year. Broadcom said there is 'substantial evidence' Mr. Ruehle was involved in the backdating. Broadcom said the charges totaled $2.69 billion from 1998 through the first quarter of 2006; after adjusting for taxes and nearly $400 million of options forfeited because of employee terminations, the figure is $2.24 billion, the company said."

New York Pension Fund Leads Suit Over Apple Options. The Washington Post/AP (1/24, D2) reports, "A

DOJ_NMG_0120679

New York pension system will be the lead plaintiff in a shareholders lawsuit accusing Apple of illegally backdating stock options." The AP continues, "The New York City Employees' Retirement System was named the primary plaintiff in the lawsuit Friday by U.S. District Judge Jeremy D. Fogel, according to Grant & Eisenhofer, the law firm representing the group." The AP adds, "The system, which manages about $89 billion in retirement assets for more than 200,000 municipal employees, owns about 1 million shares of Apple stock. The plaintiffs are seeking class-action status for their case and want damages in connection with what they allege were illegally backdated stock options. … Fogel is also hearing a separate but similar securities case that consolidates a number of civil complaints about Apple's stock-options accounting. Apple has not yet responded to either case." The AP notes, "Federal prosecutors are investigating Apple's past stock-options practices, including a specific stock option award to chief executive Steve Jobs. Federal investigators last week questioned Jobs about the company's backdating practices."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Defense Says White House Made Him The Fall Guy. ABC World News (1/23, story 6, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "A jury, today, heard allegations of infighting at the highest levels of the Bush Administration. There were opening statements at the trial of former White House aide, Scooter Libby." ABC (Thomas) added, "Special counsel Patrick Fitzgerald issued a blistering assault on the Vice President's former chief of staff, calling him a liar who was part of a White House campaign to discredit critics of the war in Iraq. Fitzgerald told a transfixed jury, 'The evidence will show the defendant lied repeatedly' to FBI agents and a grand jury investigating who leaked the identity of Valerie Plame, a one-time covert CIA agent." But Libby's defense attorney "argued the government case is paper thin. He lashed out at the White House, accusing the Bush Administration of making Libby a fall guy to protect presidential adviser Karl Rove, who also had talked to reporters about Wilson's wife."

NBC Nightly News (1/23, story 6, 2:40, O'Donnell, 9.87M) reported, "The prosecution says Libby repeatedly lied, including Libby's claim that NBC's Tim Russert was first to tell him who Valerie Wilson was. Prosecutors say Russert will testify that he did not tell Libby. The suggested motive, Libby was trying to deflect blame from the Vice President over the flawed intelligence." But defense attorney Ted Wells "made a stunning charge. In the frenzy to find out who had leaked Wilson's name, the White House chose to protect top Bush advisor, Karl Rove, saying he didn't do it." Scott McClellan, former White House Press Secretary: "It is totally ridiculous." O'Donnell: "But the President's people did not back up Libby in the same way." Libby's defense "says Cheney intervened and wrote a letter saying it was wrong to protect one staffer, meaning Rove, and sacrifice the guy who stuck his neck in the meat grinder, referring to Libby who was ordered by Cheney to refute negative stories."

The CBS Evening News (1/23, story 6, :30, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Lawyers for Libby, who used to be the top aide to Vice President Cheney, argued top White House officials wanted him to take the blame for the leak of a secret CIA agent's name so they could protect Karl Rove, the President's chief political strategist."

The Los Angeles Times (1/24, Schmitt, 850K) reports Wells "portrayed the former vice presidential aide as a sympathetic figure who was following his boss' orders to rebut an administration critic. But Wells said Libby came to believe that he had lost the support of the administration he had sought to defend." Wells said, "Karl Rove was President Bush's right-hand person in terms of political strategy. Karl Rove was the person most responsible that the Republican Party stayed in office. His fate was important to the Republican Party. He had to be protected." The Times adds the "defense suggestion of a high-level conspiracy, made on the opening day of the trial, was the first indication of a breach within the normally secretive White House over the handling of a case that had cast a legal and political cloud over the Bush administration for three years."

USA Today (1/24, Willing, 2.27M) reports Fitzgerald told "jurors that Libby learned of Plame's CIA job from Cheney, then from two other CIA employees, from a State Department official and from a Cheney spokesman in June or early July 2003, before Libby passed the information to two news reporters. Matt Cooper, formerly of Time magazine, and Judith Miller, formerly of The New York Times, are to testify for the prosecution." Fitzgerald said Libby "played a key role in helping Cheney deflect criticism beginning in July 2003 that he was responsible for 'twisting intelligence' to suggest that Iraq was in the process of acquiring uranium, possibly for a nuclear weapon."

The Washington Times (1/24, Curl, 88K) reports Wells "also sought to portray Mr. Libby, who faces 30 years in prison if convicted on five counts of lying to FBI agents, as incredibly busy, so busy that he forgot when and how he learned the identity of CIA employee Valerie Plame, the wife of a former ambassador who had been critical of the administration's Iraq invasion." But special prosecutor Fitzgerald "said in the government's opening argument that Mr. Libby consciously lied."

The Washington Post (1/24, A1, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) reports on its front page that Libby "was 'put through the meat grinder' by the White House shortly after the Iraq war began, scapegoated to conceal the fact that Karl Rove, the president's top political adviser, helped disclose an undercover CIA officer's identity," according to Wells. Wells and the special counsel "agreed that Vice President Cheney ordered Libby, then his chief of staff, to contact reporters early in the summer of 2003 in an effort to rebut criticism that the administration had selectively used intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq." The "dramatic opening statements in the first hours of the celebrated trial laid bare fissures deep inside the White House." The "two sides' accounts exposed jurors to handwritten notes by Cheney, the internal culture of major newsrooms, a tape recording of Libby speaking to grand jurors and a White House under fire as its justification for war was beginning to unravel."

The New York Times (1/24, Lewis, 1.16M) reports Wells' statement "was the first indication that Mr. Libby, who is facing five felony counts of lying to investigators, would seek to deflect some of the blame onto his former White House colleagues." Wells "did not, however, fully explain the connection between an effort to protect Mr. Rove and the actions that led to Mr. Libby's indictment. It was also the first sign that there had been fighting within the Bush administration over the C.I.A. leak investigation." Wells' "most startling comment was his assertion that Mr. Libby had become enmeshed in legal difficulty because of White House efforts to protect Mr. Rove. If Mr. Libby and his lawyers press their strategy of blaming the White House, it could prove risky, possibly even jeopardizing chances of a presidential pardon for Mr. Libby if he is convicted."

Under the headline "'Scapegoat:' Scooter's Stunning Defense," Newsweek (1/23, Isikoff, 3.12M) reported on its Web site, "Libby, it was widely thought by legal experts, was going to be the good soldier. He would play it safe at his trial in order to preserve his options; mainly, if convicted, to seek a presidential pardon before Bush leaves office. But no sooner did he start his opening statement Tuesday morning than defense lawyer Ted Wells shocked the courtroom and all but tossed the 'pardon strategy' out the window."

The Wall Street Journal (1/24, A4, Perez, 2.04M) reports Libby's attorneys "moved to muddy the prosecution's case by alleging a White House effort to protect Karl Rove and make Mr. Libby the fall guy." The defense strategy "shows that Mr. Libby is willing to part ways with his former colleagues at the White House." As both sides 'laid out their strategies yesterday in federal court, it became clear that Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's attempt to simplify a case that ended up far afield from its beginnings as a CIA leak investigation could be hampered by the defense's strategy to put the case in the context of the sharp-elbowed politics of the White House and the Iraq war."

The AP (1/24, Apuzzo) reports, "As the trial opened with a preview of each side's position, it was clear that the jury will have to sort through conflicting statements in a high-profile case that has opened a very public window on the behind-the-scenes Washington practice of leaking sensitive information to the news media. … Nobody, including Rove, has been charged with the leak. Libby is accused of lying to investigators and obstructing the probe."

The Legal Times (1/24, Schwartz) reports, "Libby, 56, is charged with five felony counts of false statements, obstruction of justice, and perjury in connection with what he told the FBI and a grand jury about conversations he had with three reporters in 2003. He was the only person charged as a result of Fitzgerald's 2 1/2-year investigation into whether classified information about Plame's CIA employment was illegally leaked to the press." The Times adds, "The arguments came on the eve of President George W. Bush's State of the Union address. It was in that speech, four years ago, that the president suggested Iraq had tried to purchase uranium from Africa. The veracity of that claim later served as the basis for attacks by Plame's husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, on the administration's decision to invade Iraq and allegedly led to a campaign within the White House to discredit Wilson. … Although the trial, expected to last about six weeks, will not answer the question of whether the Bush administration intentionally misled the public about the rationale for invading Iraq, the war hung heavy over Tuesday's arguments."

Wells To Attack Armitage Aide's Credibility. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/24, Apuzzo) reports, "Attorneys for former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby say the testimony of the government's first witness in the CIA leak trial may have been improperly influenced. Marc Grossman, the former No. 3 official at the State Department, took the stand Tuesday and testified that in June 2003 he was the first person to tell Libby that one of the Bush administration's most vocal critics on Iraq was married to a CIA operative." The AP adds, "Grossman's memory is spotty," and defense attorney Theodore Wells "believes his testimony may have been influenced by his former boss at the State Department, Richard Armitage. … As Grossman continued to the cooperate in the probe, defense attorneys say, he went back to Armitage and told him what the FBI was asking and discussed his answers."

Former Black Militants Charged In 1971 Murder Of Police Officer. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/24, Wohlsen) reports, "A Florida man and seven others were arrested Tuesday in the 1971 slaying of a police officer that authorities say was part of a black power group's five-year campaign to kill law enforcement officers in San Francisco and New York. Police said seven of the eight are believed to be former members of the Black Liberation Army, an offshoot of the Black Panther Party." The "shooting death of Sgt. John V. Young, 51, at a San Francisco police station was one in a series of attacks by BLA members on law enforcement officials on both coasts, police said." The AP notes, "The arrests were just the latest attempt in recent years to hold antiwar radicals and black-power militants responsible for crimes committed a generation ago.

The San Francisco Chronicle (1/24, A1, Derbeken, Lagos, 384K) reports, "The actions Tuesday -- carried out in cooperation with local, state and federal officials -- follow by two years a grand jury investigation of the Young killing that resulted in no arrests or indictments. Lawyers for defendants contended that investigators haven't found new evidence since then that justifies bringing charges at this time," and Attorney General Jerry Brown's spokesman, Nathan Barankin, "acknowledged Tuesday that no new scientific evidence had been unearthed in an investigation made difficult by the lack of solid eyewitness testimony tying the defendants to Young's shooting." The Los Angeles Times (1/24, Glionna, Chawkins, 850K) reports from San Francisco, "The racial tensions of the civil rights era marched back into this city" with the arrest of the "eight former radicals — some now husbands, grandfathers and community organizers." The Times notes, "Defense lawyers and justice advocates Tuesday questioned the charges, one calling the long-running case "a perversion of justice."

Newsday (1/24, Lowe) reports, "NYPD detectives coordinating with San Francisco police and the FBI arrested Francisco Torres, 58, at his home" on Tuesday, and the New York Times (1/24, McKinley, 1.16M) notes NYPD Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly "said the arrests dealt a blow to the legacy of the protest group," but "current and former defense lawyers for several of the men said they were skeptical of the charges in the nearly 36-year-old case, saying the police had harassed their clients for years." Torres lawyer Michael Warren said yesterday, "The F.B.I., as well as the San Francisco police, have known his whereabouts for all these years. He has been an integral part of this community." The New York Daily News (1/24, , 729K) adds, "After several failed prosecutions, a special FBI task force began looking into the Young killing again in 1999 after 'advances in forensic science led to the discovery of new evidence,' the San Francisco Police Department said in a statement." Kelly "said Torres has been 'off the radar' for three decades since serving time for a bank robbery."

The New York Sun (1/24, Solomont) also reports on Torres' arrest, and WMBB-TV Panama City, FL (1/23, Foster) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "Today around 8 a.m., a task force comprised of the FBI, San Francisco Police Department, Bay County Sheriff's Office and Panama City Police Department, operated under an arrest warrant and booked Harold Taylor, 58, into the Bay County Jail on murder and conspiracy charges" in Jones' murder. "'Panama City Police Department was contacted by the FBI and San Francisco PD about four years ago and at that time we located Mr. Taylor,' said Panama City Police Chief John Van Etten in a Tuesday's press conference. … Van Etten said Taylor had been living in Panama City since 1981 and had an no remarkable criminal history."

DOJ Has Not Decided On Details Of ISP Data Retention Requests. CNET News (1/24, Broache) reports, "The Bush administration hasn't settled on what data it would like Internet service providers to retain about their subscribers or for how long, a U.S. Department of Justice attorney said Tuesday." CNET continues, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made it clear last fall that he planned to seek national legislation requiring the controversial practice known as data retention, but 'we don't have any position officially about how long records would have to be retained or what records would have to be retained,' said Eric Wenger, a trial attorney with the Justice Department's computer crime unit." CNET adds, "During an event here hosted by the Federal Communications Bar Association, Wenger also said police already have ready access to other legal tools, such as the power to send letters to ISPs requesting 'preservation' of existing data for up to 90 days while law enforcement obtains the necessary court authority to obtain that data. … But he categorized the lack of consistent data retention by ISPs as a 'roadblock' to some investigations. He described, for example, a situation in which an investigator may be able to secure an IP address for a suspected phisher from Microsoft's Hotmail service. By the time the investigator took that IP address to the Internet service provider for more information about the suspect's identity, he may be told by the ISP that such information has already been purged. … 'We've been talking to some of the companies to explain the needs we have for the records,' he said, although he did not expressly urge adoption of new laws. Another possibility is that a data retention requirement could be extended beyond ISPs to search engines, which was discussed in private Justice Department meetings in October."

CREW Calls For Congressional Hearing On FBI Child Predator Probes. The Miami Herald (1/24, Clark, 286K) reports, "A watchdog group that blew the whistle on former Rep. Mark Foley, only to see the FBI decline to investigate, is asking the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, Rep. John Conyers, to hold a hearing on the agency's practice of investigating potential child sex predators. The request by Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), comes a day after an inspector general's report chided the FBI for failing to do more to alert the House about Foley's transgressions." The report "scolded the agency…saying it should have alerted House leadership to the e-mails or 'at least' told CREW that it was not going to investigate." The Herald adds, "CREW is asking Conyers to hold a hearing on the agency's practices 'as soon as possible, in order to help prevent other children from being victimized.'"

FEC Says Kolbe May Pay Foley Probe Legal Bills With Campaign Funds. The AP (1/24) reports former Rep. Jim Kolbe "may use campaign funds for legal expenses racked up while the House ethics committee and the Justice Department were investigating his connection to a scandal involving House pages, the Federal Election Commission wrote in a draft advisory opinion made public Tuesday." The AP adds, "FEC officials wrote that the legal fees count as 'ordinary and necessary expenses' incurred in connection with holding federal office. The commission will consider the case during a meeting Thursday."

Federal Prosecutors Say Idaho Suspect Admitted Three Slayings. The AP (1/24, Miller) reports from Boise, ID, "A man accused of kidnapping two Idaho children, killing one of them, after slaying their family has confessed to the killings of three other children a decade ago in Washington state and California, federal prosecutors said Tuesday." The AP continues, "The prosecutors cited the confessions to the old killings in court papers saying that intended to seek the death penalty against Joseph Edward Duncan III, who was indicted last week on charges involving the two northern Idaho children. … 'The defendant has engaged in a continuing pattern of violence, attempted violence, and threatened violence,' prosecutors said. Duncan 'is likely to commit criminal acts of violence in the future that would constitute a continuing and serious threat to the lives and safety of others.' … Roger Peven, Duncan's attorney, said he had not yet seen the filing and could not immediately comment on it." The AP notes, "Duncan is accused of kidnapping Dylan Groene, 9, and his sister Shasta, then 8, in May 2005, and taking them to the mountains of Montana, where prosecutors say he sexually abused them for weeks before killing Dylan. Duncan was arrested July 2, 2005, when he and Shasta were spotted at a Coeur d'Alene restaurant. The boy's body was found days later at a remote campsite. … The U.S. attorney's office said Duncan confessed that he killed Carmen Cubias, 9, and Sammiejo White, 11, in Washington state in 1996 and Anthony Martinez, 10, in California in 1997. Officials did not specify to whom Duncan made the confession."

Former Washington Teachers Union Chief Has Sentence Reduced. The Washington Times (1/24, Mcelhatton) reports U.S. District Court Judge Richard J. Leon "reduced the prison sentence of former Washington Teachers Union chief Barbara A. Bullock by more than two years, in exchange for her help in convicting former colleagues in a massive embezzlement scam." Bullock "pleaded for leniency" saying, "I am sorry for what I did, and I can't do any more than that." She "had been sentenced to nine years in prison after pleading guilty in 2003 to taking part in a scam that embezzled more than $5 million in teachers' dues." Now "Bullock is likely to be released in about three years." Judge Leon "rejected the defense request to cut Bullock's sentence by an additional two years, saying she reaped more of the rewards in the embezzlement scam compared with any other defendant."

Los Angeles City Council OKs Vote On Anti-Gang Tax. The Los Angeles Times (1/24, McGreevy, Hymon) reports, "Desperate to stem the rise of gang violence in Los Angeles, the City Council agreed Tuesday to draft a ballot measure that would impose a parcel tax to raise $50 million or more annually for intervention and prevention programs. … However, council members said it was unlikely the proposal would go onto the ballot until next year, skipping the municipal election in May." The Times continues, "Also Tuesday, City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo released his plan for reducing gangs, which includes a call for school uniforms to be required for all Los Angeles Unified School District students, legal action to shut down the headquarters of the 10 worst gangs, and expanding his assignment of prosecutors to every police station and to neighborhoods around gang-plagued schools." The Times adds, "Delgadillo also said he would seek to expand the city attorney office's truancy program to numerous of middle schools, obtain stay-away orders for those who do not live in the neighborhoods they terrorize and push for legislation to increase penalties for gang-related crime. … Councilwoman Janice Hahn, who wrote and championed the proposal for a parcel tax to fight gangs, said action was needed because of the 267 gang-related homicides last year and the 14% increase in gang crime citywide. … After a sometimes emotional debate, the council voted 13 to 0 to direct the city attorney to draft language for a ballot measure. Another vote will be necessary to put it to voters."

Mother, Children Found Safe After Indiana Abduction. The Chicago Tribune (1/24, Doyle) reports, "A mother and four children who police said were abducted from their Elkhart, Ind., home on Saturday were found safe in a motel in the same city Tuesday night, officials said." The Tribune continues, "The children's father, Jerry White, is accused of kidnapping them after shooting a man in their home Saturday morning. Police initially thought White might have fled to the Chicago area, where he once lived. … But on Tuesday night, Kimberly Walker, 31, and her children Jaylan, 9; Justin, 8; Kyara, 6; and Kayla, 16 months, were 'doing well' in the Elkhart area, police said. … White, 30, is in custody, police said." The Tribune adds, "White, Walker and the children were found at the Sleepy Hollow motel on Elkhart's north side about 7 p.m., police said. Police declined to say how they found the family in the motel. … An arrest warrant was issued charging White with attempted murder and several counts of confinement. White is the father of all four children, police said. … White, according to court records, allegedly has a history of kidnapping Walker. He pleaded guilty in 2003 to felony domestic battery for attacking Walker while she was leaving work on the South Side, according to court records. The more serious aggravated kidnapping charges were dropped."

Agent Denies FBI Threatened Vigil Defense Witness With Prosecution. The AP (1/24) reports, "A federal judge made no immediate decision Tuesday afternoon on a request for a new trial for former (NM) State Treasurer Robert Vigil. … The hearing will resume Wednesday morning, but the judge also told both sides they should be prepared to go forth with Vigil's scheduled sentencing." The AP notes, "Tuesday's hearing was called after defense attorney Sam Bregman raised concerns about a potential witness. That witness, former Deputy State Treasurer Ann Marie Gallegos, claimed she had been intimidated by the FBI. But FBI agent Marcus McCaskill testified…it was never intimated that Gallegos would be prosecuted if she testified for the defense."

Defense Suffers Setbacks At Coke Formula Theft Trial. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (1/24, Stanford, 379K) reports, "Defense attorneys in the Coca-Cola trade secrets trial suffered a pair of setbacks Tuesday during a second day of testimony full of fireworks. The federal judge in the case began by admonishing the attorney for former Coke secretary Joya Williams, who is accused of conspiring to sell confidential company documents and product samples to PepsiCo. The judge said attorney Janice Singer attempted to skirt the court's rules to 'attack' a prosecution witness," Edmund Duhaney. "As a result, the judge wouldn't allow Singer to introduce evidence the attorney said was at the 'core' of her case. Then jurors learned that Williams contacted another prosecution witness just days before the start of her trial to suggest how he should testify." The AJC notes, "Singer hammered away at Duhaney's credibility most of the morning. But Duhaney refused to say he was testifying to get a lighter sentence for his part in the crime."

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (1/24, Weber) reports Joya Williams' former boyfriend, Sedrick Wilson testified that Williams "wanted him to lie for her about a package she had sent to another man accused in the case." Wilson said Williams "sent him a text message on Jan. 7, nine days before jury selection began in her trial, saying that it was 'beyond important' that he call her. The subject, Wilson said, was a package she sent via FedEx to Ibrahim Dimson, a co-defendant in the case, during the first half of 2006. Wilson said he was with Williams when the shipment was sent. 'She said, "Make sure you say that it was for the trucking company,"' Wilson recalled of his recent conversation with Williams."

Jurors Hear FBI Surveillance Tapes. WXIA-TV Atlanta (1/23, Shirek, King) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "Secretly-recorded phone calls portray" Williams "as a willing participant" in the conspiracy. Jurors yesterday "heard those taped phone calls, and saw an eyeful." WXIA added, "Williams insists Duhaney is the one who stole all those Coke trade secrets from her, and, on his own, offered them to Pepsi, without her knowledge. But in court Tuesday, with Duhaney on the witness stand, Williams and the jury listened to phone calls the FBI recorded between Duhaney and his confessed partner in crime, Ibrahim Dimson, when agents secretly tapped Dimson's cell phone last year. … In their taped phone calls, the men…portray her as an associate, a willing and active participant, in the scheme."

Indianapolis Police Officer Sentenced To Prison For Mortgage Fraud. The Indianapolis Star (1/19, Evanoff, 268K) reported, "Indianapolis Police Department veteran Michael C. Smith was sentenced Wednesday to 57 months in prison by U.S. District Judge Sarah Evans Barker for his role in a mortgage-fraud scheme. One of the longer prison terms given for mortgage fraud in the city, it follows a probe by a little-known federal task force set up in 2002 to look into Indianapolis' long rash of real estate scams. Smith is the 58th individual convicted of fraud since the federal task force was assembled to look into real estate fraud in Central Indiana, U.S. Attorney Susan Brooks' office reported." The Star noted, "Brooks organized the task force with the FBI, Internal Revenue Service, U.S. Postal Service and U.S. Secret Service, which looks into some white-collar crimes. … 'Indianapolis has more fraud than other cities,' said original task force member Kent Paulin, who retired as an FBI agent in 2004. 'It's almost like a networking thing.'" The AP (1/19) also reported on Smith's sentence.

Kulongoski Calls For Policy Review In Light Of Federal Kickback Probe. The Oregonian (1/24, Walsh, Green, 318K) reports, "Gov. Ted Kulongoski on Tuesday called for an internal review of state procurement policies in the wake of a federal probe into allegations that a food service administrator for the prison system took bribes from companies in return for buying their food." Kulongoski spokeswoman Anna Richter Taylor said, "Once the (federal) investigation is complete, we will be re-evaluating whether or not the procurement and management policies that we have in place are sufficient and identify what changes need to be made to strengthen oversight." The Oregonian notes, "Farhad 'Fred' Monem was placed on leave after IRS and FBI agents searched his Salem home and office earlier this month. A federal judge has unsealed court documents that describe a four-year kickback scheme that alleges Monem took hundreds of thousands of dollars from companies that sell food to the state for inmate meals."

The AP (1/24, McCall) adds that "Kulongoski said Tuesday a federal investigation into alleged kickbacks to the state prison food service administrator totaling at least $650,000 may lead to tougher oversight of the purchasing program. … No charges have been filed against Monem or others accused of involvement." The AP also notes that the FBI and IRS were conducting the investigation.

US Will Not Charge New York Post Contributor. The New York Times (1/24, Barron) reports, "Federal prosecutors have decided not to file charges against a former freelance contributor to The New York Post's Page Six gossip column after an investigation into whether he had demanded payments for favorable coverage, a lawyer for the contributor said yesterday." The Times continues, "The contributor, Jared Paul Stern, was suspended last April after The Post reported that the California supermarket billionaire Ronald W. Burkle had complained to the authorities. … At the time, people involved in the investigation said that Mr. Burkle had secretly videotaped Mr. Stern demanding a $100,000 payment and a $10,000 monthly stipend. Mr. Stern was heard saying that in return, he would keep unfavorable mentions of Mr. Burkle out of Page Six." The Times adds, "Yesterday, a person with knowledge of the decision confirmed that federal prosecutors in Manhattan had decided not to prosecute Mr. Stern. The decision was reported on The New York Observer's Web site yesterday afternoon. … A spokeswoman for the United States attorney's office in Manhattan declined to comment. But Mr. Stern's lawyer, Joseph Tacopina, said he had been told of the decision. … 'We've always been confident that there was no evidence of any crime,' Mr. Tacopina said."

Attorneys Question Massachusetts Police Lab's DNA Results. The Boston Globe (1/24, Saltzman) reports, "Showing the widening fallout from the mishandling of DNA test results at the State Police lab, the lawyers in three high-profile murder cases challenged the reliability of such test results and suggested the problems could help their clients." The Globe continues, "A lawyer for Neil Entwistle, whose DNA was allegedly found on the gun used to kill his wife and infant daughter, said the suspension of Robert E. Pino, the civilian administrator of the DNA database at the State Police forensic laboratory, "calls into question the reliability, trustworthiness, and integrity" of the lab and should be investigated by an independent forensic scientist." The Globe adds, "The FBI began an audit of the laboratory last week because Pino allegedly failed to report 11 matches in old unsolved rape cases until the statute of limitations had expired and reported four test results incorrectly. … But Entwistle's lawyer, Elliot M. Weinstein, said in an interview that the bureau has had its own deficiencies with DNA analysis in recent years and lacks credibility." The Globe notes, "Weinstein, who unsuccessfully asked a judge last fall to toss out DNA evidence against Entwistle, declined to say whether he intends to submit a new motion on the basis of Pino's suspension. But his comments indicate that defense lawyers will probably cite the lab's problems as reasons that judges should block DNA results from being introduced as evidence, that juries should discount such evidence, or that convictions should be overturned. … Also yesterday, lawyer Robert A. George said he expects that Pino's actions will form the basis of challenges in two other high-profile murder cases: Christopher M. McCowen's conviction in November of the murder of Christa Worthington, and Edward S. O'Brien's 1997 conviction in the slaying of his best friend's mother. George represented both defendants."

House Republicans Seek Berger Polygraph. The Washington Times (1/24, Seper) reports, "Eighteen House Republicans have urged the Justice Department to proceed with a polygraph test for Samuel R. Berger, the former national security adviser who agreed to take the test as part of a plea of guilty of stealing documents from the National Archives. … 'This may be the only way for anyone to know whether Mr. Berger denied the 9/11 commission and the public the complete account of the Clinton administration's actions or inactions during the lead-up to the terrorist attacks on the United States,' the congressmen said in their letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales." The Times adds, "The congressmen -- led by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III of Virginia -- said a prompt lie-detector test is needed to determine the extent of Mr. Berger's thievery, especially because the former Clinton administration adviser reviewed original documents for which there were no copies or inventory. … Other signers of the letter are Reps. Duncan Hunter, Darrell Issa and Brian Bilbray of California, John L. Mica of Florida, F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. of Wisconsin, Dan Burton and Mark Souder of Indiana, Christopher Shays of Connecticut, John M. McHugh of New York, Chris Cannon of Utah, John J. 'Jimmy' Duncan Jr. of Tennessee, Michael R. Turner of Ohio, Kenny Marchant of Texas, Lynn Westmoreland of Georgia, Patrick T. McHenry and Virginia Foxx of North Carolina and Bill Sali of Idaho. …Mr. Davis, former chairman and now ranking Republican on the House Government Reform Committee, released a report by his staff on Jan. 9, saying a Justice Department investigation of Mr. Berger's admitted document theft was 'remarkably incurious.' … The report said the theft compromised national security 'much more than originally disclosed' and resulted in

'incomplete and misleading' information to the September 11 commission. It said Mr. Berger was willing to go to 'extraordinary lengths to compromise national security, apparently for his own convenience.'"

State, Local Officials Take Action To Curb Cyber-Bullying. The Wall Street Journal (1/24, D1, Chaker) reports on "a growing problem for school administrators and local officials: how to handle so-called cyberbullying. As long as there have been kids, there have been bullies. Now, emboldened by the anonymity available online, a bully can be nastier -- and with the click of a mouse, have a far broader audience -- than in the past. What may once have been snickers in the hallway can now be an excruciatingly public humiliation spread via email, text messaging and online teen forums." The Journal continues, "Schools and local officials have been hearing increasing calls from parents to step in. But educators are torn between the desire to stop bad behavior and the limits on their ability to intervene. Much of the badmouthing takes place on home computers and off school grounds, where schools have little or no authority. … Now, school officials, states and even Web sites are taking action. Educators and state legislatures in Florida, South Carolina, Utah, Oregon and elsewhere are creating new policies that deal with cyberbullying, either incorporating electronic harassment into existing bullying policies, or spelling it out as an entirely new threat. In doing so, they are often crafting language that allows educators to intervene even in off-campus incidents if the activity affects the school environment." The Journal notes, "MySpace.com, the popular networking site, last fall released a guide for school administrators, advising them to contact the site about false or offensive user profiles or to report threats or cyberbullying. It also created a hotline and email address for the exclusive use of school officials to contact MySpace. … The challenge is that students, like everyone else, have First Amendment rights that school officials can't cross. In 1969, the Supreme Court ruled that to suppress student speech on campus, a public school must show it aims to prevent 'substantial disruption' in the classroom rather than 'a mere desire to avoid the discomfort and unpleasantness that always accompany an unpopular viewpoint.' … Later this year, the justices will consider whether public school officials can suppress student speech off campus, in a case where a Juneau, Alaska, high-school principal suspended a student for unfurling a banner reading 'Bong Hits 4 Jesus' on a sidewalk where students had gathered. The case could have implications for other forms of off-campus speech, such as online postings."

Attorneys Attend "Bankruptcy Boot Camps" To Prepare For Battle. The Wall Street Journal (1/24, B6D, Doss) reports, "Creditors beware: O. Max Gardner III is planning to train an army of consumer bankruptcy attorneys at his Bankruptcy Boot Camps this year." The Journal continues, "His mission isn't to beef up attorneys' muscles with a regimen of sit-ups or push-ups. Rather, Mr. Gardner's goal is to teach them the fine art of overcoming the hurdles put in place by bankruptcy legislation that creditors helped to pass in 2005. … Mr. Gardner, who started the boot camps last August, believes the new law is punitive toward debtor attorneys and makes it harder for consumers to file for bankruptcy-court protection." The Journal adds, "The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act, which took effect in October 2005, ushered in sweeping changes to the federal bankruptcy code that affected both consumers and businesses in financial trouble. … Critics contend that the new law made it harder for consumers to file for bankruptcy protection and that it was essentially drafted by lobbyists for banks and credit-card companies. … Some judges have expressed that view, too. In a court opinion last year, Judge Frank R. Monroe of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Austin, Texas, said that 'the parties pushing the passage of the Act' appeared to have 'an agenda to make more money off the backs of the consumers in this country.' … Mr. Gardner, who has been a consumer-bankruptcy attorney for nearly three decades, said he plans to help boot-camp attendees fight back by putting them through a four-day seminar to 'de-program' and 're-engineer' their practices. … Consumer-bankruptcy attorneys tend to focus on filing a bankruptcy petition for their clients and getting their debts discharged, he said."

DOJ Clears Louisiana Party Primary System. The Baton Rouge (LA) Advocate (1/24, Schuler) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has cleared the way for Louisiana to return to a party primary system for congressional elections starting in 2008." The Advocate continues, "Justice Department Voting Rights Chief John Tanner's office advised state officials of the sign-off on legislation the Legislature approved in June. … The state Attorney General's Office released the letter Tuesday." The Advocate adds, "Sen. Cleo Fields, D-Baton Rouge, pushed the law to end the practice of Louisiana electing its congressmen after other states across the nation. … 'The issue should be squarely behind us and we can elect members of Congress at the same time as everybody else does,' Fields said Tuesday. … Under the plan, Democrats and Republicans would hold party primary elections with winners facing each other in a general election along with nonparty candidates who want to make the race." The Advocate notes, "The election schedule would allow winners of the party primaries and other party candidates to face each other on federal Election Day — the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November. … That's a move away from the open primary system, where all candidates regardless of party have vied against one another on the November ballot. … If nobody won outright, the two top vote-getters would face off in a December election. .. .U.S. District Judge Frank Polozola set the schedule in 1998 to prevent Louisiana from electing its U.S. senators and representatives before Election Day."

Courts Give Mixed Reviews To Voter ID Laws. USA Today (1/24, Biskupic, 2.27M) reports voter identification laws, "adopted by states in recent years amid concerns about fraud, are getting mixed reviews as courts weigh whether they unconstitutionally keep some people from the polls." State courts in Georgia and Missouri "last fall invalidated laws that required voters to show photo ID each time they cast ballots. Georgia and Missouri are among 11 states that have passed such laws since 2003, inspired partly by allegations of voter fraud raised in Florida and elsewhere during the 2000 elections." Elsewhere, however, "federal appeals courts have not been as willing to reject voter ID laws."

Media Outlets Embroiled In Debate Over Free-Speech Rights. USA Today (1/24, 2A, Kasindorf) reports, "In a dispute between the 'new media' of the Internet and the 'old media' of broadcasting, liberal bloggers and conservative talk-radio hosts are accusing each other of trampling the First Amendment's guarantees of free speech." USA continues, "Hundreds of blogs are exhorting national advertisers not to buy commercial time on Disney-owned KSFO-AM in San Francisco because some on-air hosts have made comments that the bloggers allege are racist or encourage violence. … KSFO personalities say the bloggers are trying to muzzle their political views. The bloggers say they're rallying behind the free-speech rights of a colleague whose website was briefly shut down after Disney's ABC network threatened to sue over alleged copyright violations." USA adds, "Some advertisers, including Bank of America and MasterCard, have deserted KSFO since an anonymous media critic identifying himself online as Spocko began posting recordings of the station's 'Hot Talk' hosts. Spocko and some of his readers have been e-mailing the audio to KSFO advertisers since 2005, asking the companies whether they want to be associated with the controversial rhetoric. … The First Amendment flap was debated Sunday on CNN's Reliable Sources. Dan Riehl, a blogger critical of Spocko, said some of the radio hosts' comments 'were blown out of proportion or misrepresented' in the complaints to sponsors. Mike Stark, another blogger and a Spocko ally, said: 'The way to fight free speech that you disagree with is to engage in more free speech. And that's exactly what Spocko did.'"

Antitrust Issues Loom Large In Proposed Delta Merger. The Financial Times (1/24, Cameron) reports, "Antitrust concerns have re-emerged as the key barrier in US Airways' hostile pursuit of Delta Air Lines, according to aviation financiers surveyed by the Financial Times." The Times continues, "The airlines' chief executives will face off on Wednesday before a Senate hearing on airline consolidation, which both sides view as a key test of political sentiment for deals involving the largest US carriers." The Times adds, "Doug Parker, US Airways' chairman and chief executive, is adamant that a deal which would create the world's largest airline would be cleared by the Justice department. .. He is expected to provide assurances to the Senate commerce, science and transportation committee that the merger with its larger rival would not lead to higher fares or reduced service to smaller communities." The Times notes, "Jerry Grinstein, his opposite number at Delta, argues the airlines' overlap on the US east coast would see it blocked on competition grounds, though has entertained discussions with Northwest about a potential combination when both emerge from bankruptcy protection. .. Delta is reviewing final bids from banks to provide exit financing for its planned exit from bankruptcy as a standalone carrier, which could include private equity investment."

Georgia Legislators Ask Gonzales To Investigate Delta Bid. WSB-TV, Atlanta, GA (1/23, 6:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "Several Georgia lawmakers signed a letter to Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez urging him to review the situation. They support Delta's stand-alone plan for getting out of bankruptcy. However, they say it will negativively impact jobs and our state's economy."

WCIV-TV, Charleston, SC (1/23, 6:00 a.m.) broadcasted, "Georgia lawmakers are rallying around Delta airlines in opposition to the hostile takeover by USAirways. The newest chapter in Delta's public voiced opposition to the merger is a letter from Georgia lawmakers to US Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez USAirways recently bolstered its takeover bid from $8.4 billion to $10.3 billion. The legislators say Georgia could lose thousands of jobs if the hostile takeover succeeds."

WCJB-TV, Gainesville, VA (1/23, 12:00 p.m.) broadcasted, "The newest chapter in delta's public opposition to the merger is a letter from Georgia lawmakers to US Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez. It states the merger would be bad for Georgia and for the nation. The legislators

Bank Of America Halts Effort To Change Law Limiting Growth. The New York Times (1/24, Dash) reports, "Bank of America's chairman and chief executive, Kenneth D. Lewis, said yesterday that the company was backing away from a quiet lobbying effort to change a federal law that could prevent it from making major acquisitions." The Times continues, "Just weeks after agreeing to initiate discussions with lawmakers to raise the possibility of lifting the 10 percent federal deposit cap, Kenneth D. Lewis said that he had told bank representatives to 'back off' from those plans. … 'I thought we had gotten out there a little too far in terms of our level of aggressiveness, and it sent the wrong signals,' Mr. Lewis said in an interview yesterday. About two weeks ago, he made the decision to halt the political effort, he said." The Times adds, "Bank of America, which has about $693.5 billion, or just over 9 percent of the nation's deposits, had argued in a position paper that the law restricting a bank to no more than 10 percent of the nation's deposits is 'antiquated, conceptually flawed' and anticompetitive." The Times notes, "While American banks are prevented from increasing their deposit base through acquisitions that might push them over the federal threshold, foreign banks face no similar restrictions. The bank also argues that the law is unnecessary because of antitrust laws, state regulations and market forces. … But as the only bank near the 10 percent limit, Bank of America has found itself with virtually no allies. JPMorgan Chase, the next largest deposit holder, could acquire all but the five biggest banks and still remain under the federal cap. Wachovia, Wells Fargo and Citigroup, the next banks in line, have potentially even more room and time. … Smaller community banks, meanwhile, have vowed to fight any move to lift the cap."

Stolt-Nielsen Sues DOJ For Access To Antitrust Amnesty Agreements. Corporate Counsel (1/24, Reisinger) reports, "The Stolt-Nielsen Transportation Group wants to know why it's been singled out for special treatment by the government. The Norwegian shipping giant has sued the U.S. Department of Justice under the Freedom of Information Act, demanding that antitrust officials release scores of confidential deals that they've reached with other companies. Of the roughly 100 businesses that have signed amnesty agreements with Justice's antitrust division, Stolt-Nielsen is the only one to have subsequently been indicted." CC continues, "Why does Stolt-Nielsen want to pore through these deals? For one thing, it wants to know whether any of these other agreements specified a date by which companies had to cease their alleged wrongdoing. Antitrust officials indicted Stolt-Nielsen's U.S. subsidiary in September, claiming that it continued to engage in price-fixing even after it said it had stopped. Stolt-Nielsen responds that the subsidiary halted the misconduct by the time that it signed its amnesty agreement in January 2003 and that the deal didn't set a deadline for when it had to clean up its act." CC adds, 'Stolt-Nielsen's attorneys declined to comment for this story, but lawyers close to the case say that the company hopes to compare the text of its deal with those that the antitrust division struck with other businesses, as well as with the division's model amnesty agreement. These attorneys say that Stolt-Nielsen wants to show that other agreements usually included a date by which illegal conduct had to be halted. … Justice spokeswoman Gina Talamona says that the antitrust division considers amnesty applicants to be 'confidential sources,' and will disclose their agreements 'only if required to do so by a court in connection with litigation.'"

Judge Dismisses Suit Over Online Phone Service. The AP (1/24, Veiga) reports, "A federal judge has thrown out an antitrust lawsuit filed by the distributor of Morpheus file-sharing software against Internet phone service provider Skype Technologies SA, eBay Inc. and other defendants." The AP continues, "StreamCast Networks Inc. had sought more than $4.1 billion in unspecified damages and a court order blocking eBay from selling Skype services. StreamCast claimed the founders of Skype broke an agreement to give StreamCast the right of first refusal for the technology behind Skype's Voice over Internet Protocol, or VoIP, service." The AP adds, "In her ruling Thursday on a motion for dismissal, U.S. District Court Judge Florence-Marie Cooper concluded that StreamCast failed to make its case for relief under federal antitrust laws and dismissed all claims against Skype, eBay and more than a dozen other defendants. … Cooper declined to exercise discretionary jurisdiction to consider state law claims such as unfair competition and fraudulent transfer."

German Truck Maker Withdraws Bid For Scania. The Financial Times (1/24, Milne, Ibison) reports, "German truckmaker MAN on Tuesday withdrew its €10.3bn hostile bid for Scania, handing Sweden's powerful Wallenberg family victory in one of Europe's bitterest recent takeover battles." The Times continues, All parties to the bid saga said they now hoped to conduct friendly discussions to see if a tie-up would be possible between the two truckmakers, as well as the truck assets of carmaker Volkswagen, the biggest shareholder of both MAN and

Scania." The Times adds, "The withdrawal of the offer just eight days before it was due to expire puts VW and particularly Investor in a position to stamp their mark over any future discussions. … Several people on the German side said they now expected a new company to be established into which all the groups would be merged. … Both VW and Investor would hold large stakes in such a group, according to people briefed on the plans. But advisers on all sides said first there would be a cooling off period and that any eventual tie-up would 'take months, not days or weeks.'"

Dutch Court Rules Against Bid For Dofasco. The Baltimore Sun (1/24, Connolly) reports, "A Dutch court yesterday tossed out a bid by ThyssenKrupp AG to force Arcelor Mittal to honor a pledge to sell Canadian steelmaker Dofasco, but it's not clear whether Mittal will sell either its steel plant in Sparrows Point or Weirton, W.Va." The Sun continues, "The Justice Department gave Mittal until Jan. 28 to sell Dofasco Inc. to ensure it would not have a monopoly on tin production in the United States after its $33 billion merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA. … If Mittal is unable to sell Dofasco, a manufacturer of high-grade sheet metal for the North American auto industry, the Justice Department has said Mittal must sell either its Sparrows Point or Weirton facility." The Sun adds, "Arcelor placed the profitable Dofasco in a Dutch trust early last year in an effort to fend off Mittal's hostile takeover bid. While Arcelor finally agreed to merge with Mittal, creating the world's largest steelmaker with annual production topping 110 million tons, it has no control over the trust. … The three trustees have already rejected a proposal by Mittal to sell Dofasco to Germany's ThyssenKrupp for $4.6 billion, less than the $4.86 billion that Arcelor paid for it. … Mittal said this month that it would not sue the trust to release Dofasco." The Sun notes, "It appears Mittal has given up trying to sell Dofasco. Last week, Mittal confirmed it was in negotiations with a Chicago-based steel distributor, Esmark Inc., to sell all or parts of Weirton, a large producer of tin plate. The two parties have signed a nonbinding memorandum of understanding, but any sale hinges on approval from the Justice Department. Late last year, Esmark gained control over nearby Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. and promised cash for Weirton if Mittal put it up for sale. … However, Justice has the final say about which plant is sold and to whom. … Gina Talamona, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said yesterday in an e-mail response that 'the matter is still pending.'"

Bush Seeks To Curb US Gasoline Demand With Renewable Fuels, Greater Efficiency. The New York Times (1/24, Andrews, Barringer, 1.16M) reports, "President Bush, vowing to reduce the nation's thirst for foreign oil, called on Tuesday for a huge government-mandated increase in renewable fuels -- mainly ethanol -- and tougher mileage standards for cars and light trucks." The proposals "were more ambitious, and perhaps less achievable, than those he made a year ago when he said the nation was 'addicted to oil.' The centerpiece of Mr. Bush's proposal, which he said would cut the projected use of gasoline by 20 percent over the next decade, was a nearly fivefold mandatory increase in the production of ethanol and other alternative fuels for cars and trucks." Bush "called for a mandatory requirement that makers of fuel produce 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels a year by 2017, replacing about 15 percent of the projected gasoline use in that year. A second major plank of Mr. Bush's energy proposal calls for increasing fuel-efficiency standards of cars and trucks by 4 percent a year -- about one mile per gallon -- starting in 2010 for cars and 2012 for trucks." Bush also "called for doubling the amount of oil in the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to about 1.5 billion barrels of oil. The doubling would take place at a snail's pace over the next 20 years. Even so, advance word of the idea helped push up oil prices by $2.46 a barrel on Tuesday to $55.04." Bush's proposals "face a slew of obstacles, both practical and political."

USA Today (1/24, Healey, 2.27M) reports, "The energy portion of President Bush's State of the Union speech Tuesday included some eye-popping numbers that would amount to a boon for the ethanol industry and could begin boosting the fuel economy of cars and trucks as soon as 2009." The "most stunning number in Bush's plan is 35 billion gallons -- the amount of renewable and alternative fuels that the petroleum industry would have to blend with gasoline by 2017. That would displace one-fourth of the gasoline Americans use."

The Chicago Tribune (1/24, Neikirk, 617K) reports, "President Bush sought Tuesday night to counter criticism that he has failed to do enough to tackle global warming and energy security as he unveiled a 10-year plan to slash U.S. gasoline consumption by 20 percent." If "initial assessments of his new proposal are any guide, the president has more persuading to do. Critics said that while his plan had many good elements, it either does not go far enough or might not be practical in some cases." Bush "presented an ambitious proposal that goes far beyond anything else he has previously offered to address what he called America's addiction to oil."

The Los Angeles Times (1/24, Simon, Douglass, O'Dell, 850K) reports, "President Bush's proposals to reduce U.S. gasoline consumption by 20 percent in 10 years include more specific and ambitious new goals than in previous White House statements, but they also appear to rely on assumptions about energy markets, politics and technology that some experts say are debatable, and include some apparent contradictions." The Times adds, "In general, Bush's proposal to boost alternative fuels such as ethanol was greeted with conditional enthusiasm by many scientists, environmentalists and members of Congress." Congressional "Democrats and their environmental allies assailed Bush for failing to endorse mandatory limits on emissions blamed for global warming, commit to stricter vehicle miles-per-gallon rules or reconsider his past opposition to requiring a percentage of the nation's electricity to be generated from alternative energy sources such as solar and wind power." But "any effort to go beyond what Bush is proposing could be politically difficult." Bush's "call for ramping up production of ethanol and other alternative fuels generated more enthusiasm, especially on Capitol Hill among farm-state Democrats and Republicans."

The Wall Street Journal (1/24, A2, Ball, Etter, 2.04M) reports, "President Bush's call for the U.S. to reduce projected gasoline demand by 20% over the next decade faces a hurdle: a volatile energy market." The "economics both of alternative fuels and of more-efficient vehicles depend largely on the price of oil as well as other commodities, leaving them vulnerable to market shifts." The Journal adds, "The volatility ethanol producers have encountered underscores the uncertainty faced by companies and investors trying to develop alternate sources of energy. Lower prices can hurt the economic argument underpinning their development, and added supplies can bring prices down."

The Financial Times (1/24, Cameron) reports that the renewable fuels targets outlined in the speech "are expected to inflame the food-versus-fuel debate over the competing use of corn-based ethanol, while environmentalists have also expressed concern over plans to increase domestic oil production." The Times adds, "The president is expected to commit more funds to renewable fuel research – a call matched by the Democratic leaders – in a bid to meet the targets and make other feedstocks such as sawgrass more commercially viable. However, the target could also renew calls for the existing tariff on ethanol imports to be lifted."

The Washington Post (1/24, A14, Mufson, 690K) reports, "The energy proposals President Bush outlined last night break new ground for his administration. ... Each proposal, though, immediately prompted questions about its ultimate effectiveness." The Post outlines four energy proposals from the State of the Union speech and gives what it calls the "fine print" of each.

The Financial Times (1/24, Daniel) reports, "The speech marked Mr Bush's strongest effort yet to slow the growth of greenhouse gases." But "the White House energy policy fell short of hopes that it would engage in international discussions about a post-Kyoto accord after 2012 to control greenhouse gases or support tougher economy wide mandatory caps on carbon dioxide."

Plan To Double Petroleum Reserve Causes Big Jump In Oil Prices. NBC Nightly News (1/23, story 10, :20, Williams, 9.87M) reported that oil prices "shot up today after the government announced it will boost this nation's emergency oil stockpiles. That word sent crude oil up $2.48 a barrel. A gain of nearly 5% in one day to close at $55.04 a barrel."

The Financial Times (1/24, Daniel) reports, "President George W. Bush triggered the biggest one-day jump in oil prices in 16 months on Tuesday when he set out plans in his State of the Union address to double US strategic oil reserves." Energy Secretary Sam Bodman "said his department would start 'purchasing crude oil in the spring at a rate of about 100,000 barrels per day.'"

Samuelson Warns Against "Infatuation" With Biofuels. Washington Post (1/24, A23, 690K) columnist Robert J. Samuelson writes, "President Bush joined the biofuels enthusiasm in his State of the Union address, and no one can doubt the powerful allure." But it "may be a mirage. The great danger of the biofuels craze is that it will divert us from stronger steps to limit dependence on foreign oil: higher fuel taxes to prod Americans to buy more gasoline-efficient vehicles and tougher federal fuel economy standards to force auto companies to produce them." The "administration's ultimate target of 60 billion gallons in 2030" would "offset less than half of the projected increase in annual oil use." And the "60 billion-gallon goal -- and the 35 billion-gallon interim target -- are also probably unrealistic." Although biofuels "are certainly worth pursuing," there is "a real threat that the infatuation with biofuels is a political expediency that will turn into a classic government boondoggle, benefiting selected constituencies and providing few genuine public benefits."

Predictions Of US Action On Climate Change Doubted. Wall Street Journal columnist Holman W. Jenkins, Jr. (1/24) writes this morning, "Pundits tell us the mood shift, with Democrats now in control, favors action on climate change. Don't bet on it. It's still going to be hard for the legislative process to get past the fact that nothing on the table or capable of commanding majority support would make the slightest difference to climate change." Jenkins adds, "A carbon tax would be the efficient way of encouraging businesses and consumers to make less carbon-intensive energy choices." But "because a carbon tax would lead to a direct (rather than surreptitious) increase in the cost of gasoline, the path of enlightenment will not be the path of politics." US policy "will consist of symbolism on global warming but nothing so costly and radical as to require true climate worrywarts to brighten up."

Congress May Revise Federal Mercury Pollution Policy. The Christian Science Monitor (1/24, Spotts, 59K) reports several "draft bills in Congress – as well as a suit in federal court – are challenging the Bush administration's mercury pollution program, which took effect last year. A key reason, they charge, is that the plan's emissions-trading scheme – which has worked to curb other pollutants that spread far and wide – doesn't work for mercury, which accumulates locally as well as spreading over long distances." Lawmakers on Capitol Hill are "preparing bills that would tackle the toxic pollutant in a more direct manner. They aim to reduce mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants by 90 percent, rather than the Environmental Protection Agency's (EPA's) target of 70 percent. The bills also would set up a nationwide monitoring network to track airborne mercury and its effects on the environment."

US Fines Cruise Line In Whale's Death. The Anchorage (AK) Daily News (1/24, Hunter) reports, "Princess Cruise Lines has agreed to pay $755,000 in fines and restitution to resolve accusations that one of its ships struck and killed a humpback whale near Glacier Bay more than five years ago." The News continues, "A court date to finalize a plea agreement is set for Monday in U.S. District Court in Anchorage. According to documents filed last week, Princess is expected to plead guilty to a single misdemeanor of 'failing to operate at a slow, safe speed while near humpback whales.' Under a plea agreement yet to be filed, the company would pay a $200,000 fine to the government and $550,000 in 'community service restitution' to the National Park Service Foundation, court papers say. That money would go to an account for Glacier Bay National Park." The News adds, "John Quinley, an Alaska spokesman for the National Park Service, said Justice department attorneys have told Park Service officials not to discuss the case at least until next week. The body of a 45-foot humpback was found floating near the mouth of Glacier Bay in mid-July 2001. A necropsy conducted at the time showed the animal died of massive skull fractures. A Princess vessel, the Dawn Princess, had been operating near two humpback whales a few days before, according to the court papers and news reports at the time."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Mexico's Attorney General Says Extradited Drug Suspects Could Return To Mexico. The AP (1/23) reported Mexico's attorney general "said an alarming increase in drug use in Mexico is leading cartels to fight primarily for markets and territory rather than shipping routes, as cocaine finds an easier market [in Mexico] than in the United States. Attorney General Eduardo Medina Mora also said Tuesday that a group of alleged drug traffickers extradited to the U.S. over the weekend could be returned to Mexican prisons once they are tried abroad, noting 'that possibility has not been discarded.'" The AP says his comments to congressional members that "some of the 15 extradited late Friday might wind up back in Mexico to serve unfinished sentences or face new trials seemed at odds with the expectations of U.S. officials, who apparently plan to keep them for life. On Monday, Karen Tandy…said that 'on behalf of the DEA, I have one last thing to say to these 15 criminals: Welcome to the first day of the rest of your lives.'" The AP story was used by the International Herald Tribune, France.

The San Diego Union-Tribune (1/23, Soto) reported that four "drug cartel leaders" extradited from Mexico "are expected to appear in San Diego federal court within weeks. Officials refused to give details about their transfer…for security reasons. … Tandy said the greatest coup was the extradition of Osiel Cárdenas, a former police officer accused of running the Gulf Cartel, and of having corrupted specially trained Mexican federal officers. 'For the past eight years, Osiel Cárdenas Guillen commanded one of the most brutal and powerful drug cartels in the world,' she said." Mexico's attorney general "has said the cartel leaders…were extradited to stop their communications from behind bars and to reduce risks of violence and escape."

Former Texas Police Officer Among Extradited Fugitives. In McAllen, Texas, the Monitor (1/23) reported one of the 15 fugitives Mexico "extradited to the United States Friday was a former officer in the Donna and Weslaco police departments whose confession nine years ago helped bring down a powerful Mexican cartel. Gilberto Salinas-Doria's arrival at Ellington Field Friday outside Houston capped 16 years on the run from a federal indictment in Brownsville. … Salinas-Doria skipped bail on a 1990 charge in Brownsville that he tried to buy thousands of pounds of marijuana. Drug cases were later opened against him in Georgia and Houston."

Violence Expected Due To Extraditions. The San Antonio Express-News (1/23) reported the removal of alleged Mexican "drug kingpin" Osiel Cárdenas Guillén from communication with his organization "raised questions about whether a power vacuum would usher in a wave of violence in Gulf Cartel territory, which reaches from Matamoros, across from Brownsville, to west of Nuevo Laredo. 'This is going to add to the ongoing war between these groups,' said Bruce Bagley, an expert on drug trafficking at the University of Miami. 'It happens every time you behead one of these organizations.' Violence in the short term is almost assured as the Gulf Cartel restructures itself and as the rival Sinaloa Cartel may perceive the group as vulnerable, Bagley said."

Calderón's Efforts Called Extraordinary. In an editorial, the Christian Science Monitor (1/24) writes, "A new Mexican president, Felipe Calderón, has taken extraordinary steps to give fresh hope to a country that needs it. He's extradited drug kingpins to the US and sent troops into violent drug zones. This just may be a Mexican leader the US can get behind." The U.S. "should back Calderón's bold moves. For starters, it can reduce its consumption of illegal drugs and make it more difficult for Mexicans to cross the border and abandon their country. But now may be the time for the US to ask what more it can do to finally help fix its neighbor's seemingly intractable social and economic problems."

Eleven Suspected Gang Associates Arrested In Massachusetts. In Springfield, the Republican (1/24) reports a local gang task force "arrested 11 suspected gang associates early yesterday morning, billing the effort as a coordinated attempt to beat back rising street crime. … In addition to the FBI and Springfield police, agents with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives joined in the sweep, plus U.S. Marshals, Massachusetts State Police and members of the Hampden County Sheriff's Department." The Republican says more arrests are expected to be announced today.

Prosecutors Say Chicago Car Dealers Created Haven For Drug Runners. The Chicago Sun-Times (1/23) reported two West Side auto dealer owners "lined their pockets by selling luxury SUVs for cash to drug dealers, who used them to smuggle cocaine or heroin. … The accusations came as the trial for Amir Hosseini and Hossein Obaei began in federal court. The men's dealerships...were shuttered by authorities in 2005 and more than 100 vehicles…were seized. … While seizing SUVs at the U.S.-Mexico border, the Drug Enforcement Administration and FBI discovered many were purchased at the West Side dealerships." The Sun-Times says Hosseini and Obaei "are accused of using their businesses as a haven for drug runners and gang-bangers, laundering millions of dollars."

Tennessee Newspaper Notes Cost Of Illegal Immigrant's Prosecution In Marijuana Case. The Knoxville (TN) News Sentinel (1/24, Satterfield) reports Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck "said [Juan] Lino-Gomez in a single transaction last July sold 100 pounds of marijuana. Unlucky for him, though, his customer turned out to be an undercover agent, and he and his alleged cohorts were arrested." But Lino-Gomez's case "is a primer on the price tag that prosecutions involving illegal immigrants can carry. Start with the salaries of lead investigators, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Todd Lee and Knoxville Police Department Investigator Bruce Conkey. Next, add in cash taxpayers fork out to cover Winck's salary."

Big City Mayors Hold Gun Summit In DC. The AP (1/24, Barrett) reports, "Dozens of mayors from around the country gathered Tuesday to urge the new Democratic Congress to fight crime by allowing wider tracking of illegal guns." The AP continues, "New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Boston Mayor Thomas Menino were joined by 50 other mayors, who argue more access to gun sales data would reduce crime in the streets of their cities. … Minneapolis, Miami, Newark, N.J., and Omaha, Neb., were among the cities represented." The AP adds, "Bloomberg, a moderate Republican, said it was time to 'begin showing Congress that it is possible to find common ground on common sense issues.' … 'We refuse to fall into the same old trap that it is an either-or: either respect the rights of gun owners or keep illegal guns out of the hands of criminals,' Bloomberg said. 'That's ideological nonsense, and we've just got to move past it.' … To buttress their case, several of the mayors cited the recent rises in violent crime across the country." The AP notes, "FBI data show that violent crime rose 3.7 percent nationwide in the first six months of 2006 compared to the previous year. .. In New York, the murder rate rose almost 10 percent in 2006, though the overall crime rate continued to decline."

The Washington Times (1/24, DeBose, 88K) reports "more than 120 of the nation's mayors urged Congress yesterday to allow federal and local law enforcement to share gun database tracking information in an effort to curtail the illegal sale of firearms." City executives "said they have run out of options to keep guns off their streets. Gun-buyback programs and stings on vendors who violate laws haven't solved the problem, they said." Mayors Michael R. Bloomberg of New York and Thomas M. Merino of Boston, "who in April formed a coalition called Mayors Against Illegal Guns, have crafted a policy agenda for Congress." The Mayors are "attempting to avoid serious conflicts with pro-gun groups, sportsmen and advocates of the Second Amendment, which protects Americans' right to bear arms."

Former ATF Agents Sue Chicago, Charging Police Corruption. The AP (1/24, Robinson) reports, "Chicago police retaliated with harsh reprisals against two government agents who blew the whistle on one of the city's most corrupt police officers ever, a federal court jury was told Tuesday." The AP continues, "Diane V. Klipfel and Michael V. Casali, a married couple who were agents with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, found their lives in ruins after they leveled corruption charges in 1992 at decorated narcotics investigator Joseph Miedzianowski, attorney Sally H. Saltzberg said. … 'They went to enormous lengths to retaliate against Diane and Mike for their allegations,' Saltzberg said during opening statements in the couple's civil lawsuit against the city." The AP adds, "Klipfel and Casali are seeking almost $10 million apiece in damages from the city, saying they were not only the targets of retaliation but the victims of a 'blue wall of silence' designed to cover up corruption. … City of Chicago attorney Stephen Baker scoffed at the notion that the city had any responsibility for the problems that beset the couple. … He told jurors that police officials all but begged ATF for information about wrongdoing on the part of Miedzianowski. But it was the Chicago police who were met with silence, Baker said."

IMMIGRATION:

Bush Urges Congress To Pass Immigration Reform. The Washington Times (1/24, Dinan, 88K) reports, "President Bush last night said his administration has made huge strides clamping down on illegal border crossings, and called on Congress to finish the job this year by passing a guest-worker bill and extending citizenship rights to illegal aliens." In a State of the Union address "designed to highlight areas where he could work with the new majority Democrats, Mr. Bush put immigration front and center, along with education, health care and energy policy -- all domestic issues where he thinks he can find common ground. 'Convictions run deep in this Capitol when it comes to immigration. Let us have a serious, civil and conclusive debate -- so that you can pass and I can sign comprehensive immigration reform,' Mr. Bush said." But "the president's push will isolate many conservative Republicans who oppose his immigration and education plans, and shows the precarious balancing act Mr. Bush will have to do with his own party as he works with Democrats to try to achieve legacy accomplishments."

The Wall Street Journal (1/24, A2, Kronholz, Lueck, 2.04M) says "Bush's call for an overhaul of immigration law is largely a reprise of earlier plans, but with a twist: With his party out of power on Capitol Hill, it could pass." Bush" elevated immigration to one of four domestic-policy priorities in his State of the Union address, even while offering an agenda similar to last year's plan. He proposed a temporary-worker plan, a path to legalization for some of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants, tougher border enforcement and measures to ensure employers hire only legal workers." Bush and congressional Democrats "agree on the outlines of a bill, but they are far apart on details. Both agree on helping employers fill jobs with temporary workers. Without that, they say, the US economy will remain a magnet for illegals. But the president insists those workers must eventually leave, a key demand of conservatives who fear the growing Hispanic population is undermining American culture. Generally, Democrats want to let them stay and eventually become citizens."

Rohrabacher's Body Language During Speech Noted. CNN's John Roberts noted he was watching Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R) who was "shaking his head through much of what the President was saying, particularly about the guest worker program. … Rohrabacher shook his head and refused to stand up."

Immigration Raids In South California Net 761 Arrests. The AP (1/24, Flaccus) reports from Santa Ana, CA, "Federal immigration officials said Tuesday they arrested more than 750 illegal immigrant fugitives from 14 countries in what they described as one of the biggest such sweeps in U.S. history." The AP continues, "The weeklong series of raids in the five-county Los Angeles region targeted illegal immigrants who had previously been deported for crimes or had ignored final deportation orders." The AP adds, "The raids netted 338 illegal immigrants who were arrested at their homes and apartments and 423 who were identified in area jails since Jan. 17. Those already jailed will be transferred to federal custody when they finish serving their state sentences, said Virginia Kice, spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. … The sweep netted illegal immigrants from Mexico, Honduras, Ukraine, India, Japan, Poland and Trinidad, among others. Of the 761 people arrested, more than 450 have already been deported, Kice said." The AP notes, "The raids were a major push within 'Operation Return to Sender,' a crackdown that has resulted in 13,192 arrests nationwide since late May. Immigration officials have also identified 3,000 inmates in state and local jails who will be deported. … The operation targets those illegal immigrants who hide after skipping their voluntary deportation proceedings and criminals who have re-entered the United States after being previously deported for crimes in the U.S."

TAX:

DOJ Seeks Back Taxes From Closed New York Center. The Buffalo News (1/24) reports, "In an attempt to recoup back taxes from the closed St. Augustine Center, the Tax Division of the U.S. Justice Department has filed a federal suit seeking to block state court action in the case." The News continues, "The Tax Division served papers Friday on State Supreme Court Justice John A. Michalek, who shut down the center last February, and Adam W. Perry, the attorney he assigned to close the books on the center and pay off unpaid workers. … U.S. District Judge John T. Elfvin has scheduled a hearing on the suit for Wednesday." The News adds, "Perry noted this is the third time in recent months that the Justice Department has sought to intervene in the state court action, in which he is seeking to partially compensate 85 employees, each now entitled to about $1,500, for their work during the final months. … The Justice Department lawsuit describes the court action as an effort to block Perry from distributing any funds collected for St. Augustine employees and 'enjoin the New York State Supreme Court, Erie County, from proceeding further in the receivership action.' … The federal government hopes to secure at least partial funding of the $699,553 in unpaid federal employment taxes, federal income tax liabilities and interest that continue to accumulate against the center."

DOJ_NMG_0120693

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Democrats Say Bush Healthcare Proposal "Dead On Arrival." In his State of the Union address yesterday evening, President Bush offered a new federal healthcare plan as part of his domestic agenda. Media coverage of Bush's speech focused primarily on Iraq, but national newspapers devoted some secondary stories to the healthcare plan. USA Today (1/24, 1B, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "Bush's State of the Union health care proposal couples an old idea, capping tax-free benefits for health care, with a new one: a standard deduction for all who buy health insurance. If approved, and the plan faces a chilly reception in the Democrat-controlled Congress, the administration says it would give people who buy their own health insurance equal tax breaks with those who get coverage through their jobs. The tax savings could help 3 million to 5 million of the nearly 47 million now-uninsured people buy coverage, the administration says. … A similar plan to cap tax-free health benefits offered by employers was proposed by President Reagan in 1986 but failed to pass Congress."

According to reports, Democrats have categorically rejected President Bush's healthcare plan. Under the headline "Bush's Insurance Plan Looks DOA," Roll Call (1/24, Stanton) reports, "Bush's call for a major overhaul of the employer-based health insurance system is unlikely to see much, if any, action in the Senate this year in the face of near-universal opposition from Democrats and a GOP base still stinging from the Social Security debacle in the 109th Congress. … Senate Democrats have largely dismissed the proposal, charging it will cause a significant tax burden on middle-class families."

USA Today (1/24, 1B, Appleby, 2.27M) reports, "Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif., chairman of a key health subcommittee in the House, said he would not even consider hearings on the proposal. He says it would give wealthier Americans with health insurance a far larger tax break than the lower-income uninsured that the plan purportedly aims to help."

The New York Times (1/24, Toner, Pear, 1.16M) reports "Congressional Democrats described the plan as a middle-class tax increase that would penalize people with good health benefits. They praised the new focus on health care, but said the Bush proposal was more likely to yield partisan debate than a search for consensus."

The Washington Times (1/24, Curl, 88K) reports, " As evidence of the partisanship in the House, Rep. Pete Stark, California Democrat and chairman of the Ways and Means health subcommittee, said he would not even consider holding hearings on the plan."

The Washington Post (1/24, A14, Weisman, Fletcher, 690K) reports "Democrats said they did not see much movement toward them beyond the rhetoric."

The Los Angeles Times (1/24, McManus, Reynolds, 850K) reports Democrats "criticized his healthcare plan as a threat to traditional employer-provided insurance."

The Wall Street Journal (1/24, Meckler, 2.04M) says the plan "could spell trouble for less-healthy workers who would likely pay higher premiums than they would if they were part of a group plan, critics say. … Critics also argue it would also do little to help those without insurance now. Most of the uninsured have relatively low incomes, meaning the new tax deduction for purchasing insurance on the open market is less valuable for them than for those who earn more."

The Chicago Tribune (1/24, Graham, 617K) summarizes the program and offers reaction from figures in the insurance agency and at think tanks. Karen Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans: "I think the president is jump-starting a national discussion over expanding health-care coverage." Meanwhile, Paul Fronstin, director of health research at the Employee Benefit Research Institute, "envisions a series of serious consequences. More employers would stop offering health insurance and younger and healthier workers would opt out of company plans if they could get better deals elsewhere." Also, "Robert Reischauer, president of the Urban Institute, worries that the president's plan would push more people into the individual insurance market, which is notorious for being expensive and excluding people with pre-existing medical conditions."

More Commentary. Editorials and op-eds offer a range of reaction to the plan, significantly, however, commentators also rap the Democrats for their immediate opposition to the president's plan. In a column appearing in the Washington Post (1/24, D1, 690K) Business section, Steven Pearlstein notes that Bush "last night in his State of the Union address that he is ready to come to the negotiating table on a range of domestic issues" including healthcare. Pearlstein writes, "[T]he most surprising and encouraging development is that a president who for six years has only nibbled around the edges of health-care issues has weighed in with some bold ideas to expand coverage, rein in costs and bring some fairness to the tax code. And get this: It actually involves raising taxes on the rich and lavishly insured and giving the money to the working poor and the uninsured. Given that, you'd think Democrats would have welcomed a politically courageous proposal to put a cap on one of the biggest and most regressive features of the individual income-tax code. But instead, they've shifted reflexively into partisan attack mode, mischaracterizing the impacts of the proposal and shamelessly parroting the propaganda from the labor dinosaurs at the AFL-CIO."

In her column in the Washington Post (1/24, A23, 690K), Ruth Marcus writes, "Listening to Democratic reaction to Bush's new health insurance proposal, you get the sense that if Bush picked a plank right out of the Democratic platform -- if he introduced Hillarycare itself -- and stuck it in his State of the Union address, Democrats would churn out press releases denouncing it. This sad situation is largely of Bush's own making. He is reaping the poisonous state of affairs that he helped sow for six years."

The New York Times editorializes, "Last night, Mr. Bush...acted as if he were really doing something to help the 47 million people in this country who don't have health insurance. What he offered, by the White House's own estimate, would take a few million off that scandalously high number and shift the burden to the states. Mr. Bush's plan would put a new tax on Americans who were lucky enough to still have good health-care coverage through their employers. Some large portion of those are middle class and represented by the labor unions that Mr. Bush and the Republicans are dedicated to destroying."

The Washington Post (1/24, A22, 690K) editorializes, "On health care, Mr. Bush would cap the currently unlimited tax deduction for employer-sponsored health insurance; he'd replace that with a standard deduction -- $15,000 for a family policy -- available for all insurance, whether offered by employers or bought privately. This would improve progressivity and fairness, and help contain health-care costs. As written, the proposal has flaws, but those can be addressed -- if Democrats are willing to do more than hurl criticism."

The Wall Street Journal (1/24, 2.04M) editorializes, "For all the griping about our system, Americans have the most advanced health care in the world in part because we still have something resembling a private market for insurance. But it is not a truly efficient market because current tax policy lets businesses -- but not individuals -- deduct the cost of health expenditures. Thus most Americans with private insurance get it from their employers, which leads to inequities and insulates individuals from the real cost of their treatment decisions. Mr. Bush's 'standard deduction' for health care would move in the direction of solving both problems." The Journal adds, "[T]he biggest problem with Mr. Bush's plan is that it wasn't offered two years ago, when it had a better chance to pass. The White House wasted its first term health energies on a failed attempt to buy votes with the Medicare drug benefit. Now the GOP is a minority in Congress, and Democrats aren't likely to favor Mr. Bush's ideas because they think health care is a winner for them in 2008."

The Washington Times (1/24, 88K) adds, "[T]his proposal to make the tax code fair and health care affordable comes from President Bush with a Congress under Democratic control in the run to a presidential election year. So it will be attacked for failing to be everything that everyone else's proposal is not. … It's not the entire answer, of course. Using existing monies to fund health care for children as tax credits for insurance would help, too. But you won't find the president's critics supporting his fair and compassionate plan."

The Pittsburgh Tribune-Review (1/24) editorializes, "Because many today have health insurance that covers even ordinary medical expenses, they have insufficient cause to restrain their use of services and demand efficiency and cost accountability from providers. … The Bush plan would institute some free-market-oriented elements. And that's why it's worth exploring further."

The Detroit Free Press (1/24, 373K) editorializes, "The details of the domestic agenda — on which Bush's advisers set up the speech to be judged — fell short of inspiration." On healthcare, the Free Press writes, "Bush offered a plan that would leave in the lurch those who need it most, punish those who have good coverage and discourage employers from offering top-notch benefits."

In an op-ed appearing in USA Today (1/24, 13A, 2.27M), Alan M. Webber, co-founding editor of Fast Company magazine, examines the healthcare debate in the context of US companies and competitiveness, particularly in the auto industry. He writes, "What if the real diagnosis of the competitive problems of GM, Ford and Chrysler, as well as many other deeply entrenched industrial companies, isn't really about health care costs? What if their problems aren't even about their products?... So how would reforming health care coverage change corporate culture? Imagine a shift in health care coverage that de-couples it from your job. … Imagine a chance to join a more entrepreneurial company, maybe even a start-up, without having to worry about health care costs. Imagine being the CEO of one of the old, ailing companies and suddenly realizing that, while your prayer for relief from your health-care-cost headache has been answered, all of a sudden, you've got a bigger malady: Your best employees no longer feel the need to put up with your stagnant organization just for the security of a lavish health care plan"

Bolten Hopeful White House, Congress Can Cooperate. The Politico (1/23, Allen) interviewed White House chief of staff Joshua B. Bolten. Asked for a "realistic assessment of what the president and Congress can accomplish this year," Bolten said, "I'm optimistic that the president's instinct to take on large issues will continue to be rewarded, even in the last two years of his term. The president's State of the Union is going to put on the table important reforms in health care, in energy, in the reauthorization of No Child Left Behind and in immigration. I think we have a good shot at substantial legislation in all of those." Bolten added what the "change in control means is that Democrats now will be under more pressure than they have been in the minority to deliver actual accomplishments." Bolten added there have been "good signs" for White House-congressional relations, such as "some of the personal relationships. The new leaders have been here to the White House and I think have established a pretty good dialogue directly with the president. There's been reasonably good tone in that dialogue."

House GOP Divisions First Test For Boehner. The Politico (1/23, O'Connor) reported last night that as House Republicans "depart today for a caucus retreat on Maryland's Eastern Shore, GOP ranks are increasingly divided over the best strategy for taking on the new Democratic majority." The dispute "is the first major test for new House Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, who is under pressure from some colleagues who believe he is too docile in challenging Democrats and laying the political foundation for a GOP comeback in 2008." Some Republicans are "advocating a wait-in-the-weeds strategy -- projecting an air of civility and selective cooperation with Speaker Nancy Pelosi and fellow Democrats, while waiting for the right moment to pounce for partisan gains." But many "backbench Republicans, joined by some members of the leadership team, believe it makes more sense to pounce early and often." Former Speaker Dennis Hastert "received a rousing ovation at a closed-door meeting in the Cannon Caucus Room last week when he urged colleagues to stand up and fight. Some members interpreted that as a veiled shot at Boehner." But Boehner said "the party can afford to be patient." Boehner said, "It's their honeymoon. We're not in a sprint here. We're in a marathon Chill out." The Politico adds President Bush "is scheduled to address the retreat on Friday, and some Republicans expect the three-day conference to be a contentious discussion about the direction of the party."

Roll Call (1/24, Duran, Drucker) reports some GOP strategists "say the party must woo independent voters and concentrate on issues important to them, such as economic matters, while others prefer the base-driven political tactics honed by Karl Rove and recently departed Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman in the past three elections." Those Republicans "espousing a more inclusive message say the results of the 2006 midterm elections repudiated the base-only strategy and signaled that if the GOP does not focus on rebuilding a governing coalition that elevates policy accomplishments above politics, they should get comfortable as the House and Senate's minority party."

House Votes To Block Pensions Of Convicted Lawmakers. The Washington Post (1/24, A4, Layton, 690K) reports the House "voted unanimously yesterday to deny federal pensions to lawmakers convicted of bribery, perjury and other related felonies." But the "punishment of those who betray the public trust will not be far-reaching. The measure is similar to one approved by the Senate last week and comes in the wake of major congressional scandals last year that led to the conviction of former Republican congressmen Randy 'Duke' Cunningham (Calif.) and Robert W. Ney (Ohio). The House passed the bill 431 to 0, with four members not voting." The bills "passed by the House and the Senate are not retroactive, which means that Cunningham and Ney will collect substantial pensions for the rest of their lives, courtesy of taxpayers." Both bills would also "allow the Office of Personnel Management, which calculates the pensions of members of Congress, to award the pensions of convicted lawmakers to their families, in cases of demonstrated financial need."

The Wall Street Journal/AP (1/24, A4) reports the "431-0 House vote comes four days after former Rep. Bob Ney (R., Ohio) received a 30-month prison term for taking political favors from Jack Abramoff, whose influence-peddling tactics helped make corruption a major issue in the November elections. Mr. Ney, as past chairman of the House Administration, backed similar legislation last year." The House bill, "like its Senate counterpart, isn't retroactive and wouldn't affect the benefits of Mr. Ney, who is eligible for a pension of about $29,000 a year if he waits until 2016, when he turns 62."

Pelosi Consolidating Power Within Democratic Caucus. Roll Call (1/24, Yachnin) reports that just "weeks into her tenure, Democratic Members and aides see" Speaker Nancy Pelosi "taking subtle steps to consolidate her power within the new House majority, provoking some grumbling, but largely avoiding any serious internal revolts as Democrats settle into their new roles." Pelosi has "made herself the Democratic Caucus' clear leader in formulating an agenda and message strategy, also while installing key staff at the party's campaign committee. At the same time, she is working to rein in the chamber's chairmen, an effort that aims to prevent the resurgence of largely autonomous chairmen that dominated the House chamber during the previous Democratic majority." Pelosi's efforts so far "are drawing largely muted reactions from the party's 21 newly installed chairmen — many of whom held gavels in the party's last majority 12 years ago. That initial response may not prevent troubles ahead, but for now, many are chalking up any discord to their new roles."

Presidential Race Could Prove Distraction For Democratic Leaders. Roll Call (1/24, Billings) reports, "Less than a month into their newly elected leadership roles," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid and Speaker Nancy Pelosi "already are confronting a vocal and prominent cast of Congressional Democratic presidential hopefuls who quickly are capturing the national spotlight." While many congressional Democrats "say publicly they have grown used to Members and Senators using Capitol Hill as a platform for White House runs, they privately acknowledge the early 2008 campaign could become a distraction, and the window will be narrow for Reid and Pelosi to drive the party agenda and set the tone in the early days of the 110th Congress." Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) "said the early primary season has 'got to be a distraction' for the Senate leadership and 'at times can be an annoyance,' but also said it can serve to help drive the debate and encourage discussions among political players."

Proposed Bush Library Generates Debate At SMU. ABC World News (1/23, story 7, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Southern Methodist University, SMU, in Dallas, is hardly a hotbed of protest. But plans to place the George W. Bush Presidential library at SMU has sparked a fierce debate on campus." ABC (Von Fremd) added, "At the heart of the debate here at SMU, the Bush legacy versus academic integrity versus a golden opportunity." Reverend William McElvaney, "Professor emeritus at SMU's school of theology, is 1 of 68 faculty members who oppose the Bush institution." Rev. William McElvaney, SMU: "I think the think tank has the danger of developing a political philosophy that is identified with the school that could well compromise our academic integrity." Von Fremd: "Scholars say the few schools fortunate enough to have" a presidential library "consider them a treasure. But scholars say it will enhance the reputation of the university, attract scholars from around the world as well as top students from across the country."

GAO Criticizes Administration For Declining Drug Subsidy For Federal Workers. The Washington Post's (1/24, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports that the Bush administration declined to participate in a "2003 law that allows employers to receive subsidies for prescription drug coverage on the condition that they provide a benefit for their Medicare-eligible retirees that is at least as good as the Medicare drug plan. The government, of course, is an employer, operating a medical-insurance program, but Bush officials decided it made little sense for the government, in effect, to pay a subsidy to itself." The Post adds that the GAO has "questioned" that decision in "a report" in which "GAO analysts think that allowing Uncle Sam to move money from one pocket to another would probably lower premiums in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, which provides medical coverage to about 8 million people." The Post adds that OPM "has ruled out applying for the Medicare subsidy," and adds that "the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association has criticized the OPM for refusing to seek the Medicare subsidy, contending that the OPM is missing out on $1 billion annually." NARFE president Margaret L. Baptiste, "said yesterday that the White House budget office and the OPM 'should explain to federal workers, retirees and survivor annuitants, who often struggle to pay their steadily increasing premiums, why the federal government failed to do what a multitude of other employers have done to reduce this burden.'"

NYTimes Print Lyrics Of Song Mocking Bush. Under the headline "State of the Union: Another Take," the New York Times (1/24, 1.16M) prints on its editorial page the lyrics to a song performed by Randy Newman at Carnegie Hall in 2006 titled "A Few Words in Defense of Our Country." In the song, Newman jests, "Now the leaders we have, while they're the worst that we've had, are hardly the worst this poor world has seen."

WSJournal Critical Of Democratic Senators For Not Supporting Rescission Bill. The Wall Street Journal (1/24, A12, 2.04M) writes in an editorial about New Hampshire Sen. Judd Gregg's (R) bill to offer the president "'rescission' authority" that the bill "is nearly identical to a rescission amendment offered by former Democratic Senator (and one-time Majority Leader) Tom Daschle in 1995" that was supported by "37 Democrats…and 20 of them are still in the Senate." The Journal notes prior support by Democratic Sens. Robert Byrd, Dianne Feinstein, Russ Feingold, Patty Murray, Byron Dorgan, Chris Dodd, Carl Levin and Joe Biden, adding "if this crowd meant what they said, Mr. Gregg will easily get the 60 votes he needs to overcome a filibuster. Yet so far not a single Democrat has publicly supported the measure."

WPost Urges Democrats To Support Full House Representation For DC. The Washington Post (1/24, A22, 690K) writes in an editorial, "An early test of the courage and leadership of the new Democratic-controlled Congress will come on the question of extending full voting rights in the House of Representatives to the District of Columbia." The Post urges Democrats to support "a bipartisan measure co-sponsored by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and D.C. Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D)" that "would add two full-voting seats to Congress -- one for the mostly Democratic District and one for mostly Republican Utah." So "why is the Democratic leadership dithering?"

NYTimes Calls For Reform Of Drug-Manufacturing Loophole. The New York Times (1/24,

1.16M) editorializes, "Two excessively lenient court decisions have allowed the manufacturers of brand-name drugs to resume the underhanded practice of paying generic competitors to keep their drugs off the market. It is a costly legal loophole that needs to be plugged by Congressional legislation. … The Federal Trade Commission, which has been waging a valiant fight, succeeded for several years in eliminating such settlements. But two appeals court decisions in 2005 held that they are a legitimate way to resolve patent disputes. And sure enough, the F.T.C. reported last week that — after a five-year hiatus — brand-name companies made 3 such do-not-compete settlements in fiscal year 2005 and 14 more last year."

Energy Stocks Lead Wall Street Rally. The CBS Evening News (1/23, story 9, :15, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Crude oil prices surged more than $2 a day, triggering a rally among energy stocks. The Dow finished up more than 56 points [to close at 12,533.80]. The Nasdaq was up a fraction [to close at 2,431.41]."

NBC Nightly News (1/23, story 11, :15, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street, those energy stocks were up on that news, which pushed the Dow higher by almost 57 points [to close at 12,533.80]. NASDAQ at the end of the day up less than 1 point [to close at 2,431.41]."

Tennessee High Court Rules Against US Foster Parents. The Washington Post (1/24, A3, Jones) reports, "The Tennessee Supreme Court ruled yesterday that a 7-year-old girl raised by an American couple since infancy must be returned to her Chinese parents, who say they never intended to give her up for adoption." The Post continues, "Shaoqiang He, a 42-year-old restaurant manager in Memphis, said he will probably return to China with his family after a transition period for Anna Mae He. She turns 8 on Sunday and has spent all but the first three weeks of her life with foster parents Jerry and Louise Baker. … 'We have a big bedroom for her in our apartment, and we're going to buy clothing and furniture for her,' He said in the telephone interview. 'She knows by her face that she is Chinese, and she must be asking the Bakers, "Where is my mom? Where is my dad?"' … Neither the Bakers nor their attorneys could be reached for comment. The Bakers have the option of appealing on the federal-court level. Tuesday's ruling set no timetable or conditions for Anna's return, leaving that for a lower court to iron out."

USA Today (1/24, 6D, Davis) reports, "The court ordered the Juvenile Court of Shelby County to reunite the child with her parents, who have been aided by pro bono lawyers. Psychologists will help her make the transition, lawyers say." USA continues, "The custody fight, which made headlines around the world, pitted the Hes against Jerry and Louise Baker of Cordova, Tenn. The Bakers took Anna Mae in soon after she was born at the Hes' request as they struggled with legal, financial and health problems. … The Hes have insisted they never intended to permanently relinquish custody. But the Bakers have long wanted to legally adopt Anna Mae and originally accused the Hes of abandoning the child. They have maintained that she would have a better life with them." USA adds, "The Hes had visited Anna Mae for a time, but things came to a head on her second birthday, on Jan. 28, 2001, when Casey refused to leave without her daughter. The Bakers called the police and five months later petitioned a court to revoke the Hes' parental rights. .. In its ruling Tuesday, the court said that 'the evidence overwhelmingly shows that the parents' voluntary relinquishment of custody was entered as a temporary measure to provide health insurance.'"

Jennings Receives Help From Democrats In Challenge To FL13 Election. The Miami Herald (1/24, Clark, 286K) reports 2006 FL13 Democratic candidate Christine Jennings, who is contesting the election, "wasn't able to line up and shake President Bush's hand when he walked down the House aisle Tuesday night to deliver his State of the Union address, but she did get a chance to make her point." She "sat in the House gallery to the president's right -- a symbol of the fact Democrats are not relinquishing dibs on the seat -- despite the presence of Rep. Vern Buchanan, R-Sarasota, who, as a member of Congress, got a seat on the floor." She "remains a favorite on Capitol Hill. She attended a breakfast Tuesday for new Democratic members of Congress and spent some of the day working the phones at the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, which helped her set up a fundraising account for the election challenge." Jennings "said she was warmly greeted at the breakfast and encouraged to keep waging the battle. One member, she noted, has received more than 100 letters from constituents alarmed about the lack of paper ballots for voting machines."

Obama Refusing Donations From Registered Lobbyists. Roll Call's "K Street Files" (1/24, Ackley) reports, "Any penny-pinching lobbyists looking to save a few thousand dollars in the sure-to-break-records 2008 presidential race have the perfect candidate to throw their theoretical support behind: Sen. Barack Obama. Not only has Obama's presidential exploratory committee said it will refuse all donations from political action committees, but it also is barring cash from registered federal lobbyists. Word has just started to spread among K Street's Democrats that when it comes to the candidate's coffers, they're off the hook." An unidentified lobbyist "said Obama can likely succeed in raising the $50 million he'll need to be competitive in early primaries through online donations and grass-roots support from beyond the Beltway, other Democratic contenders such as Sens. Chris Dodd (Conn.) and Joseph Biden (Del.) would find that banning lobbyists' contributions 'could potentially affect their ability to remain competitive' since both have large donor networks in the advocacy world. The party's frontrunner, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) will cash lobbyists' campaign donations, too. But former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) won't. "

Watergate Burglar Hunt Dies. The AP (1/24, Reynolds) reports E. Howard Hunt, "who helped organize the Watergate break-in, leading to the greatest scandal in American political history and the downfall of Richard Nixon's presidency, died Tuesday. He was 88." Hunt was "many things: World War II soldier, CIA officer, organizer of both a Guatemalan coup and the botched Bay of Pigs invasion, and author of more than 80 books, many from the spy-tale genre. Yet the bulk of his notoriety came from the one thing he always insisted he wasn't — a Watergate burglar. He often said he preferred the term 'Watergate conspirator.'"

The Washington Post (1/24, A1, Sullivan, 690K) reports on its front page that Hunt, "the shadowy former CIA man who organized the Watergate break-in and other 'dirty tricks' that ultimately brought down the presidency of Richard M. Nixon, died of complications from pneumonia yesterday at a hospital in Miami." Hunt "spent 33 months in prison for his role in the Watergate burglary. He was bitter that Nixon did not stand up for him. President Ronald Reagan rejected a pardon request for Hunt in 1983."

Conservatives Said To Have More Optimistic View Of Economy. Arthur C. Brooks, professor of public administration at Syracuse University's Maxwell School of Public Affairs and author of "Who Really Cares: The Surprising Truth About Compassionate Conservatism" (Basic Books, 2006), writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/24, A13, 2.04M), "Conservatives are relatively untroubled by inequality, and unsupportive of government income redistribution, because they believe the American economy provides private opportunities to succeed. Liberals are far more pessimistic than conservatives about the possibility of a better future for Americans of modest means." So "conservatives' lack of anxiety about income inequality -- and perhaps even their opposition to redistributive government policies -- is evidence of a light heart, not a hard one."

NYTimes Critical Of Schumer-Bloomberg Report Calling For "Looser Regulations." The New York Times (1/24, 1.16M) writes in an editorial, "A healthy financial sector is crucial to the economic well-being of this country and to New York City in particular" but "beware of the doomsayers who argue that American markets are in free fall and…contend that looser regulations are the only way to save them." The paper is critical of a report by New York Sen. Charles Schumer (D) and New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg (R) which "seems to cull facts to prove predetermined conclusions." The Times favors "loosening restrictions on work visas for talented foreigners" and "efforts under way to reduce the costs associated with complying with Sarbanes-Oxley regulations" but it concludes, "financial firms might take a look in the mirror and ask whether lower underwriting fees and smaller bonuses could also contribute to their long-term health and the health of America's financial markets."

Petraeus Expresses Confidence In Bush's Plan For Iraq. The CBS Evening News (1/23, story 3, 2:40, Couric, 7.66M) reported Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, "the man chosen to command what may well be the last chance to salvage victory in Iraq had this stark warning of what to expect from the troop surge ordered by President Bush." Petraeus was shown testifying that "the way ahead will be neither quick nor easy, and there undoubtedly will be tough days." CBS went on to report, "Famous for challenging 20-year-old soldiers to push-up contests and winning, Petraeus has a near-perfect resume for the job. … Petraeus seems certain to be confirmed as the next commander in Iraq. But his chances of success are anything but certain." NBC Nightly News (1/23, story 3, , Williams, 9.87M) reported Petraeus "insisted the mission to stem the violence in Baghdad can and must succeed. … But even by his own numbers, the current plan comes up short. Petraeus himself wrote the Army's new doctrine on counter-insurgency, which suggests it would take 120,000 US and Iraqi troops to secure Baghdad, but Petraeus will have only 85,000 combined forces."

The AP (1/24, Burns) reports Petraeus "cautioned…against expecting quick results and used bleak terms to describe a country engulfed in war for nearly four years. Yet, he said the strategy can work as long as the Iraqis do their part." The New York Times (1/24, Gordon, 1.16M) adds that Petraeus contended "the new military strategy to secure Baghdad can work, and that he had asked that the additional troops the administration promised be deployed as quickly as possible. He asserted that the 'persistent presence' of American and Iraqi forces in strife-ridden Baghdad neighborhoods was a necessary step, but also cautioned that the mission would not succeed if the Iraqi government did not carry out its program of political reconciliation." ABC World News (1/23, story 3, :35, Gibson, 8.78M) noted Petraeus "warned it will take months to know if the mission is successful."

According to the Washington Post (1/24, A10, Tyson, 690K) Petraeus "voiced confidence…in a new approach that would shift the focus to protecting the population by pushing tens of thousands of additional U.S. and Iraqi troops deep into Baghdad neighborhoods, one aimed at allowing Iraq's government to 'come to grips with' what he called an 'exceedingly difficult situation.'" Petraeus "promised simply to provide 'the best leadership and direction I can muster' and 'forthright' military advice, even if he concludes the mission is lost. 'Should I determine that the new strategy cannot succeed, I will provide such an assessment,' he said, reassuring senator after senator that he would speak up if he believed U.S. civilian leaders were making false statements about Iraq." Sen. Bill Nelson "asked if Petraeus had a 'high degree of confidence' that the new plan would work. 'I believe this plan can succeed if in fact all of those enablers and all the rest of the assistance is provided,' Petraeus said, adding that interagency help for the war effort 'needs to be substantially more robust than it is.'" The Christian Science Monitor (1/24, Grier, 59K) contends Petraeus "was bluntly critical about the current situation in Iraq –perhaps more so than any Bush administration or military witness, ever."

Petraeus Peppered With Questions On Anti-Surge Resolutions. The AP (1/24, Burns) reports that though Petraeus "was warmly received by members of the panel, the war he will help lead -- and Bush's plan to prevail in it -- faced a rougher reception." The Los Angeles Times (1/24, Barnes, 850K) reports Petraeus admitted the situation in Iraq is "dire" and predicted "tough days" ahead, but "he pleaded for time to begin executing a new strategy." The Times characterizes Petraeus as "forthcoming and occasionally blunt" and goes on to point out that "throughout his hearing, Petraeus appeared assured and confident, answering questions crisply and directly." Asked by Sen. Joe Lieberman if "passage of a resolution denouncing the new Bush strategy would show the enemy that the American people are divided, Petraeus answered yes, it would. After other senators -- both Republicans and Democrats -- objected, Petraeus backed away." When Sen. John Thune "tried to get him to take another swipe at the resolution, Petraeus became more diplomatic. 'Learning that mine fields are best avoided and gone around rather than walked through on some occasions, I'd like to leave that one there, senator,' Petraeus said."

The Washington Times (1/24, Scarborough, 88K), in an article titled, "Anti-surge Efforts Called Enemy Hope," reports Petraeus testified that "pending Senate resolutions against a surge…give the enemy hope by depicting America as divided on winning the war." The Hill (1/24, Tiron) reports that "in a rare move for a uniformed officer…Petraeus, considered a shoo-in to become America's next top commander in Iraq, jumped into the political fray of his nomination hearing. … Petraeus spoke out against congressional attempts to pass resolutions of disapproval on the new White House strategy in Iraq." The New York Times (1/24, Gordon, 1.16M) add that Sen. John Warner, "who is promoting a resolution opposing Mr. Bush's troop reinforcement plan, cautioned General Petraeus to be sure that 'this colloquy has not entrapped you into some responses that you might later regret.'" Sen. Carl Levin, chairman of the panel, "said later that he was satisfied that the general had not intended to involve himself in the debate." The Times adds that the "exchanges at the hearing did not appear to have any ill effect on the prospects for the confirmation of General Petraeus." Sen. John McCain "said he hoped the commander would 'catch the next flight' to Iraq after winning Senate confirmation." The Washington Post (1/24, A21, Ricks, 690K) runs a separate piece on the exchange between Warner and Petraeus, noting Warner "explained to the general that he needed to be more careful about appearing to wade into a political debate and warned Petraeus to not let himself be trapped into portraying members of Congress as unpatriotic for disagreeing with President Bush:"

USA Today (1/24, Brook, 2.27M) reports that during the hearing Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton "said Bush's plan 'inspires skepticism for good reason.' She accused former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld of refusing to adapt to increasing violence in Iraq and the previous Republican-led Congress for failing to challenge the administration's strategy there. She said she disapproved of the plan and called it a 'dead end.'" Sen. McCain "also criticized the administration's approach in Iraq. 'We've made many, many mistakes in this war,' McCain said. Among them, he said, were sending too few troops for the initial invasion in March 2003 and not responding to the 'hostile actions' of Iraqi religious sects." The Politico (1/24) reports Sen. Susan Collins "told Petraeus…that she wished success for the surge strategy -- and its other economic and political components -- and seemed to express hope that her resolution wouldn't be needed. 'Nothing divides us in our common support that we hope we're wrong,' she admitted, 'and that this strategy is a success.'"

The Financial Times (1/24, Sevastopulo) says, "Appearing more confident before the committee than Gen George Casey, the outgoing commander, Gen Petraeus waded into the political debate by agreeing…that congressional resolutions of opposition would send the wrong message to US troops and the enemy in Iraq." Sen. Lindsey Graham is quoted as saying, "No matter how well-intentioned, a resolution…opposed to this new strategy is a vote of no confidence. … Those people going to fight this war are going to say, well, I'm going, but the Congress says good luck, but you're going to lose."

Senators Said To Have Extended An Extraordinarily Warm Welcome To Petraeus. The Washington Post's David Ignatius (1/24, A23) writes that though "fundamentals on the ground appear as bleak as ever, and polls show the public doubts the war is winnable. But Petraeus offers something new: He is the last frail hope for a bipartisan consensus on Iraq. Petraeus won plaudits yesterday from nearly every member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, continuing the celebratory tone that greeted his nomination by President Bush. Even Sen. Edward Kennedy, one of the sharpest critics of the war, had good things to say about the new commander."

The New York Times' Maureen Dowd (1/24) writes "senators happily blew a chance to grill…Petraeus, W.'s choice to try to rescue Iraq, on whether those 21,500 additional troops will be cavalry to the rescue or lambs to the slaughter. Why dwell on the most consequential elements of American strategy when they can linger over something even more repercussive: their own political reputations?"

Senate Democrats Advocate Merging Anti-Surge Resolutions. The New York Times (1/24, Hulse, Zeleny, 1.16M) reports, "As they prepared for the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to consider the issue on Wednesday, both Democrats and Republicans said the two bipartisan resolutions were in fundamental agreement on objecting to the troop increase. 'The resolutions are so close in terms of the key issue: whether or not we support an increase in military involvement and increasing the number of troops in Iraq or not,' said Senator Carl Levin…a co-author of one proposal. 'There are other language issues, obviously, but they are not particularly significant. The likeness and the similarities far, far, far outweigh any language differences.'" Majority leader Sen. Harry Reid "said a hybrid version of the resolutions would produce a clearer sign of the depth of opposition to the president's plan than either of the proposals could individually." However, Sen. John Warner, "lead author of the other proposal, said he saw important distinctions between them. He said he was not prepared to enter any negotiations until after he saw wording approved by the Foreign Relations Committee." The Times notes that the proposal from Mr. Warner, and Sens Susan Collins and Ben Nelson, "declares that the president is the commander in chief and that it is not the Senate's intent to contravene his authority — wording that drew the attention of some lawmakers."

The Hill (1/24, Schor) reports Senate Democrats "worked to bridge the gap between the chamber's two resolutions…although the stronger language of Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph Biden (D-Del.) will form the basis of that panel's markup today. Ongoing negotiations are intended to combine Biden's measure, cosponsored by Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) and GOP Sens. Olympia Snowe (Maine) and Chuck Hagel (Neb.), with a less critical resolution released this week by Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and three senior Republicans, all up for reelection in 2008."

Biden, Hagel Outline Alternative To Bush's Strategy. In an op-ed for the USA Today (1/24, 13A, 2.27M) Sens. Joseph Biden and Chuck Hagel write, "We agree with the president that our previous strategy in Iraq was failing. Equally, we are convinced that to succeed in Iraq, America's objective and strategy must enjoy the support of the American people and a bipartisan support in Congress. … The primary objective of America's strategy should be to help Iraqis achieve a political settlement in Iraq, secure support for that settlement from Iraq's neighbors and refocus the mission of our remaining troops on achievable objectives."

McCain Lashes Out At Cheney, Pentagon's "Bureaucratic Resistance" To Surge. In a piece from The Politico (1/23, Simon) that reverberated through the blogosphere yesterday, Sen. John McCain "blamed Vice President Cheney for what McCain calls the 'witch's brew' of a 'terribly mishandled' war in which U.S. forces are on the verge of defeat. … Although McCain had once lavished praise on the vice president, he said in an interview in his Senate office: 'The president listened too much to the Vice President…of course, the president bears the ultimate responsibility, but he was very badly served by both the Vice President and, most of all, the Secretary of Defense.' McCain added: 'Rumsfeld will go down in history, along with McNamara, as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history.'" According to The Politico, McCain "is making clear his frustrations with the Bush administration, the Iraqi military and 'bureaucratic resistance' in the Pentagon to a troop surge. … He said, 'There is still enormous bureaucratic resistance (to the troop surge) in the Pentagon, and it bothers me a great deal. The bureaucrats in the military are saying this is a terrible strain on the (National) Guard and the active duty forces, and it is. There is only one thing worse than an over-stressed military, and that's a defeated military. And we are on the verge of that.'"

Sen. Trent Lott, appearing on MSNBC's Hardball (1/23) told host Chris Matthews that he is backing Sen. John McCain's presidential bid, but he acknowledged being surprised by McCain's criticism of Vice president Cheney in yesterday's Politico. Lott added, "we all say things sometimes that maybe went a little further than we would want to, in retrospect. … I know he's unhappy that we should have done a surge or increase in numbers earlier. He's made that clear for three years.

Gingrich Accuses Bush Of Basing Iraq Policy On "Inherent Contradiction." Fox News' Special Report (1/23, Hume) reported former House Speaker Newt Gingrich "blasted the White House for basing its new Iraq policy on what he called an 'inherent contradiction.' Gingrich: "If Iraq is genuinely a matter of vital national interest, then, as Americans, we have an obligation to do what it takes to win. If Iraq is so unimportant that it is up to a new, relatively incompetent Iraqi government, then why are we risking a single young American? They cannot both be true."

US Officials Confirm Fewer Bodies Have Been Found Around Baghdad Recently. The Los Angeles Times (1/24, Daragahi, 850K) reports, "Iraqi authorities found 19 bodies of young men scattered around Baghdad on Tuesday, a sharp drop from the scores found each day several weeks ago. The reported daily body count for the last week or so has hovered around 30 or lower. The bodies of late also have not shown signs of torture often associated with Shiite Muslim militias, morgue and hospital officials say. Officials cautioned that the casualty figures were preliminary and sketchy. Previous drops in Baghdad violence have been followed by upsurges. … U.S. military officials in the capital's tumultuous northern district of Adhamiya confirmed the statistical drop shown in morgue and police casualty figures collected daily by the Los Angeles Times." The Times adds, "Some observers speculated that the drop in the number of bodies bearing marks of torture indicated a decline in Shiite militia activity."

US Cracks Down On Shia Militants. The Financial Times (1/24, Negus) reports, "More than 600 members of Iraq's Mahdi Army are in detention awaiting prosecution, the US military announced in a statement late on Monday – the latest indication that operations against the radical Shia militia have been stepped up and that Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has withdrawn political protection from the group. The statement is unusual in that it detailed the number of operations against specific organisations and seems intended to show that there is a new emphasis on neutralising the Mahdi Army." Maliki "may have decided that he needed to move against the militia to avoid losing US support and to avoid further alienating Iraq's Sunni Arab neighbours, or because he feels that his support among the Shia has been strengthened after the execution of Saddam Hussein." The FT continues, "The Sadrists' apparent acquiescence to the dismantling of their military wing however might not last, if Sunni insurgents succeed in striking at Shia civilian targets."

Baghdad Bombing Wave Tied To US Troop Increase. The Christian Science Monitor (1/24, Grier, 59K) reports, "Sectarian violence in Iraq's capital has spiked in recent days, even as the first US and Iraqi government military reinforcements have deployed into the embattled city. The car bombs that racked Baghdad Monday may not have been a response to the presence of new troops, strictly speaking. But if nothing else, they emphasize the chaos into which the city has sunk, and the prospect that the new US and Iraqi troops may be at just the beginning of what promises to be a difficult and protracted counterinsurgency campaign."

Five Americans Killed After Insurgents Fire On Their Helicopters. ABC World News (1/23, story 4, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "And a helicopter, owned by the private security firm, Blackwater USA, crashed in central Iraq. Five civilians were killed. A senior Iraqi defense official said the aircraft was shot down over a predominately Sunni neighborhood. And an insurgent group did claim responsibility." NBC Nightly News (1/23, story 4, :30, Williams, 9.87M) reported, There are conflicting reports tonight from the US military in Iraq and here in Washington about whether or not that chopper had been shot down."

The New York Times (1/24, Santora, Glanz, 1.16M) reports several helicopters "came under attack, and one plummeted to the pavement through a tangle of electrical wires in one of Baghdad's most dangerous neighborhoods. The four-man crew in one helicopter was killed, and the gunner in a second helicopter apparently died when he was struck by gunfire, American officials said. The crash set off a chaotic five-hour battle in which American attack helicopters crisscrossed the skies over Baghdad and fired at least one Hellfire missile into the streets below. It is unclear if the first helicopter, nicknamed a Little Bird because it is small and nimble, crashed as the result of gunfire, because it got tangled in the wires or as it was trying to land because a passenger was wounded. But an American military official said that at least four of the victims had suffered gunshot wounds to the head, raising the prospect that some of them had been shot on the ground."

The Washington Post (1/24, A10, Londono, Partlow, Deyoung, 690K) reports, "The helicopter crashed after being 'riddled with small-arms fire,' a State Department official said. The official said it was unclear whether the men aboard died from gunfire or from the impact of the crash. No State Department employees were hurt in the attack, but some vehicles were destroyed, according to the summary of events in the report. Other vehicles in the convoy returned safely to the Green Zone. Two separate Sunni insurgent groups, Ansar al-Sunnah and the Islamic Army in Iraq, asserted responsibility for the attacks on Web sites used by the groups. The accounts differ in significant detail, although Ansar published photos of what it said were the U.S. Embassy badge, credit cards and dog tags of one of the men killed in the attack."

ABC Crew Witnesses IED Blast. ABC World News (1/23, story 5, 2:35, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "We had a very stark reminder today of the dangers that American soldiers face on a daily basis in Iraq. It occurred as ABC's Chris Cuomo and his camera man, Bartley Price, traveled with an American patrol in one of the most dangerous neighborhoods." ABC added, "This is what soldiers refer to as a routine patrol in Iraq. Ghazaliya, in northwest Baghdad. ... Suddenly, a deafening blast. The bodies were booby-trapped. The blast cripples two Humvees. Blowing out their tires. ... The gunner spits out glass but never misses a beat. Bullets fly, but the patrol recovers quickly, making it back to the Iraqi police station."

The Washington Post (1/24, C7, Kurtz, 690K) notes, "The harrowing episode unfolded almost one year after another roadside bomb in Iraq badly injured ABC anchor Bob Woodruff, who is still recovering from head wounds.

Medical Care For Wounded Troops In Iraq Described. NBC Nightly News (1/23, story 5, 2:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported its chief science correspondent Robert Bazell "has traveled to the US Army's 28th Combat Support hospital in Baghdad's Green Zone, where he has seen the extraordinary work of some extraordinary doctors and nurses."

Friedman Deplores Muslim World's Indifference To Mass Killing In Iraq. The New York Times' Thomas Friedman (1/24) writes, "It's hard to know what's more disturbing: the barbaric sectarian murders by Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq, or the deafening silence with which these mass murders are received in the Muslim world. How could it be that Danish cartoons of Muhammad led to mass violent protests, while unspeakable violence by Muslims against Muslims in Iraq every day evokes about as much reaction in the Arab-Muslim world as the weather report? … Without a Muslim counternihilism strategy that delegitimizes the mass murder of Muslims by Muslims, there is no hope for decent politics there."

Maliki's Capacity To Rise Above Sectarian Divisions Questioned. USA Today (1/24, 1A, Jervis, 2.27M), in a front-page story titled, "Can Al-Maliki Make The Bush Plan For Iraq Work?: Critics ask whether prime minister will go after Shiite militias," reports, "For most of his life, Nouri al-Maliki, a Shiite Arab, says he has been persecuted and hunted by the Sunnis who dominated the government of Saddam Hussein. Now, as Iraq's prime minister, al-Maliki must make peace between the two bitterly divided Muslim factions. President Bush has said that al-Maliki's ability to do that, and to shift responsibility from U.S. forces to Iraq's military and police, may determine the nation's fate." USA Today goes on to report, "Al-Maliki's critics accuse him of protecting Shiite allies with blood on their hands. Since taking office last May, al-Maliki has blocked several attempts by U.S. and Iraqi troops to confront the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia group led by one of al-Maliki's key political supporters, the rebel cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. Al-Maliki's 'personality and background make reconciliation impossible,' says Saleh al-Mutlaq, a leading Sunni politician."

Draft National Intelligence Estimate Finds Maliki Faces Long Odds. The Washington Post (1/24, A4, Pincus, 690K) reports the draft of a new National Intelligence Estimate on Iraq "says it will be 'very difficult' but 'not impossible'" for the Maliki government "to succeed in providing better governance," said Thomas Fingar, the deputy director of national intelligence for analysis and chairman of the National Intelligence Council. Fingar gave the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence "a rare preview of what the classified National Intelligence Estimate (NIE) will say when it is completed at the end of the month. 'Gains in stability could open a window for gains in reconciliation among and between sectarian groups and could open the possibilities for a moderate coalition that could permit better government,' Fingar said, but "it will be very difficult for the Maliki government to do this."

Prolonged Absence Of Most MPs Cripples Iraq's Parliament. The New York Times (1/24, Cave, 1.16M) reports Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, the speaker of Parliament, "read a roll call of the 275 elected members with a goal of shaming the no-shows. Ayad Allawi, the former prime minister? Absent, living in Amman and London. Adnan Pachachi, the octogenarian statesman? Also gone, in Abu Dhabi. Others who failed to appear Monday included Saleh Mutlak, a senior Sunni legislator; several Shiites and Kurds; and Ayad al-Samaraei, chairman of the finance committee, whose absence led Mr. Mashhadani to ask: 'When will he be back? After we approve the budget?'" According to the Times, "Parliament in recent months has been at a standstill. Nearly every session since November has been adjourned because as few as 65 members made it to work, even as they and the absentees earned salaries and benefits worth about $120,000. Part of the problem is security, but Iraqi officials also said they feared that members were losing confidence in the institution and in the country's fragile democracy."

Security Concerns And Debate Over Revenue Hold Up Iraq Oil Projects. The Washington Post (1/24, D1, Mufson, 690K) reports, "Four months ago, about 80 oil company executives and consultants packed an office on St. James's Square in London for a briefing on exploration prospects in Iraq's Kurdish region and a Kurdish draft of an Iraqi national petroleum law. Despite the immense risks of working in Iraq -- pipeline explosions, kidnappings, insurgency, political infighting -- the oil company executives were lured by the potential rewards, which are immense, too. Outside Saudi Arabia, no country has proven oil reserves as big as Iraq's." However, "Four months after the London meeting, however, security remains elusive and so does the national petroleum law. Barham Saleh, Iraq's deputy prime minister, said in a recent telephone interview that a compromise was 'very, very close.' The proposed law has taken on significance beyond oil. While Iraq and foreign oil companies are eager to tap new revenue, the Bush administration and many Iraqis also hope that the law can be a model for resolving disputes and can bind Iraq's warring factions together."

Suicide Bomber Kills Eight Outside Of NATO Base In Afghanistan. The New York Times (1/24, Wafa, 1.16M) reports, "A suicide bomber wearing an explosive vest blew himself up Tuesday at the entrance to a NATO base in the southeastern province of Khost, killing 8 to 10 people, officials said. The attack occurred as Afghan laborers were lining up for security checks at the pedestrian entrance of the base known as Camp Salerno. The bomber was trying to enter the base, NATO said, but detonated the vest when he reached the search point."

General Says Larger Army Would Cost $70 Billion. The AP (1/23, Jelinek) reports, "Increasing the size of the Army, strained by America's two ongoing wars, will cost an estimated $70 billion, a top Army general said Tuesday. And if yet another conflict were to develop before the force can be bolstered, it would take longer to fight and cost more American casualties than otherwise might be expected, said Lt. Gen. Stephen Speakes, a deputy chief of staff. ... Speakes said the $70 billion figure includes everything — from equipment to pay to health benefits. No figure was immediately available for the increase in the Marine Corps." More than 70 sites carried this story.

Lack Of Medal Of Honor Winners Attributed To Pentagon's Quest For Accuracy. NBC Nightly News (1/23, story 7, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) reported that "the highest honor this nation can bestow on those who wear the uniform" is the Medal of Honor. However, "It's so far been awarded to two heroes of the Iraq war and in both cases, after their deaths. ... Why have there been so few of them awarded in our current wars when compared to past conflicts?" NBC added, "Former Marine Joseph Kinney told the Congressional committee it's shameful the war on terror has seen so few awards for valor including only two posthumous Medals of Honor when Vietnam produced 245 and World War II, 464. ... In the wake of too hasty official stories about Jessica Lynch and Pat Tillman, Marine General Richard Mills told that same committee, accuracy is our number-one priority as opposed to timeliness."

US Launches 2nd Airstrike As Ethiopian Troops Begin Withdrawal From Somalia. The CBS Evening News (1/23, story 4, 0:20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "US Special Forces have once again attacked terrorist targets in Somalia. CBS News has learned they conducted their second air strike in two weeks. The US is targeting three Al Qaeda operatives wanted for the bombing of two US Embassies in Africa in 1998."

The Washington Post (1/24, A9, Deyoung, McCrummen, 690K) reports, "A US Air Force AC-130 gunship staged an airstrike against suspected al-Qaeda operatives in southern Somalia on Monday," US officials said Tuesday. There was no immediate information on specific targets or the strike's results. News of the new attack came the same day Ethiopian troops began "a withdrawal from a fragile capital that many residents fear will now slip further into chaos." A spokesman for Somalia's transitional government, Abdirahman Dinari, said that the Ethiopians "may take several weeks to complete a full withdrawal from the country and that a large force would remain on the Ethiopian side of the Somalia-Ethiopia border."

The New York Times (1/24, Gettleman, 1.16M) adds, "Many Somalis say they now fear that a power vacuum will form and that the country will slip back into the lawlessness that has dominated it for much of the past 16 years." Although several African countries have" mused about sending peacekeepers to help quell Somalia's volatile mix of warring clans, well-armed thugs and now a growing insurgency, a comprehensive peacekeeping force may be months away."

The AP (1/24, Duhul) reports Ambassador Michael Ranneberger in Nairobi plans to meet with Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, an Islamic militant who surrender earlier this week, to "urge Sheik Sharif to counsel his supporters not to carry out violence and to support the development of an inclusive government," the US Embassy said.

China Breaks Silence Over Missile Test. The Washington Post (1/24, A8, Cody, 690K) reports, "Breaking 12 days of silence, China confirmed Tuesday that it had fired a guided missile into space to destroy one of its satellites in a test that generated protests from the United States and other nations." Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao "said the United States and other governments have now been informed about the secret test through diplomatic channels." Speaking to reporters, Liu said, "I should stress at this time that the test was not targeted against any country and does not pose a threat to any country." He also noted that he knew of no plans for another such test by the Chinese military.

The Wall Street Journal (1/24, A5, Dean, 2.04M) says that despite breaking "its public silence" about the test, China's "lack of openness has damaged its efforts to polish its international image, analysts said." Liu, it writes, "confirmed that the test] had occurred -- but offered no additional detail or explanation." Similarly, the Financial Times (1/24, Dickie, Nakamoto, Hille) notes that "even as Mr Liu insisted that Beijing's opposition to any space arms race remained undimmed, his refusal to shed any further light on the test or his government's intentions offered ready ammunition to those who say China's military policy is all about concealment."

The New York Times (1/24, Kahn, 1.16M) reports, "Senior Bush administration officials raised the possibility that the silence might have reflected the autonomy and isolation of the Chinese military. They said they could not be sure that President Hu Jintao, who oversees the military as well as the Communist Party, had personally authorized or overseen the test."

The Washington Times (1/24, A1, Gertz, 88K) notes the Jan. 11 test "also alarmed military and defense officials because it undermined American intelligence estimates that China's military trails the US military in terms of weapons and war-fighting capabilities by 10 years."

LATimes Calls On US Government To Contemplate Space Weapons Treaty. The Los Angeles Times (1/24, 850K) editorializes, "a ban on all weapons in space that could be enforced, while desirable, may be as utopian as some science fiction scenarios. Official U.S. space policy instructs the Pentagon 'to ensure freedom of action in space and, if directed, deny such freedom of action to adversaries.' The Chinese test, as well as other technological developments, suggest that a rethinking of this position is in order." The editorial adds, "It is in the U.S. interest to work to keep space clean and safe. It will be difficult to design, negotiate, verify and enforce international agreements that both protect U.S. and global security concerns and prevent the weaponization of space. But the Chinese test demonstrates the futility — and danger — of refusing to try."

China Reduces Fines For Violations Of One-Child Policy. The Washington Post (1/24, A7, Fan, 690K) reports, "Fines imposed on Chinese who violate the country's one-child-only policy may be reduced for the poor, a top family planning official said Tuesday, as authorities stressed a broader approach to population management." The announcement came a day after state media reported that "many Chinese believe it is unfair that the wealthy can 'buy' a second child by simply paying fines for breaking the one-child-only rule for most urban couples." The announcement "appeared to be part of a broader attempt by officials to put a more human face on China's much-maligned family planning policies."

Ban To Press Sudan On Darfur. The AP (1/24, Bergman) reports U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon "will pressure Sudan's president next week to speed up the peace process in Darfur, which has been delayed by months of wrangling over the makeup of a larger peacekeeping force," U.N. officials said Tuesday. On his first overseas trip as head of the world body, Ban will meet with Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir on the sidelines of an African Union summit in Ethiopia. Their meeting "could be crucial to pushing through a three-phase U.N. plan to beef up the 7,000-member AU force that is struggling to maintain peace in the vast desert region."

US Condemns Assault Of UN Staff, Aid Workers. AFP (1/24) reports Washington "condemned the Sudanese government's arrest and subsequent assault of 20 staff from the U.N., African Union and non-governmental organizations in strife-torn Darfur." On Friday, Sudanese police raided the International Non Governmental Organization (INGO) compound in Nyala, southern Darfur, arresting 20 U.N. staff members and aid workers. State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said in a statement the US "condemns" their arrest and said, "There is no justification for these appalling recent attacks on humanitarian aid workers."

Protests In Lebanon Raise Fears Of Sectarian Conflict. The Financial Times (1/24, England) reports supporters of Hezbollah and its Christian allies "paralyzed Lebanon on Tuesday as they dramatically escalated their campaign to overthrow the government, blocking highways with burning cars and tires and triggering clashes that killed three people and injured dozens." The protests, called "a conspicuous show of strength by the opposition," took place in "most parts of the country and ramped up a political confrontation between the Shia militant group and its allies and the pro-western government." As a result of the demonstrations, Prime Minister Fouad Siniora, "cancelled a planned flight to Paris, where the government is to present an economic reform package at a donor conference on Thursday."

The New York Times (1/24, Bakri, Fattah, 1.16M) says the protests raised "fears that the political crisis might lead to open sectarian conflict." Police said "at least three people died and 100 more were wounded throughout the country in the violence, the worst since Hezbollah began demanding more political power late last year." Similarly, the Washington Post (1/24, A6, Shadid, 690K) reports, "There is a certain cynicism among many Lebanese that the deadlock will be broken only with more bloodshed, forcing a compromise short of civil war." The Posts says that "by any standard, Tuesday's campaign was a feat of logistics on parallel with December's protests. In addition to shutting down the capital, the vital thoroughfare to the Syrian capital, Damascus, was cut, and allied groups blocked roads in predominantly Sunni Muslim areas such as Tripoli and Akkar."

The Washington Times/AP (1/24, Karam) says the protests "gave a frightening glimpse of how quickly the confrontation…could spiral out of control, enflame tensions among Sunnis, Shiites and Christians and throw Lebanon into deeper turmoil."

The Los Angeles Times (1/24, Stack, 850K) says the "swift seizure of the country's roads took many here by surprise, and marked a major escalation in the militant group Hezbollah's campaign to overthrow Lebanon's US-backed government." The Christian Science Monitor (1/24, Peterson, 59K) also says the Hezbollah-led opposition "sharply escalated its campaign to topple the Western-backed government with a nationwide general strike."

Kamen Notes Errors Made By Rice During Exchanges With Reporters. The Washington Post's (1/24, A21) Al Kamen writes in his "In the Loop" column Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's trip last week to the Middle East "produced some odd moments." For example, in London, Rice chatted with reporters, explaining how "the removal of Saddam Hussein set in motion a number of other circumstances, other changes in the Middle East: the removal of an eastern-front threat for Israel, for instance." Kamen "suggest[s] that perhaps a map of the region be consulted," noting that Iraq "would have had to go through hundreds of miles of desert -- not a lot of ground cover -- or through Damascus -- to get there." Meanwhile, during questions from Barbara Slavin of USA Today about the Mideast peace process, Rice said in 2000 Hamas was "sitting out as a resistance movement." Kamen notes that in "State's 2000 list of terrorist groups and find that, in Section H, Hamas, which now controls the Palestinian legislature, is listed as a terrorist group."

Presidential Hopefuls Court Israel, Cite Iran Threat. In a front page article, the Washington Times (1/24, A1, Mitnick, 88K) reports presidential hopefuls Mitt Romney, John Edwards and John McCain "all detoured through Israel on the way to New Hampshire this week, seemingly competing to see who could be strongest in defense of the Jewish state." Speaking in person or by video link to the Herzliya security conference outside Tel Aviv earlier this week, the politicians "spelled out tough measures they said were necessary to prevent Iran from acquiring nuclear weapons." Stressing the "strong US-Israeli relationship," the candidates "called for the United States to step up sanctions on Iran and leave the possibility of a military attack 'on the table.'" Edwards, the only Democratic candidate to address the conference, "similarly called to toughen sanctions on Iran and hold out the threat of military force, but he broke with the others by suggesting that Washington open a dialogue with Iran."

Ahmadinejad Says US Won't Succeed In Effort Against Nuclear Program. The AP (1/24, Dareini) reports Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Tuesday Washington "had not stepped up its campaign against Tehran, despite the standoff with the West over Iran's defiance of UN demands to halt uranium enrichment." In an interview with Iranian state television, he said, "US rhetoric against Iran has not increased. In 2003, they openly threatened to attack Iran. Now they have indirectly made such threats." Ahmadinejad also "spoke with confidence" over Iran's ability to withstand a strike, saying, "The United States is unable to inflict serious damage on Iran." Also Tuesday, during a meeting Tuesday with Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem, Ahmadinejad accused the US of "stirring up conflict between rival Muslim sects to maintain influence" in the Middle East. "The US intends to cause insecurity and dispute and weaken independent governments in the region to continue with its dominance over the Middle East and achieve its arrogant goals," Ahmadinejad said, according to the state-run Islamic Republic News Agency, or IRNA.

Journalist Says Democracy Key To Withstanding Iran's Influence On Arab States. Michael Young, opinion editor at Lebanon's Daily Star newspaper, writes in the Wall Street Journal (1/24, A13, 2.04M) that a "recurrent theme in history, literature and, lately, engagé academics is that of brash Westerners trying to possess the East and failing -- or at best leaving a transitory mark. From Alexander the Great to George W. Bush, few have successfully reshaped the Middle East in their own image." While "Western grand projects frequently succumbed to Middle Eastern intransigence," Young writes, "as Shiite Iran makes a bid for regional hegemony, its leadership should consider that the mostly Sunni Arabs may be as resistant to hubris coming from the East as from the West." Young asserts that "only democracy could prepare Arab states to withstand Iran without recourse to sectarianism. But the Bush administration seems to have abandoned that inventive undertaking for the region."

Israeli President Faces Indictment On Rape Charges. The AP (1/24, Nessman) reports Israeli President Moshe Katsav faced indictment Tuesday on charges of rape and abuse of power "in the most serious accusation against a top Israeli official in the country's history." The allegation that Katsav "used his position as Israel's ceremonial head of state…to force himself on his female employees has left the nation reeling." However, news of the indictment is "only the latest corruption scandal roiling the government, with accusations reaching as high as Prime Minister Ehud Olmert."

Carter Continues To Stand By Controversial Book. The Washington Post (1/24, C1, Powell, 690K)

reports former president Jimmy Carter 'flew north to Brandeis University to speak on Tuesday of his hurt at the personal attacks by some American Jews" that followed publication of his latest book, "Palestine Peace Not Apartheid." In an address, Carter said, "This is the first time that I've ever been called a liar and a bigot and an anti-Semite and a coward and a plagiarist." At the same time, he acknowledged that he "did not simply stumble into the title of his new book," rather saying he "chose that title knowing that it would be provocative."

Author Says Syrian-Israeli Peace Accord Could Anger US. Michael B. Oren, author and senior fellow at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem, writes in the New York Times (1/24, 1.16M), "Israel's newspapers are rife with reports of a peace agreement secretly forged between Israeli and Syrian negotiators. Though both the Syrian and Israeli governments have denied any involvement in the talks, past experience shows that such disavowals are often the first indication of truth behind the rumors." Oren says there is "nothing new about the details of the purported plan," but "what is new is the Bush administration's apparent opposition to a Syrian-Israeli accord and the possibility that Israel, by seeking peace with one of its Arab neighbors, risks precipitating a crisis with the United States." Oren warns that the "potentially disparate positions of Israel and the United States on the question of peace with Syria could trigger a significant crisis between" Israel and the US. Although Syrian President Bashar Assad "has made no Sadat-like gestures to Israel, and many Israelis agree with Mr. Bush that Syria should not be rewarded for its assistance to terrorism and its denial of Lebanese liberty," Oren says "if trust is established on both sides and the conditions are conducive to peace, a settlement between Syria and Israel may yet be attained -- and a clash between Israel and Washington ignited."

Noriega Set To Be Released In September. The Miami Herald (1/24, Reyes, Weaver, 286K) reports former Panamanian dictator Manuel Antonio Noriega, "imprisoned in South Miami-Dade on drug-trafficking and racketeering convictions since 1990, will be released on Sept. 9 -- due in part to good behavior and other credits." Noriega was "automatically eligible for parole after serving close to two-thirds of his 30-year federal sentence." However, when Noriega "steps out of his specially built, apartment-like cell at the Federal Correctional Institution in Southwest Miami-Dade," he will face charges in Panama and in France.

Lawmakers Urge Easing Of Cuba Embargo. The Financial Times (1/24, Dinmore) reports, "Members of Congress who believe Cuba is making a smooth transition of power said on Tuesday they would propose legislation to ease US embargo and travel restrictions." Missouri Rep. Jo Ann Emerson, who visited the nation last month as part of a congressional delegation, said, "Contrary to the notion that once Fidel Castro was gone there would be uproar and the Americans would come marching in, I didn't sense that at all." Emerson and James McGovern (D-MA) "said the House Cuba working group, equally represented by both parties, was agreed on the need to remove travel restrictions and loosen the embargo."

Russian Court Backs Closing Of Chechen Rights Group. The Washington Post (1/24, A8, Finn, 690K) reports the Russian Supreme Court Tuesday "upheld a lower court ruling that shut down the Russian-Chechen Friendship Society, a Western-funded grass-roots organization that had challenged the Kremlin's interpretation of events in the continuing conflict in Chechnya." The group's leadership called the decision "a chilling example of the government using a recently enacted law on nongovernmental organizations to quash activism that clashes with official policy." Oksana Chelysheva, one of the group's leaders, promised to fight the ruling, taking its case "to the European Court of Human Rights and, possibly, our Constitutional Court."

Breakthrough Unlikely At WTO Talks At Davos. Echoing comments made Tuesday by US trade representative Susan Schwab, the Wall Street Journal (1/24, A7, Miller, 2.04M) reports, "Global trade negotiators hope to restart the Doha round of world trade talks at the World Economic Forum in Davos, Switzerland, this week, but a return to the bargaining table will likely be more symbol than substance." According to the Journal, the "key players -- the US and the European Union -- remain unwilling to cut farm subsidies enough to satisfy emerging economies like Brazil and India."

Top Administration Officials Absent From This Year's Forum. On the front page of its business section, the New York Times (1/24, C1, Landler, 1.16M) reports the World Economic Forum convenes its annual conference Wednesday minus "Davos regulars like Bill Clinton, as well as marquee names from the Bush administration, which is sending only its trade negotiator, a deputy secretary of the Treasury, and a few other officials." Klaus Schwab, the forum's Swiss organizer, "played down the absence of a top Bush administration official like Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who was invited to speak but could not find time." Davos also says it is "shunning Hollywood celebrities, even though they have lent this sober event a dash of sex appeal."

DOJ_NMG_0120707

2.04M) that Venezuelan President Hugo Chávez's decision to shut down Radio Caracas Television "continues a long series of attacks against journalists, employees, management and shareholders of many independent media companies," the aim of which it "to limit the citizens' right to seek information and entertainment in the media of their choice, to impede public access to those media where they might express or encounter criticism of the government or their proposals for reform, to stifle the pluralism of opinion in news and talk programs, and to cut off the free flow of information and debate in Venezuela." Granier says Chavez's actions "are in violation of the Venezuelan constitution, the American Convention on Human Rights, and the Inter-American Democratic Charter" and represent "a clear example of abuse of power, and violate the right to work of all those in the media industry, not to mention a violation of the freedom of thought and expression of millions of citizens who seek information and ideas of their own free choice."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Terror Suspect Denied Bond; Affidavit Shows He Admits To Lying (PROJO)

By Karen Lee Ziner, Journal Staff Writer

The Providence Journal, January 24, 2007

BOSTON — Mohammed Yousuf Mullawala, a central figure in a national antiterrorism investigation, admitted lying to Rhode Island state police numerous times about his whereabouts and activities since he arrived in this country in 2002, according to a state police affidavit made public yesterday.

Federal ImmigrationJudge Matthew J. D'Angelo cited those alleged lies and Mullawala's "evasive and far-fetched explanations" in denying bond yesterday for Mullawala, whom he called a danger to the community and "an extreme flight risk."

The 28-year-old Indian national has been held in federal detention on a violation of his student visa since Rhode Island state police arrested him last month. D'Angelo ordered Mullawala returned to the Suffolk County House of Detention until a deportation hearing next Tuesday.

Mullawala's behavior at the Nationwide Tractor-Trailer Driving School, in Smithfield, triggered Homeland Security concerns that have since widened into an investigation by an FBI Joint Terrorism Task Force.

According to the school's instructor, that behavior included Mullawala's expressed interest in buying software or videos on hazardous materials and his stated interest in only learning how to drive the truck forward — not how to back it up or any other required technical maneuvers.

"I do not find his responses or explanations to be credible," said D'Angelo. "The court is concerned about his conduct at the tractor-trailer school. … He has been evasive in both his residential and work history, and also, interestingly, he has no work authority — he's acting like he's lawfully working in this country. He's an extreme flight risk and it's very unlikely he will appear at a future hearing."

During a 1½-hour hearing at the JFK Building, Mullawala raised his manacled hands and told the judge, "Yes, I will tell the truth." Then he sat calmly, wearing prison clothes that billowed around his small frame.

Prosecutor Mary Kelley underscored Mullawala's alleged multiple lies, related to his numerous addresses, work history, school enrollments, trucking school application, behavior at the trucking school and more. She also argued that he posed a flight risk because he has no family or friends in the United States.

The affidavit, obtained by The Journal after it was filed in court yesterday, states that Mullawala first told investigators he lived at 181 Carpenter St. in Providence, then recanted after the police confronted him with evidence to the contrary.

Kelley said although Mullawala's application to the trucking school lists the Carpenter Street address, investigators learned from tenants "that there's no such person who lives here."

"He lied," said Kelley. "He lists a reference at 181 Carpenter, but no such person existed when they went out there … . He indicated he never had any speeding tickets — that was a lie."

When immigration agents were brought into the investigation, Kelley said, they learned that Mullawala enrolled at Johnson & Wales University "but then he drops out and re-enrolls. So he's not attending school … ."

"He lied after he was Mirandized about his numerous addresses, including 'I can't tell you where I lived,' " said Kelley. "He lies about where he worked. He doesn't even show up for traffic court … so I hardly think he's going to show up for a hearing here."

Kelley also said Mullawala's explanation for his "extreme mobility" — at least seven addresses that authorities have been able to confirm he lived at — doesn't wash.

Defense lawyer June Beack said Mullawala told her he moved numerous times in New York City because he wanted to avoid areas where the police ticket heavily for traffic violations, and said that as a young single man, "he wanted to learn about different parts of the city."

DOJ_NMG_0120717

Kelley maintained that Mullawala also lied when he said trucking-school instructor Ed Mowry steered him toward a hazardous-materials license, and not the other way around, and when he said investigators lied when they contradicted his statements during an initial questioning.

Pointing to Mullawala, Kelley said, "What he's asking you to believe is that everybody's lying except the man sitting 10 feet in front of you."

The affidavit was filed by state police detectives Michael J. Winquist and Kevin M. Barry. Winquist is assigned to the Rhode Island State Fusion Center, which handles investigations concerning Homeland Security. Barry is assigned to the FBI Joint Terrorism Task Force.

It includes a timeline that shows Mullawala's zigzag path between 2002 and last year.

The path leads from Rhode Island in 2002; to India and back in 2003; to India via Kuwait in the spring of 2003; to Bridgeport, Conn., then Shelton, Conn., in 2004; to the Bronx, N.Y., in 2004 and '05; to Jackson Heights, then Hicksville, Hyde Park, Kew Gardens and Floral Park in New York last year; to Hackensack, N.J., last year; back to Kew Gardens a month later; and then to Jamaica, N.Y.

Investigators have been able to verify that he lived briefly at seven of those addresses, but have been unable to establish whether he ever lived at the four others.

The affidavit also states that Mullawala provided false information on his application to the trucking school.

While Mullawala stated that he lived on Carpenter Street, "he was actually residing in the state of New York." When asked whether he had driver's licenses in other states besides Rhode Island, Mullawala noted his New York license but failed to mention a New Jersey license. He also said he had never been issued a traffic summons, when in fact, "he received summonses from the Rhode Island State Police and in New Jersey."

The affidavit provides a glimpse into the days leading up to Mullawala's arrest last month and into questions posed by police on that day.

On Dec. 1, state police called Mullawala on his cell phone "under the guise that an accident was being investigated that involved a Rhode Island registration plate" previously issued in his name.

"Mohammed Y. Mullawala was very argumentative and advised your co-affiant that he was unable to respond [to] Rhode Island since he was working in New York driving a limousine," the affidavit states.

Mullawala also said his parents had arrived from India "and that he planned to take them to California on a sight-seeing trip." The affidavit notes that Mullawala "later admitted that he lied when making this statement."

At the state police's request, the owner of the trucking school "made numerous fruitless attempts to reach Mohammed Y. Mullawala on his cell phone" regarding a refund on money paid to the school since he attended for only two days. Mullawala "never returned her calls."

On Dec. 5, Mullawala arrived at state police headquarters unannounced "for the purpose of making a complaint" against one of the detectives involved in the case. When a trooper at the front desk recognized Mullawala from a bulletin, Mullawala was taken into custody.

"During his interview, Mohammed Y. Mullawala appeared to be extremely nervous. Detectives also found several inconsistencies in his answers to the questions being asked. When detectives confronted him with those inconsistencies," the affidavit states, "Mohammed Y. Mullawala admitted to being untruthful."

Held In Contempt, Al-Arian Launches Hunger Strike (TAMPTRIB)

By Elaine Silvestrini

Tampa Tribune, January 24, 2007

TAMPA - Sami Al-Arian has begun another hunger strike after being held in contempt for refusing to testify before a grand jury in Virginia, his supporters say.

In the meantime, Al-Arian has appealed an order with the 11th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals that says his plea agreement in Tampa does not protect him from having to testify in Virginia.

Al-Arian, a former University of South Florida professor, pleaded guilty in April to providing support to the Palestinian Islamic Jihad, designated by the U.S. government as a terrorist organization.

In May, U.S. District Judge James Moody sentenced Al-Arian to 57 months in federal prison, 11 months longer than recommended by prosecutors in his plea deal. Had Al-Arian received the recommended sentence, his attorneys said, he was expected to be deported last June.

The federal Bureau of Prisons now calculates Al-Arian's projected release date as April 13. That date could be extended by as much as 18 months because of the contempt finding in Virginia.

Al-Arian's plea came after a five-month trial in which jurors failed to convict him of a charge but deadlocked on nine counts.

During the trial, the government presented evidence that Al-Arian's think tank, World and Islam Studies Enterprise, received funding from the International Institute of Islamic Thought, based in Herndon, Va. The institute's offices were raided in 2002 as part of the investigation into the think tank.

At the time of the plea agreement, his attorneys stressed Al-Arian would not cooperate with the government.

In September, the U.S. attorney's office in the Eastern District of Virginia contacted attorneys for Al-Arian seeking his testimony before a grand jury investigating the institute.

The defense filed a motion asking Moody to enforce the plea agreement and protect Al-Arian from having to cooperate. However, the judge ruled that cooperation is not the same as compelled testimony and said the plea agreement does not protect Al-Arian from grand jury subpoenas.

An Al-Arian supporter, the Tampa Bay Coalition for Justice and Peace, issued a news release Tuesday saying he was held in contempt Monday and has started his second hunger strike to protest "continued government harassment."

The news release gave a summary of a statement Al-Arian made to a Virginia federal judge complaining about his prison conditions. Al-Arian said he had to share his food with rats and roaches, and was forced to wear dirty and inadequate clothing.

Al-Arian's first declared hunger strike started shortly after he was arrested in February 2003 and continued for 140 days, his supporters say. Jail officials said Al-Arian drank Carnation Instant Breakfast during that hunger strike because he has diabetes and required nutrition along with his medication.

House Dems Seek Gates Briefing (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, January 24, 2007

Several House Democrats plan to grill Secretary of Defense Robert Gates on the Pentagon's use of private contractors in interrogations at the military prison in Guantánamo Bay, Cuba.

Chief Deputy Democratic Whip Jan Schakowsky (Ill.) and 26 other members wrote to Gates Tuesday asking for a briefing on interrogation practice after the FBI revealed allegations this month of torture by contractors at Guantánamo.

All interpreters and half of all jail workers at Abu Ghraib were private contractors, according to Schakowsky, a member of the intelligence committee.

Reps. Barney Frank (D-Mass.), David Price (D-N.C.) and George Miller (D-Calif.) also signed the letter demanding a briefing.

"As you assume your new duties, we would like to alert you to our concerns about the use of military contractors," they wrote. "The lack of proper oversight of military contractors results in wasted funds and frustrated missions. It also sends a message to contractors that they will not be held accountable for squandering taxpayer dollars at the expense of supporting our service members."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Judge Weighs Contested Rail Law (WP)

By Henri E. Cauvin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120719

CSX Challenging Suspended D.C. Ban on Hazardous Cargo

The fate of a District law banning rail shipments of hazardous materials was back before a federal judge yesterday, nearly two years after the prohibition was enacted by the D.C. Council.

The law, which was prompted by fears that the Capitol and other landmarks are vulnerable to a terrorist attack on rail lines that skirt downtown, was quickly challenged in 2005 by CSX Transportation Inc., which controls the key freight routes through the District. The law has never taken effect. Yesterday, a judge heard arguments to determine whether it ever will.

U.S. District Judge Emmet G. Sullivan set no timetable for a decision in the case, which is being monitored by cities and states throughout the country.

CSX said that the District is overstepping its legal authority and that the law, if allowed to stand, could lead other local governments to pass similar bans, crippling the transportation of hazardous materials nationwide.

Under federal regulations, rail operators bear much of the responsibility for assessing risks and determining how to deal with them -- an arrangement that critics say puts public safety at the mercy of profit-driven businesses.

Tighter federal control may be coming. Last month, the federal government, which has sided with CSX, proposed more stringent regulations on the transportation of hazardous materials.

But such changes may be months or years away, if enacted at all, and in any case, the proposals fall short of the ban that the District wants to impose.

When CSX first contested the law, Sullivan sided with the District and the Sierra Club, which had joined the city in defending the law. Sullivan ruled that the law could take effect while the broader legal issues were reviewed.

But after hearing the company's challenge as an expedited emergency matter, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit reversed Sullivan's decision and ordered that the ban be put on hold pending review.

After gathering evidence and taking preliminary steps for nearly a year, lawyers for the two sides appeared before Sullivan yesterday for nearly two hours -- on one side, Robert Utiger of the D.C. attorney general's office and James R. Wrathall of WilmerHale for the Sierra Club; on the other, Virginia Seitz of Sidley Austin for CSX and Arthur R. Goldberg of the Justice Department.

Much of the arguments focused on whether the District's law could be preempted by federal law. The Federal Railroad Safety Act allows states to enact laws related to rail safety or security until the U.S. Department of Transportation or the U.S. Department of Homeland Security issues a regulation covering the subject of the state requirement.

Opponents of the District's law say the federal government, through existing federal regulations on rail security, has rejected a hazardous-materials ban as part of any federal regulation, thereby precluding such a prohibition by a local government.

Supporters of the law say that such a ban was never considered during the drafting of current regulations and that the regulations were put forth by the Department of Transportation, not Homeland Security, as would have been required to preempt a local law related to rail security.

After the arguments were presented, Sullivan proposed that both sides submit additional briefs addressing the question of which agency had the power to preempt a local law such as the District's.

Man Questioned In LA Subway Mercury Spill (CCT)

The Contra Costa Times, January 24, 2007

LOS ANGELES - The FBI on Tuesday arrested a man they believe spilled toxic mercury on a subway platform.

Armando Bustamante Miranda, 27, was being questioned but it did not appear he was involved in any terrorist activity, FBI spokeswoman Laura Eimiller said.

He was arrested and held for a parole violation unrelated to last month's spill, Eimiller said.

She declined to reveal other details.

"We're not going to have anything more until we sort this thing out," she said.

A videotape showed a man crouching down and dropping something onto a platform at a downtown subway station on Dec. 22. The man appeared startled and walked to a Metropolitan Transit Authority call box, where he reported the mercury spill.

DOJ_NMG_0120720

The county is conducting an investigation to determine why transit officials waited eight hours to alert authorities after they were told about the spilled mercury.

No injuries were reported, and officials believe the small amount of mercury would have been harmful only if someone touched it or drank it.

A Los Angeles County sheriff's hazardous materials team confirmed the substance was mercury and removed it.

Transient Held In MTA Mercury Spill (LAT)

By Andrew Blankstein And Jean Guccione, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

Authorities say the man told them he found it in trash on the Westside and hoped to sell it for money to buy drugs.

Federal and local authorities on Tuesday arrested a 27-year-old man they believe spilled mercury on a downtown L.A. subway platform, ending a weeklong dragnet that raised more questions about the handling of the incident.

Armando Bustamante Miranda was being questioned by FBI agents and Los Angeles County sheriff's investigators, who are trying to determine why the hazardous chemical was dropped in the station on Dec. 22 by a man who then called an MTA operator to say what he had done.

Detectives expressed frustration at the difficulty in finding the suspect, at one point creating more than a dozen potential profiles, including a prankster, a screenwriter working on a script, an actor seeking attention, a student working on a project and even a terrorist.

Officials repeated Tuesday that they doubt the incident was related to terrorism.

Sheriff's Det. Danny Regalado described Miranda as a transient who told authorities he found the mercury while scavenging through a commercial dumpster on the Westside for items he could sell to support his drug habit.

Miranda, according to Regalado, said during the two-hour interview with detectives that he was "fixated" on the mercury and the way it moved in the vial, adding that he recognized the substance from a "Terminator" movie. He told authorities he took it out of his pocket at the station and was showing it off, hoping another passenger would purchase it. When he spilled the mercury, he told police, another passenger told him to report it.

Detectives said an acquaintance of Miranda recognized his photo and contacted authorities, setting up a meeting with the suspect in Hollywood. Regalado said he was "very cooperative."

Authorities are concerned that some business was disposing mercury in the trash, and they plan to go door-to-door questioning owners about their disposal tactics.

The arrest comes amid a growing dispute about how MTA surveillance tapes were handled. An MTA tape of the Pershing Square station showed a man dropping a vial of mercury on the platform and later getting into a subway car.

But four law enforcement sources familiar with the investigation said investigators didn't receive all the videos taken inside the subway car.

Los Angeles County's top transit cop said his detectives reviewed the videos they received but didn't see the man.

"You can never have too much evidence," said Sheriff's Cmdr. Dan Finkelstein. "As it turned out, we didn't need anything else."

He added that another platform camera recorded the suspect getting off the train, a clue that helped in his capture.

Nonetheless, Los Angeles County Supervisor Gloria Molina, who chairs the Metropolitan Transportation Authority, asked agency officials Tuesday for a detailed account of what happened to all the videos from that night. She specifically wants information on whether some were recorded over before they could be analyzed.

Federal and local law enforcement sources said there was an internal debate early in the investigation about whether to go public with the search for the suspect.

The MTA initially described the mercury release as an accident. But the county's joint terrorism task force later reviewed the incident and decided last week to go public with the tape in hopes that authorities could find the suspect, the sources said.

Since 9/11, the MTA has spent $9 million on security enhancements that include equipping buses and trains with state-of-the-art cameras to monitor and record passenger activity.

DOJ_NMG_0120721

Ten fixed cameras have been installed on each subway train over the last two years. The MTA has also added platform cameras that pan, tilt and zoom.

The platform recordings are kept for 14 days, MTA officials said. Recordings from trains are held for 80 hours, then recorded over.

The dispute over the tapes comes as MTA officials admitted that the agency's response to the mercury incident was highly flawed.

The MTA waited eight hours after being told mercury was on the platform before clearing the station and cleaning up the spill. Police and transit officials said the workers erred by not immediately contacting law enforcement to cordon off the area and calling in hazardous-material experts. The incident also exposed the fact that many MTA workers are not trained to handle dangerous materials, including mercury.

The MTA said it is investigating the way its employees handled the incident.

At least four people touched or stepped on the mercury during the period, including one woman who tracked it home. Mercury can be hazardous if ingested, inhaled or touched, but there were no reports of health problems.

According to authorities, the man who spilled the mercury used an MTA intercom to tell an operator: "Yes, there's some mercury that's spilled down there," according to a transcript obtained by The Times.

He continues: "There's a jar that had mercury in it and it broke. It's on the floor down here on the, by the Wilshire, or I mean Western, North Hollywood sign."

The operator responds, "So, it needs a — a glass broke…. OK. I'll send somebody to clean it up."

But for unclear reasons, no one was sent for hours, until another passenger called authorities to report the spill.

Miranda was being held on a probation violation related to a previous drug charge.

Group Attempting To Simplify Byzantine Terror-Alert System (WP)

By Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Inside an unmarked, secured office near the White House, intelligence officials, lawyers and police work to close a gaping hole in the nation's counterterrorism system: the failure of people in the government to communicate with one another.

The Sept. 11 commission report singled out official resistance to sharing information as a key reason the government failed to thwart the 2001 terrorist attacks. In response, Congress authorized the president to create the group now based near his office, known as the "information-sharing environment" (ISE) program. Its goal is to create a system for moving terrorism-related information among officials -- be it the president or a small-town mayor -- quickly and securely.

In coming days, the group will send the president its recommendations for taming an explosion of "sensitive but unclassified" (SBU) documents. These reports, papers and memos -- not classified but not meant for public eyes -- bear "markers": from the basic "For Official Use Only" or "Trade Secret" to the mind-bending "Information Related to a Continuity of Operations Plan." So far, the ISE has collected 108 markers, and McNamara says more probably exist. Each marker dictates the rules for handling, distributing and storing the document that bears it. Confusing things further, the rules vary by agency, even for the same marker.

The result is "chaos," said ISE program manager Thomas McNamara, a former State Department counterterrorism official who now reports to the director of national intelligence. Studies by the National Governors Association and the Government Accountability Office have found that the SBU mess undermines the effectiveness of terrorism alerts from Washington. In one example, a local police official received a confusing SBU memo from Washington, wrongly thought it was classified, and scrambled for days to find a secure phone line so he could ask about it.

SBU stands at the center of a trend toward greater government secrecy that "threatens accountability in government and promotes conflicts of interest," according to a report on the phenomenon released last year by the advocacy group OpenTheGovernment.org.

"You need an anthropologist to understand how these bureaucracies function," said Steven Aftergood, an open-government advocate who runs the Federation of American Scientists' Secrecy News blog. "But it's not their own information. It's government information, and it should be handled in a uniform manner."

McNamara said his goal is to narrow the number of SBU markers from more than 100 to a dozen or fewer, develop one set of handling rules, and make the documents available to all who need them.

Once approved, the new program will be rolled out in Washington and across federal and local agencies. That could take years.

The SBU system is a throwback to the Cold War, McNamara said, "when we as a government paid particular attention to classified information" that falls into "Secret," "Top Secret" and "Secret Compartmented Information" categories, with corresponding security clearances for those who use it. To be classified, documents must refer to defense, foreign policy or national intelligence. Since most agencies can't classify, McNamara said, they devised the SBU system to control information such as law enforcement evidence, personal records and trade secrets.

But just as governments tend to overclassify, the agencies used SBU designations so often that they created an insurmountable mountain of documents -- and undermined confidence in the system.

"Information flows are so dramatically large now that we can't depend on the old system," McNamara said. "We either create a new one or we're going to be very, very sorry we didn't."

Travel Security Rules Take Effect Smoothly (WP)

By N.c. Aizenman

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Passengers experienced few difficulties yesterday as new border security rules went into effect requiring citizens of the United States, Canada, Mexico, Bermuda and some Caribbean islands to present a passport when entering the United States by air, officials said.

Previously such passengers were able to prove their identity with a variety of documents, including a combination of a birth certificate and a driver's license. Now, under select circumstances, two other documents, the Merchant Mariner Document and the Nexus Air card, will be permitted instead of a passport.

The new rules do not extend to travelers flying to and from U.S. territories in the Caribbean.

The shift to the passport requirement at airports is the first phase of a broader initiative to strengthen scrutiny at all points of entry, an initiative recommended by the commission that investigated the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. The new rules are likely to be instituted at land and sea ports as soon as Jan. 1, 2008.

Yesterday's smooth transition was largely because of the high percentage of travelers who had obtained a passport, said authorities.

More than 1.1 million U.S. citizens applied for passports in November, when the date for the new rule was announced, compared with 648,000 applicants in November 2005, said Derwood Staeben, senior adviser for the initiative at the State Department. According to the Department of Homeland Security, 90 percent of U.S. citizens flying into the country over the last week arrived with passports, compared with 81 percent during the week of Dec. 11.

Citizens of the other affected countries also rushed to obtain passports from their governments, with the percentage of air travelers now carrying them reaching 97 percent for Canadians and nearly 100 percent for Mexicans and Bermudans.

"People have got the message, and that's good news," Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff said Thursday in an appearance with Canadian Minister of Public Safety Stockwell Day.

For now, those rare travelers who arrive at airports without passports are generally being accommodated rather than turned away, said Kelly Klundt, a spokeswoman for U.S. Customs and Border Protection.

DOJ_NMG_0120723

"The goal is not to strand travelers -- it's to advise them of the change," Klundt said. "If for whatever reason they haven't heard of it, we have emergency mechanisms to deal with the situation. . . . We will work with them with whatever documentation they present to try and verify the information we need."

Tourism officials in Mexico and Canada have expressed concern that potential tourists -- particularly those traveling by land -- will be turned off by the new passport requirement.

J. Willard "Bill" Marriott Jr., chairman and chief executive of Marriott International, dedicated an entry on his corporate blog Monday to the new passport regulation, part of the Western Hemisphere Travel Initiative.

"I'm afraid, if it's not properly implemented and communicated, that WHTI could have a serious negative impact on legitimate commerce and tourism, as well as our diplomatic relationships with our two largest trading partners, Canada and Mexico," wrote Marriott, who belongs to an association that has lobbied for changes in security programs.

Similarly, Mexican Tourism Secretary Rodolfo Elizondo Torres predicted that 318,000 fewer Americans would visit Mexico in the next year because of the new requirement. "The lost income could reach $254 million a year," Torres said in a statement.

Correspondent Manuel Roig-Franzia in Mexico City, staff writer Spencer S. Hsu in Washington and researcher Natalia Alexandrova in Toronto contributed to this report.

New Demands For Armed Pilots (WP)

By Del Quentin Wilber

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

As the number of armed pilots aboard U.S. jetliners has steadily expanded in recent years, the program is showing signs of growing pains. Pilots and their labor groups complain about a lack of supervision and the difficulty in finding time to participate in training courses.

Worried that pilots' handgun skills may be eroding, federal security officials are launching a refresher training program next month. Armed pilots must attend a two-day mandatory course at a training facility near Atlantic City three to five years after getting their guns. Some pilots have already taken prototype refresher courses that are being evaluated by authorities, said officials with the Federal Air Marshal Service, which runs the program.

"Using a weapon is a perishable skill, and we want to ensure they have the appropriate training," said John A. Novak, an assistant director with the air marshal service. "We are taking the law enforcement culture and applying it to the experienced professionals of the aviation community."

The controversial gun program, which started in 2003, was backed enthusiastically by pilots and their unions as a way to prevent terrorist hijackings after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. When the program began, union officials said as many as 30,000 pilots would eventually carry firearms in cockpits.

The number of armed pilots is well short of that number, but there are now more armed pilots than there are federal air marshals, according to sources familiar with the program.

Federal officials requested that The Washington Post not publish the exact number of armed pilots for security reasons.

To be allowed to carry handguns in cockpits, pilots undergo psychological testing and a seven-day training course. They must visit a firing range to demonstrate their shooting skills every six months. So far, there have been no incidents in which a pilot has fired his weapon aboard an airliner.

Pilots said the refresher course was a good idea but could prompt some to leave the program. Those who participate are not paid for their time. They also are not reimbursed for travel, lodging or food expenses.

"This is going to cost me $2,000," said one pilot, who spoke on condition of anonymity because his membership in the program does not permit him to speak publicly. "If this was a really great program, they would treat us like adults."

Federal officials said they were working to find other sites across the country for the training. They said they have not noticed any increase in pilots quitting the program and that the number of applicants has remained steady. There was a 300 percent surge in applicants in the weeks after British authorities said in August that they uncovered a plot to blow up jetliners, according to the officials.

Pilots said they also wish there were more supervision between visits to firing ranges and the longer refresher training. Among the ideas they have passed to federal officials: offering periodic classes at airports, more Internet-based training and a monthly newsletter on tactics. Pilots groups say such measures are needed to ensure that the program keeps pace with its growth.

"In 2003, this was a noble experiment," said Bob Hesselbein, an airline pilot and chairman of the national security committee for the Air Line Pilots Association. "Today, it's an institution. . . . As the institution grows, the institutional pillars aren't being built with it."

Officials said they were working to improve communication with pilots but added that they must also satisfy the demands of training armed pilots while minting new ones. Each week, several dozen newly armed pilots graduate from a training facility in New Mexico. The program's budget has remained steady, about $25 million a year, despite increases in the number of armed pilots.

Federal officials said they were taking other steps to address complaints raised by pilots. They plan to issue police-like badges to pilots in coming months to help them better identify themselves in a crisis. And they said they are taking undisclosed steps to make it easier for pilots to transport their weapons to and from work.

Hesselbein said his group would push for legislation requiring airlines to grant unpaid leave for the training, which could be tough for some pilots because of their schedules. The airlines, which generally resisted the creation of the program, are expected to fight such a proposal.

All Quiet On Israel's Eastern Front? Not Quite. (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's trip last week to the Middle East produced some odd moments.

For example, in London, Rice chatted with reporters, explaining how "the removal of Saddam Hussein set in motion a number of other circumstances, other changes in the Middle East: the removal of an eastern-front threat for Israel, for instance."

We pause here, just for a moment, to suggest that perhaps a map of the region be consulted. Okay, let's see. On the "eastern front" of Israel we find Syria and Jordan on the borders. Iraq would have had to go through hundreds of miles of desert -- not a lot of ground cover -- or through Damascus -- to get there. The threat on Iran's western front, however, has been neatly eliminated.

Barbara Slavin of USA Today asked: "What is new and different? It seems to me that [Ehud] Olmert now is weaker, frankly, than [Ehud] Barak was, and certainly [Mahmoud] Abbas is weaker than [Yasser] Arafat was."

"Let's look at where it really was in 2000, all right?" Rice countered. "You had Yasser Arafat, who I think . . . had one foot in terror and one foot in politics." Well, better than both feet in terror.

"It's also the case that you had at that time a Palestinian Authority that was overrun by corruption, overrun by its ties with terrorism," Rice pointed out. "And strangely, you had Hamas, of course, sitting out as a resistance movement," and not involved.

"Resistance movement"? We pause here once again and set aside the map to pick up State's 2000 list of terrorist groups and find that, in Section H, Hamas, which now controls the Palestinian legislature, is listed as a terrorist group. Ditto on Page 118 of our National Counterterrorism Center 2007 daily planner.

"In fact, the United States had been, in past times, and not too far in the distant future -- or in the distant past, opposed to the establishment of a Palestinian state," she said. "And so when you have a Palestinian state -- the president declared that a Palestinian state is going to be the outcome here, it begins to change the -- it begins to condition the environment."

The administration has often trumpeted the notion that President Bush was the first president to call for creation of a Palestinian state. He certainly appears to be the first Republican president to have called for a Palestinian state. But President Bill Clinton, just before he left office, said a peace deal would mean "an independent and sovereign state with al-Quds [East Jerusalem] as its capital, recognized by all."A Wild Time in Minerals Management

Speaking of the environment, the Interior Department's Minerals Management Service has been making news lately because of allegations that it has been too cozy with the offshore oil industry it helps regulate and from whom it collects royalties and lease money.

But that won't stop them from partying on. So they'll be celebrating the ninth annual industry awards programs this year at a bash in Houston on April 17. Last year's drew 700 folks from the agency and the companies.

A regular attendee and prior award winner is David Deal, a former American Petroleum Institute lawyer, who got an MMS award in 2003 for "utilizing expertise gained from his years of participation in numerous MMS regulatory initiatives to . . . propose viable options for resolving differences, reducing litigation, and developing simplified royalty processes."

Deal may go to the awards ceremony again this year, he told our colleague Elizabeth Williamson yesterday. He has his own law practice these days and has been working on the MMS's royalty-policy committee, which advises the agency on collecting fees for the oil the industry pumps out of public property. Deal's a "public at large" member -- one of three people on the committee who are supposed to represent non-aligned folks like you and me. "I nominated myself," he said.

And there was a party just yesterday at the main Interior Department auditorium to celebrate the 25th anniversary of the founding of the MMS. MMS invited all Interior employees to come celebrate.

Many surely did. As one Interior wag noted, folks at other Interior agencies are relieved at all the attention MMS is getting. "Thank God for MMS," he said. "They're not going to be coming after us for a while."Painting a Clinton as Kerry

The Republican National Committee was out quickly this week with an early attack line on presidential candidate Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.). The initial feint is a flip-flop jab, comparing Clinton to the hapless 2004 candidate Sen. John F. Kerry's line about voting for the war in Iraq before voting against it.

"Hillary's Kerryoake on Iraq," the headline said.

"Hillary Campaign Kicks Off With A Kerry Classic: Use Of Force Vote Was Not A Vote For Use Of Force," citing her vote giving Bush authorization to wage war in Iraq. No need for a quotation from Clinton. The ad cited a comment by "Clinton advisor Terry McAuliffe" that sounded much like Kerry's comments.A Swing Through the Revolving Door

This just in. Homeland Security general counsel Philip J. Perry will resign effective Feb. 6, Secretary Michael Chertoff announced after business hours yesterday, adding that he fully supported Perry's decision "to put his family first."

That would include wife Elizabeth Cheney, daughter of Vice President Cheney, and their five children, the youngest of whom arrived last summer. Liz Cheney has stepped down as principal deputy assistant secretary of state for Near Eastern affairs, although she had time to publish an opinion column yesterday criticizing Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) on Iraq. Our colleague Spencer S. Hsu reports that the vice president's son-in-law will rejoin his the Washington office of his old firm, Latham & Watkins, as a partner in its litigation department.

Locked In Squalor (WP)

NO MATTER your position in the debate over immigration policy, you no doubt agree that the United States ought to treat those accused of violating immigration law humanely. As it happens, so does U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), which for years has had guidelines on the books governing the treatment of detainees (about 27,500 of whom are locked in its facilities every night). And, according to the agency's spokesman, ICE is very good at meeting its standards.

But a report released by the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general last week suggests the opposite. The study examined five facilities and found violations of basic ICE guidelines in every one. Among the more upsetting: roach and rat infestations; limited access to clean underwear; dirty food trays and undercooked poultry; faulty ventilation; and, perhaps most disturbing, constricted access to counsel. Unlike other types of prisoners in the United States, noncitizens held for violations of immigration law have no right to state-provided legal representation, but ICE's guidelines specify that they must have access to law libraries and to working telephones with up-to-date phone numbers connecting to free legal aid services. The inspector general found that phones often did not work and that the law libraries were often obsolete. In one facility, not one of the 12 numbers for legal services worked.

In its defense, ICE says that the report's findings are not statistically significant because the inspector general examined only a small number of facilities and that the report does not reflect the state of other detention centers. A spokesman points to the results of inspections ICE regularly conducts across the whole system as evidence that the agency does not have a problem complying with its own rules. Yet the very inspections ICE touts found each of the five facilities the report examined to be acceptable, failing to catch many of the problems the inspector general identified. This suggests that internal information describing better conditions in other detention centers is probably also inaccurate.

In a written response to the report, ICE agreed that it needs to review its inspection regimen. That's a start. The next step should be promulgating the guidelines it professes to have no problem meeting as agency regulations, which would give them the force of law and provide a greater incentive to comply. If ICE's claims are true, it should have no argument with making regulations of its own guidelines. If the inspector general's portrait is indicative, the nation is failing a basic standard of human decency.

State Farm Settles Mississippi Claims From Katrina Surge (AP)

By Michael Kunzelman

AP, January 23, 2007

State Farm Fire & Casualty agreed yesterday to settle hundreds of lawsuits by policyholders and reopen thousands of other disputed claims, a deal potentially worth hundreds of millions of dollars to homeowners devastated by Hurricane Katrina, a company spokesman said.

The settlement calls for State Farm to pay about $80 million to more than 600 policyholders who sued the company for refusing to cover damage from the Aug. 29, 2005, storm. State Farm also agreed to pay at least $50 million -- but possibly hundreds of millions more -- to thousands of Mississippi policyholders whose claims were denied but didn't sue the company.

State Farm's agreement with Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood and policyholders' lawyers resolves a civil lawsuit that Hood filed against the company for refusing to cover damage from Katrina's storm surge nearly 17 months ago.

The accord also resolves Hood's criminal probe of allegations that the insurer fraudulently denied claims after the August 2005 storm.

"It's been like a death roll with an alligator for the last two months in these negotiations," Hood said.

"The agreement greatly reduces the time, the risk and the expense of defending multiple claims in individual litigation," said Phil Supple, a spokesman for State Farm.

Mississippi's mass settlement -- the first of its kind since Katrina spawned hundreds of lawsuits against State Farm and other major insurers -- does not involve any claims in other states.

The deal was to have been presented to U.S. District Judge L.T. Senter Jr. in Gulfport, Miss., yesterday.

Supple said the company will review claims filed by policyholders in Mississippi's three coastal counties whose claims were denied but didn't sue the company. They can have their claims reevaluated or resolved by binding arbitration, he said.

State Farm, the state's largest home insurer, says it already has paid roughly $1.1 billion for about 84,000 property claims in the state. State Farm and other insurers paid for Katrina's wind damage, but Hood and hundreds of policyholders sued the companies over their refusal to pay for more than $2 billion in damage from the storm's wind-driven surge.

The settlement comes less than two weeks after a federal jury in Gulfport awarded $2.5 million in punitive damages to a couple who sued State Farm for denying their claim after Katrina. A judge took part of that case out of jurors' hands, ruling that State Farm is liable for $223,292 in storm damage to the Biloxi home of Norman and Genevieve Broussard.

After Katrina, a legal team led by Richard "Dickie" Scruggs sued several major insurers on behalf of hundreds of Gulf Coast policyholders. Scruggs, a Gulf Coast native whose home in Pascagoula was destroyed by Katrina, rose to national prominence when he helped negotiate a multibillion-dollar settlement with tobacco companies in the mid-1990s.

Besides State Farm, Hood sued Allstate, Mississippi Farm Bureau Insurance, USAA and Nationwide. In addition, Hood has investigated allegations that State Farm and other insurers have fraudulently denied claims after Katrina. Last week, a grand jury in Pascagoula began hearing testimony on those allegations.

State Farm attorneys say a federal grand jury has been probing similar allegations.

State Farm Agrees To Pay Up For Katrina In Mississippi (USAT)

By Kathy Chu

USA Today, January 24, 2007

State Farm has agreed to pay thousands of Mississippi homeowners hit by Hurricane Katrina likely hundreds of millions of dollars in a landmark settlement that's expected to reverberate across the storm-ravaged Gulf Coast.

The company agreed to a deal under which it will reopen thousands of homeowners' claims and is likely to pay as much as $500 million, Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood announced Tuesday. There's no cap on the payout. The insurer will have to pay at least $50 million under the deal negotiated with the Scruggs law firm, which represents the majority of Mississippi homeowners who sued State Farm.

In a related development, State Farm will settle more than 600 individual Mississippi homeowners' Katrina claims for roughly $80 million, according to a person with direct knowledge of the negotiations who didn't want to be named because the settlement is confidential.

The settlement applies only to Mississippi homeowners — not to the thousands in Louisiana who are suing State Farm and other insurers, arguing that wind and rain ravaged their homes. Homeowners' policies cover wind and rain damage, but not flood damage, which is covered by federal flood insurance.

Homeowners could begin receiving insurance checks within a few weeks, after the class-action settlement is approved, as expected, by U.S. District Court Judge L.T. Senter Jr. As part of the agreement with State Farm in Mississippi, Hood agreed to drop a criminal probe against the insurer related to its claims-handling process.

Phil Supple, a spokesman for State Farm, the USA's largest home insurer, said its goal has always been to "reach a just, speedy and efficient resolution to these matters." A settlement "is in the best interest of our policyholders," Supple added.

About 35,000 Mississippi homeowners are eligible to have their claims reopened. For about 1,000 Mississippi residents whose homes were reduced to slabs by Katrina, State Farm will offer at least 50% of the homeowner's insurance on the property structure. The average house in Mississippi costs about $200,000, Hood estimates. Thousands more will receive lower amounts.

Homeowners who don't want to settle with State Farm can still sue the insurer. But the deal "gives a new opportunity for thousands of people to recover their insured losses through a quick process," says Zach Scruggs, an attorney who, with his father, Richard Scruggs, negotiated with State Farm.

State Farm is fighting hundreds of other Katrina-related lawsuits along the Gulf Coast, including in Louisiana. Attorneys in those cases said they hoped the Mississippi development would cause State Farm and other insurers to settle quickly.

"State Farm knows where to find me," says Madro Bandaries, who represents dozens of Louisiana homeowners disputing State Farm's payouts after Katrina. "They cannot, in my estimation, go to Mississippi and do one thing and then not go to Louisiana."

Big Insurer Will Pay 640 Katrina Claims (NYT)

By Joseph B. Treaster

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

In a move that is expected to jump-start rebuilding along the Mississippi Gulf Coast, State Farm Insurance said yesterday that it had reached an agreement with state officials to pay hundreds of millions of dollars to owners of homes along the coast that were wrecked by Hurricane Katrina.

The agreement settles lawsuits filed by 640 homeowners and allows thousands of others to reopen damage claims that State Farm previously closed. Insurance executives said they expected the outlines of the deal to be adopted by other carriers.

The agreement does not apply to New Orleans, where the failure of the levees left much of the city underwater for days. Lawyers and insurers say no similar settlement talks are in progress there.

For State Farm, the nation's largest home insurer and the biggest in Mississippi, the settlement allows for "a just, speedy and efficient resolution," as a spokesman, Phil Supple, put it.

DOJ_NMG_0120728

It would also remove a major public relations headache. While State Farm and the other insurers may have had some strong legal arguments, they have been widely perceived as insensitive. In many cases, residents whose houses were reduced to concrete slab foundations received just a few thousand dollars in payments. Some received nothing.

Under the settlement, 300 homeowners who lost everything will receive their full insurance coverage. Mississippi officials said 1,000 others would receive at least half, with the opportunity to negotiate for more.

"A lot of people on the coast are going to see money in their pockets sooner, rather than have to go through a long, drawn-out process of court proceedings," Mississippi's insurance commissioner, George Dale, said yesterday.

The core of the dispute was whether the damage to the houses was caused by high winds or surging floodwaters as Hurricane Katrina swept across the coast on Aug. 29, 2005. The insurers said their policies covered only wind damage. But in many cases, they also refused to pay for damage caused by a combination of wind and water.

The settlement does not affect the terms of coverage in the insurers' policies, but some insurance experts said they expected that the carriers would ultimately rewrite their policies to specifically bar coverage of damage from storm surges.

In the settlement talks, which began last fall, State Farm insisted that the Mississippi attorney general, Jim Hood, drop a criminal investigation of the company's handling of storm damage claims. It also demanded that he abandon a civil suit against it and other insurers.

The final sticking point in the agreement had been over the framing of a few sentences that would end the criminal investigation. Mr. Hood convened a grand jury last week that began hearing evidence.

The two sides reached agreement in a meeting yesterday afternoon in Jackson, the state capital. Then lawyers for State Farm and Richard F. Scruggs, who represents hundreds of storm victims and played a major role in drafting the settlement, flew to Gulfport on the coast, to seek the endorsement of Judge L. T. Senter Jr., the federal district judge overseeing most of the insurance disputes.

Judge Senter had suggested that he would like to see a global settlement, and some participants in the talks said the first money could begin to flow to storm victims as early as next week.

Under the agreement, State Farm will pay an initial $130 million and perhaps several hundred million more by the end of the year, depending on how many policyholders requested that their claims be reopened. About 35,000 homeowners along Mississippi's 70-mile-long coast are eligible. Among the homeowners who will benefit from the settlement are Senator Trent Lott and Representative Gene Taylor, both of whom lost their homes in the storm and were denied payment by State Farm.

Since Hurricane Katrina struck, the insurance companies have paid $5.3 billion for damage to more than 330,000 homes in Mississippi and $10.3 billion for nearly a million homes in Louisiana.

They have raised rates sharply because, they say, the risk of severe storms has increased. They have also refused to renew many policies in vulnerable areas. The settlement disclosed yesterday is expected to have minimum effect on the cost of coverage.

State Farm got a vivid picture of the hostility toward it in the first jury trial a little more than a week ago. Judge Senter abruptly declared that State Farm had failed to prove its case and the jury quickly came back with a decision requiring the company to pay $2.5 million in punitive damages to a couple in Biloxi who lost everything in the storm. The judge also awarded the couple the full value of their insurance policy: $223,000. State Farm had maintained that it owed them nothing.

Randy J. Maniloff, a lawyer at White & Williams in Philadelphia who represents insurance companies, said yesterday that it was clear that the bad publicity had been a big factor in State Farm's decision to settle. "They spent 80 years building up a brand," he said, "and the adverse publicity from these lawsuits has been clearly doing damage to the brand. It just flies in the face of their portrayal of themselves as good neighbors."

Indeed, according to people close to the talks, it was State Farm that first suggested a settlement in a telephone call early last fall to Mr. Scruggs, the lawyer.

Mr. Scruggs, who came to prominence by filing lawsuits against the tobacco industry, reached an agreement in principle with State Farm two weeks ago.

DOJ_NMG_0120729

But Mr. Hood, the state attorney general, and Mr. Dale, the insurance commissioner, expressed reservations. Both officials said they wanted to make sure that homeowners got the best possible deal. Mr. Dale, though, said it was also important that any agreement not be overly burdensome for the insurance companies.

Mr. Scruggs, whose home in Pascagoula was destroyed along with those of many neighbors, said that resolving the coverage dispute had been "the most personal and most difficult" work in his 30-year career. He has not settled with his own insurer. But for his work on the settlement, he will share as much as $46 million with lawyers from half a dozen firms — to be paid by State Farm on top of its payments to homeowners.

In the agreement, State Farm said it would pay $80 million to settle the 640 lawsuits and to reopen, at the request of homeowners, up to 35,000 other claims. The insurance company agreed to pay at least $50 million more on the previously closed claims.

Participants in the talks estimated that State Farm could pay a further $250 million to $600 million, depending on how many people reopened claims. For the 300 homes that were swept away, State Farm agreed to pay the full insured value. Those homes were insured for $69,700 to $2.34 million. The owners of the 340 other homes, with varying degrees of damage, are to receive an average of $124,400.

In the review of closed claims, homeowners may accept a new offer from State Farm or insist on binding arbitration in hopes of receiving more money. Storm victims are also free to ignore the settlement and file separate lawsuits against State Farm. But few are expected to do so.

WAR NEWS:

A Bid To Rescue A Presidency (LAT)

By Janet Hook

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — Can this presidency be saved?

That's the question that loomed Tuesday as President Bush gave his State of the Union speech in the most inhospitable climate he has ever faced for his annual address to Congress.

In proposing a short list of initiatives on healthcare, immigration and energy, Bush gave more attention than he has in past speeches to domestic issues. That agenda was potentially more appealing to Democrats - or at least harder for them to dismiss out of hand - than his ill-fated plan to overhaul Social Security, which was to be the crown jewel of his second term legacy.

But his plans may be too modest to accomplish the broader challenge facing Bush: How to rescue the last quarter of his presidency from irrelevance and patch his tattered legacy. Bush is trying to regain his footing when Iraq is littered with carnage; Democrats are calling the shots on Capitol Hill; and vast majorities of the public are disenchanted with his leadership.

"This represents the end of the Bush era," said Michael Tanner, a policy analyst for the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank. "This speech shows that outside Iraq, he is increasingly irrelevant."

In the speech, Bush tried to remain gracious and optimistic about finding common ground with Democrats.

"Like many before us, we can work through our differences and achieve big things for the American people," he told the joint session of Congress.

The moment is reminiscent of the position Bill Clinton was in after Republicans won control of Congress in 1994. Clinton seemed so marginalized that he felt obliged to assert at a press conference that he was still "relevant."

But Clinton went on to work with the Republican-controlled Congress and rack up notable legislative accomplishments, including a balanced budget plan, an overhaul of welfare, a minimum wage increase and expansion of health insurance coverage.

Burdened by an unpopular war, Bush is not aiming as high on the domestic front. And he is following, more than leading, in a political environment where the agenda is increasingly being set by others - by Democratic leaders in Congress, the nation's governors and the crowd of politicians campaigning for president.

DOJ_NMG_0120730

Bush is chiming in on a burgeoning national debate about how to expand health insurance coverage. Republican governors - Arnold Schwarzenegger of California and Mitt Romney, late of Massachusetts - have broken the partisan mold and crafted ambitious healthcare plans.

Business and labor groups are making odd-bedfellow alliances to promote expanded coverage. Former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) has made universal health insurance coverage a central plank of his presidential campaign. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) offered a plan to broaden coverage on the first day of her campaign.

Bush's contribution is a proposal that has already been declared dead-on-arrival on Capitol Hill because it could hurt many who are already insured. He is proposing a change in the tax system to cap deductions for employer-provided health insurance and provide new tax breaks for people who buy their own insurance. It is a plan that is in keeping with Bush's aversion to government mandates.

"In all we do, we must remember that the best healthcare decisions are made not by government and insurance companies but by patients and their doctors," he said.

But the tax change would increase the number of people covered by only about 5 million, when nearly 47 million are uninsured. The plan is opposed by labor unions and many business leaders are not enthusiastic about it. It would face formidable obstacles even if Bush had introduced it at the height of his powers.

Bush also proposed giving states more leeway to use Medicaid funds to devise their own plans to expand health insurance coverage. But that initiative amounts only to redeploying money, not increasing the federal commitment, and it is unclear how many of the uninsured would be covered.

On energy, Bush seems on the defensive against Democrats who are trying to bring a new sense of urgency to the effort to combat global warming. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco) has appointed a special committee to study the issue. Al Gore won an Oscar nomination for his documentary on global warming. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), one of the leading presidential candidates, is making it a signature issue.

Bush proposes tackling the issue by aiming to cut gasoline consumption by 20% in 10 years, mostly by promoting the use of alternative fuels. He did break new ground and move toward Democrats by proposing stricter fuel emission standards, but he did not go as far as most Democrats believe is needed to reduce global warming.

And Democrats remained skeptical about his commitment. "It's not just about what he says. It's about what he does," said Pelosi. "In the past he has talked the talk on climate change. But he hasn't walked the walk."

Two other issues that Bush promoted are old standbys: renewal of his landmark school reform law, No Child Left Behind, and an overhaul of immigration laws to allow illegal immigrants to become citizens.

Both measures put Bush at odds with conservative activists. They oppose his more intrusive federal role in schools and kept last year's immigration legislation from including what they called "amnesty" for illegal immigrants.

Even the parts of the speech that were touted as groundbreaking and bold by the White House are echoes of past speeches. Last year's State of the Union included plans to end the country's "addiction to oil." And his 2006 speech also spotlighted another tax-break approach to improving medical coverage, through tax-advantaged health savings accounts. Neither of those issues advanced even in a Congress controlled by his own party.

Joe Lockhart, a former Clinton aide and co-founder of the political website hotsoup.com, said Bush may have missed an opportunity to put Democrats on the defensive with a bolder agenda on issues such as global warming, healthcare and immigration.

"He offered only piecemeal approaches to dealing with these issues," said Lockhart. "Add to that no flexibility on Iraq and the speech is destined to be forgotten almost as soon as it's completed."

If Bush and the Democrats do not find a way to forge bipartisan deals, election day 2006 will turn out to be the beginning of the end of Bush's presidency. Then, some allies say, the best thing he can do in the next two years will be to recognize the limits of his legislative power and focus more on framing the debate for 2008.

"There's nothing good or useful that can be passed out of this Congress in the next two years," said Grover Norquist, a Bush ally and president of Americans for Tax Reform. "It's not as if he can bend Congress to his will. He can veto things, he can stop things, he can introduce ideas and repeat ideas. That is his power.

The State Of The President: Beleaguered (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

President Bush used his State of the Union address last night to try to revive his presidency against what may be the greatest odds any chief executive has faced in a generation.

Other presidents have encountered difficult moments and have been dealt electoral setbacks, but few have faced the combination of obstacles that now confront this White House. Bush arrived at the Capitol at his lowest point in public-opinion polls, facing new Democratic majorities in the House and Senate and lame-duck status as attention turns rapidly toward a 2008 presidential campaign that will choose his successor.

Bush's problems all stem from the same issue. The public has lost confidence in his Iraq war policy, and, in the face of evidence that Americans are looking for a change in course, the president has chosen with his new plan to deploy additional troops to the conflict -- a direction the public overwhelmingly opposes.

But his response last night was a speech that was very much in keeping with the style of leadership he has demonstrated repeatedly in office. If he was humbler in tone and rhetorically generous to his Democratic opponents in calling for cooperation, he was anything but defensive.

"This is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we're in," Bush said. "Every one of us wishes this war were over and won. Yet it would not be like us to leave our promises unkept, our friends abandoned and our own security at risk. Ladies and gentlemen: On this day, at this hour, it is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle. Let us find our resolve and turn events toward victory."

Last night's address was two speeches in one. Bush plowed through the domestic initiatives with little emotion, but suddenly came alive when he turned his attention to Iraq and terrorism, as passionate and determined as always when he speaks about the war that has defined his presidency.

The atmosphere in the House chamber also changed, signifying the divisions over the president's Iraq policy. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.), who had basked in Bush's praise as the nation's first female speaker at the beginning of the speech, sat stony-faced as he exhorted the country to follow his lead in Iraq. As the president asked for a chance to make his Iraq policy work, Republicans leaped to applaud. Pelosi and the Democrats remained seated.

There were three underlying messages in the president's address. The first was a familiar argument about the terrorist threat and plea for patience on Iraq, a chord struck earlier in the day by Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the expected new commander of U.S. forces there. Although about two in three Americans disagree with the decision to send more troops to Iraq and members of Congress are preparing nonbinding resolutions to declare their opposition, Bush asked for time to show that the strategy can succeed.

He recalled that the country was largely united at the time of the invasion in 2003 and acknowledged the divisions that have emerged since. But he argued that whatever motivated members of Congress at the time of the invasion, there was a consensus that the United States must win the war.

Bush may have been speaking into the void. Over the past six months, there has been a critical turn in public opinion. Long ago, a majority of Americans concluded that the president's decision to go to war was a mistake. The administration tried to shrug that off by focusing attention on the consequences of failure, believing that as long as Americans saw some chance for success they would continue to support the mission.

Today Bush has lost that battle for public opinion as well. NBC News-Wall Street Journal polls have tracked public confidence on the question of whether there will be a successful conclusion in Iraq. A year ago, the public was mildly pessimistic, with 41 percent saying they had confidence in a successful outcome and 49 percent saying they did not. Attitudes remained generally in that range throughout the summer, but last fall they took a sharp negative turn. By October, 27 percent saw hope for a successful conclusion, and 61 percent did not. In December, attitudes turned even more sour, with a 50-point gap between those who believe the United States can win and those who doubt there can be a successful conclusion.

"The American public thinks it's time to start wrapping up," said Republican pollster Bill McInturff, who jointly conducts the poll with Democratic pollster Peter D. Hart. "The president's doing something that is very difficult. It's the core of presidential leadership, and that is to stick to what he believes is the right policy in the face of an American public that has decided they disagree with him. . . . The president has very little capacity to change their mind."

The second message from the president was a call for bipartisan cooperation, particularly on domestic issues such as budget deficits, earmarks, immigration, energy, health care and education.

"We are not the first to come here with government divided and uncertainty in the air," Bush said. "Like many before us, we can work through our differences and achieve big things for the American people. Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on -- as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done."

Administration officials expressed optimism yesterday that they can reach agreement with the Democrats in Congress on the path to a balanced budget, on the reauthorization of the No Child Left Behind education law and on some elements of a strategy to wean the nation off imported oil.

But even as Bush was calling for bipartisan cooperation, Democrats were seeking coalitions with Republicans to advance their own agenda. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee will begin working this morning on a resolution opposing Bush's Iraq plan, a measure that has the support of a growing number of Republican senators. In the House, Democrats completed work on the first six items of their agenda last week, attracting a substantial number of Republicans to several of the measures.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the third-ranking Democrat in the Senate, said yesterday that Bush so far has shown no evidence of wanting real compromise with Democrats on issues such as Iraq and health care.

"This year, I don't think the change is the president, who is staying in his ideological tower, but Republicans in the Senate, who have said we just can't keep following this president," he said. "That's where you will see the bipartisanship."

A Republican strategist, asked not to be identified in order to speak freely about the administration's problems, said Democrats are not in any mood to be generous to Bush. Referring to the president's approval rating, he said, "When you're sitting at 35 and you're telling them what to do after they won an election, they've got to chuckle."

Bush's third message last night was perhaps the most robust domestic agenda of his presidency, a way of saying to those who are ready to write him off that he still has the power of the bully pulpit to inject ideas into the national debate and force others to react to them. It was a message that said he should not be regarded as a lame duck.

"Either we're going to see progress on that agenda or it will be a banner to which our allies on the Hill, Republican or Democrat, can repair," a senior White House official said.

Even Republicans outside the White House questioned that optimism. "My view is that Bush's speech tonight, especially the domestic policy side, is an attempt to set the agenda for the 2008 Republican primaries, not for the 2007 Congress," said Daniel Casse, a strategist and writer. "I think their motivation is to make sure candidates in '08 are running on ideas established by George Bush, not running away from them."

Bush is by nature a competitor, and the State of the Union address reminded the country that he will continue to push his ideas even in the face of enormous public skepticism. Given the political balance in Congress, the chances of him getting his way domestically are slender. Prospects in Iraq appear even more difficult.

That is why, though he certainly did not intend to steal a page from Democratic Sen. Barack Obama's best-selling book, his speech last night may be remembered as "the audacity of hope."

Bush Urges Congress, Nation To Give His Iraq Plan A Chance (WP)

By Peter Baker And Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

President Bush implored lawmakers and the nation last night to give him one more chance to win the war in Iraq and avoid the "nightmare scenario" of defeat while presenting a domestic agenda intended to find common cause with the new Democratic Congress on issues such as energy and immigration.

Politically wounded but rhetorically unbowed, Bush gave no ground on his decision to dispatch 21,500 more troops to Iraq despite a bipartisan cascade of criticism. Addressing for the first time a Congress controlled by the other party, Bush challenged Democrats to "show our enemies abroad that we are united in the goal of victory" and warned that the consequences of failure in Iraq "would be grievous and far-reaching."

"I respect you and the arguments you've made," Bush told skeptical lawmakers from both parties in his sixth State of the Union address and the fourth since the invasion of Iraq in March 2003. "We went into this largely united -- in our assumptions and in our convictions. And whatever you voted for, you did not vote for failure. Our country is pursuing a new strategy in Iraq, and I ask you to give it a chance to work."

With new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.) sitting behind him in a vivid sign of the power shift on Capitol Hill, Bush congratulated Democrats on their victory in the November elections and paid tribute to the first woman to serve in the nation's third-highest office. "Tonight, I have a high privilege and distinct honor of my own as the first president to begin the State of the Union message with these words: 'Madam Speaker,' " Bush said, then turned to shake Pelosi's hand as she beamed and lawmakers cheered.

The president further reached out to Democrats in the 49-minute speech with ideas to expand health-care coverage, overhaul immigration laws and improve education performance, ideas that he framed as efforts to provide "hope and opportunity," a phrase he used six times. In his most ambitious new proposal, he laid out a plan to reduce projected gasoline consumption in the United States by 20 percent over the next 10 years.

"Congress has changed, but not our responsibilities," Bush said. He added: "We're not the first to come here with a government divided and uncertainty in the air. Like many before us, we can work through our differences and achieve big things for the American people."

Yet his approach contrasted with the last two presidents to address an opposition Congress after their parties lost midterm elections. Ronald Reagan conceded "serious mistakes" in 1987, as did Bill Clinton in 1995. Clinton moved to the middle so conspicuously that the opposition leader who gave the official response noted that he "sounded pretty Republican." Although Bush acknowledged two weeks ago that "mistakes have been made" in Iraq, he appeared unchastened last night and took no responsibility for his party's defeat or errors in office.

Democrats seemed unimpressed by his latest governing blueprint and signaled that they are in no mood to meet him in the middle. Long before Bush arrived in the House chamber to deliver his remarks, Democratic leaders and allied interest groups rushed out statements blasting his domestic proposals as rehashed ideas, empty rhetoric or flawed concepts that would create other problems. But the divide between president and Congress was most inflamed by his leadership of a war that will soon enter its fifth year.

"The president took us into this war recklessly," said freshman Sen. James Webb (D-Va.), a former Marine who was tapped to give the formal response. Accusing Bush of disregarding warnings by national security experts before invading Iraq, Webb added: "We are now, as a nation, held hostage to the predictable -- and predicted -- disarray that has followed."

In a joint statement released after the speech, Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.) chided Bush's Iraq troop increase and vowed to hold nonbinding votes on it. "While the president continues to ignore the will of the country, Congress will not ignore this president's failed policy," they said. "His plan will receive an up-or-down vote in both the House and the Senate, and we will continue to hold him accountable for changing course in Iraq."

The speech came at the nadir of the Bush presidency to date, with the war grinding on, ever-widening bloodshed and no end in sight, two-thirds of the public turned against him in opinion polls and Democrats controlling both houses of Congress.

Even as they sought to revive his political viability with the national address, White House officials spent yesterday monitoring reports from Iraq, where a U.S. security helicopter crashed and five American civilians were killed, amid disputed claims that it was shot down. And they nervously watched the opening of the perjury trial of Vice President Cheney's former chief aide, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, whose lawyer asserted the White House made him a scapegoat in the CIA leak case to protect Deputy Chief of Staff Karl Rove.

Bush devoted about half of his speech last night to Iraq, terrorism and foreign policy, largely recapitulating his familiar argument that the war is the central front in a broader battle with terrorists and represents a "generational struggle that will continue long after you and I have turned our duties over to others." He linked Sunni insurgents, Shiite extremists, al-Qaeda terrorists and Hezbollah militants as arms of a broader "Islamist radical movement" but acknowledged that the mission in Iraq has changed from deposing Saddam Hussein to stopping sectarian violence.

"This is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we're in," he said. "Every one of us wishes this war were over and won. Yet it would not be like us to leave our promises unkept, our friends abandoned and our own security at risk. Ladies and gentlemen, on this day, at this hour, it is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle. Let us find our resolve and turn events toward victory."

He did not directly debate proposals by some Democrats to cut off funding for more troops in Iraq but asked them to let him try his new plan. "In the end, I chose this course of action because it provides the best chance for success," he said. "Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far-reaching."

The immediate consequence he envisioned was an Iraqi capital plunged into anarchy. "If American forces step back before Baghdad is secure, the Iraqi government would be overrun by extremists on all sides," Bush said. "We could expect an epic battle between Shia extremists backed by Iran and Sunni extremists aided by al-Qaeda and supporters of the old regime. A contagion of violence could spill out across the country -- and in time the entire region could be drawn into the conflict."

Many in the chamber appeared unpersuaded. Pelosi sat grim-faced through the discussion of Iraq and did not clap when Republicans rose to support some of the president's statements. Although Iraq alone represented about a quarter of the speech, it generated applause just six times out of about 60 interruptions.

To reach out to skeptics, Bush repeated his call to create a bipartisan advisory council on the battle with terrorists and promoted his plan to permanently expand the U.S. military by 92,000 soldiers and Marines over five years to ease the burdens of fighting simultaneous wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Sitting with first lady Laura Bush's box in the gallery during the speech were five decorated Iraq veterans, including Air Force Tech. Sgt. Michelle Barefield, who survived three attacks by makeshift bombs at Baghdad International Airport, repelled an enemy assault with her M-16 rifle and was awarded the Bronze Star. The White House also invited a domestic hero, Wesley Autrey, a New York construction worker who earned acclaim by jumping onto subway tracks to save a man who had fallen during a seizure.

While harboring little hope of changing minds on Iraq, White House aides said the president's ideas on domestic policy could appeal to Democrats. "We do believe it's one that can serve as a basis for bipartisan outreach," said Deputy Chief of Staff Joel D. Kaplan.

The biggest previously undisclosed initiative announced last night was Bush's proposal to reduce U.S. gasoline consumption by 20 percent by 2017, largely by stimulating the growth of ethanol and other alternative fuels but also by increasing fuel efficiency of automobiles. Bush has spoken in past State of the Union addresses about his desire to break U.S. dependency on foreign oil and last year declared that "America is addicted to oil," but his speech last night represented his most aggressive effort to curtail the habit.

The president proposed an ambitious campaign to expand the use of ethanol, methanol, hydrogen and other alternative fuels by requiring oil refineries to use 35 billion gallons of renewable and alternative fuels by 2017, a fivefold increase in the current target. Aides calculated that doing so would displace about 15 percent of projected gasoline use.

Bush also asked Congress to overhaul the mileage standards for automobiles. Rather than forcing automakers to raise fuel-efficiency standards for new cars across the board, Bush is pushing for flexibility to set different standards for different sizes and makes so manufacturers do not make smaller cars that are less safe. Officials forecast raising fuel standards by 4 percent a year, which would reduce overall gasoline use by 5 percent by 2017.

Bush also announced plans to double the capacity of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to 1.5 billion barrels by 2027 to further insulate the United States from short-term disruptions in foreign oil supplies. "Achieving these ambitious goals will dramatically reduce our dependence on foreign oil," he said.

Although the president did not embrace any plans specifically to combat greenhouse gases generally believed to contribute to global warming, as some in Washington urged him to do, he argued that technology and his energy plans "will help us to confront the serious challenge of global climate change."

Democrats said Bush's plans contain significant loopholes or are not tough enough. The alternative-fuel plan could allow for more use of fuels that emit toxic gases, critics said. And on Monday, 11 senators, including eight Democrats, two Republicans and an independent, proposed an across-the-board increase in fuel standards to 35 miles per gallon by 2019.

As aides disclosed in recent days, Bush also called for a major change in the tax code in an effort to make health insurance more affordable. Under his plan, health insurance coverage would be taxable income but families would receive a $15,000 deduction. The plan would make it easier for those who buy health insurance out of pocket while increasing taxes on those who receive employer-funded health care worth more than $15,000 to eventually offset the cost.

"Changing the tax code is a vital and necessary step to making health care affordable for more Americans," Bush said. He added that he would also direct more federal money to states to cover low-income residents, although aides did not specify how much money would be provided.

Bush used the speech to press Congress to approve his long-standing immigration bill, which couples increased funding for border security with a plan for a temporary-worker program. The plan was blocked by the Republican-led Congress last year, but administration officials hope it may be more appealing to Democrats. "We need to resolve the status of the illegal immigrants who are already in our country -- without animosity and without amnesty," Bush said.

Bush also urged Congress to reauthorize -- and not weaken -- his signature No Child Left Behind education law, which is aimed at holding schools accountable through greater testing to make sure students meet minimum standards of achievement. And he repeated his vow to produce a plan next month that will balance the budget in five years while demanding that Congress cut special-interest projects in half by the end of this congressional session.

Bush Offers Plan To Curb Reliance On Foreign Oil (WSJ)

By John D. McKinnon, John J. Fialka And Yochi J. Dreazen

Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush yesterday offered a blueprint he said would lead toward U.S. energy security and independence, calling for a 20% cut in gasoline consumption over the next decade through new fuel-economy standards and a massive boost in federal mandates for using ethanol and other alternative fuels.

Amplifying the theme of weaning the country from its reliance on oil, Mr. Bush used a State of the Union address weighted heavily to domestic issues to urge a doubling of the nation's strategic-petroleum stockpile to protect against a sudden cutoff of foreign supplies.

"For too long our nation has been dependent on foreign oil," he said, echoing his famous declaration of last year's speech that the country was "addicted to oil." "The dependence leaves us more vulnerable to hostile regimes and to terrorists," he added.

The politically weakened Mr. Bush's latest energy initiative marks the start of his attempt to try to define himself as something other than a lame-duck president, facing a hostile Democrat-led Congress and consumed largely with Iraq. His call for alternative fuels, with a brief nod toward global-warming concerns, was just one of many ways he tried to find common ground with the Democrats who will determine the fate of his agenda.

In his 50-minute address, the president also put forth plans for expanding health coverage to the uninsured, renewing calls for a comprehensive immigration package that was rejected by the previous Republican-led Congress, extending his "No Child Left Behind" education program and offering new overseas assistance to combat AIDS and malaria.

"Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on -- as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when work is to be done," Mr. Bush said as a Democratic Speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, sat prominently behind him for the first time in his presidency.

While the White House touted the energy agenda as one of the most significant parts of Mr. Bush's agenda, achieving its goals rests on the uncertainty of technological breakthroughs, and the administration is promising relatively little money to subsidize what would be a major redirection in the country's energy markets.

Mr. Bush also asked Congress for the power to "reform and modernize" fuel-economy standards, yet continued to reject calls for legislation mandating specific higher fuel standards. He maintains that regulators, rather than lawmakers, are better situated to set new higher requirements for auto makers.

And the president avoided widespread demands to embrace new economy-wide caps on so-called greenhouse gases, instead asserting that greater use of cleaner energies would lead to a reduction in these emissions, widely believed to cause global warming. "The way forward is through technology," he said.

By seizing on the goal of "energy independence," Mr. Bush has chosen a topic on which the public thirst for action is growing. It is also an initiative with significant consequences for national-security policy: If the country actually succeeded in significantly cutting its appetite for oil, its stake in the Middle Eastern problems that so bedevil the president would be reduced.

Though Mr. Bush focused on issues popular with Democrats -- and shunned old favorites he touted before the more friendly Republican majority, such as broad tax cuts -- it remains unclear how much he will be able to set the agenda in Washington. Virginia's newly elected Sen. James Webb, giving the Democrats' formal response to the address, asked Mr. Bush to move closer to Democrats on foreign policy and domestic issues. "If he does, we will join him," Mr. Webb said. "If he does not, we will be showing him the way."

Farm-state Democrats are likely to embrace -- and expand upon -- Mr. Bush's plans for a big bump in ethanol and biodiesel production. They are likely to take his proposals for increased research funding as an opening bid, and go up from there. Mr. Webb praised Mr. Bush's energy proposals and said: "We look forward to working with the president and his party to bring about these changes."

Mr. Bush's call for immigration-law changes seems likely to gain traction as well -- and drew a standing ovation from lawmakers. But his plans for overhauling fuel-economy standards face longer odds in Congress, as do proposals to give a big tax deduction to spur health-insurance purchases and to cull funds from federal low-income health programs for state efforts to create insurance pools for poor people.

Though Mr. Bush devoted the first half of his address entirely to domestic issues, he couldn't avoid the Iraq war and it consumed most of the second half. He included specific warnings to the country that failure would give Iraqi extremists a haven for plotting attacks against U.S. targets while emboldening Iran to pursue nuclear weapons. And he asked -- almost pleaded -- for a skeptical Congress to support his "new strategy in Iraq," saying, "I ask you to give it a chance to work."

But the significance the White House attached to the energy plan was underscored by the decision to send Mr. Bush on a first post-speech appearance this morning to Delaware with Energy Secretary Samuel Bodman, to visit a DuPont Co. research facility working on biofuels.

Last year, Mr. Bush called for doubling the research for fuels made from farm wastes such as corn stalks and straw. However, his proposed funding for the first commercial-size plants was stymied in Congress.

The centerpiece of Mr. Bush's newest energy plan is a significant increase in federal targets for use of renewable and alternative fuels, categories that include ethanol made from corn. The current standard aims for consumption of 7.5 billion gallons by 2012, a level the U.S. is likely to hit within about a year, thanks to ethanol's growing popularity. The new target would be 35 billion gallons of renewable and alternative fuels by 2017 -- an amount Mr. Bush hopes will reduce projected gasoline consumption by about 15%.

The White House said oil companies would be required to mix a certain proportion of renewables into the fuel they distribute. If they don't, they would face a penalty.

Democrats and Republicans, particularly those from Midwestern states, cheered the idea. But boosting ethanol use isn't as easy as the president made it sound. There isn't currently enough corn in the U.S. to make all the fuel the White House says will be used, and environmentalists worry that adding to corn production would increase pollution. Making ethanol from cleaner sources such as wood chips isn't yet commercially proven.

The energy plan's second main element is a rewrite of federal fuel-economy standards that assumes the administration will raise passenger-car mileage standards by 4% more each year. By 2017, those changes would shave another 5% off projected gasoline use, for a total reduction of 20% in 10 years. Together, the proposals also would speed up by eight years Mr. Bush's goal from last year's speech of eliminating the equivalent of 75% of current Middle East oil imports.

The increase in the Corporate Average Fuel Economy (CAFE) standard is about twice the increase the administration imposed last year on light trucks and is in line with several proposals on Capitol Hill. Industry and environmental lobbyists both consider 4% a year to be a significant increase, though some are skeptical the administration will follow through.

While the CAFE change is likely to upset some auto makers, the administration has designed it with a feature that could be appealing to some: a provision for creating CAFE credits for manufacturers that exceed one or more of the standards, which could be traded or banked for future use.

The White House said in materials distributed earlier in the day that the energy plan would also serve as the administration's climate-change policy -- asserting it would "help confront climate change by stopping the projected growth of carbon emissions from cars, light trucks and SUVs within 10 years."

In his health-care package, Mr. Bush is offering to raise taxes on generally higher-income earners in the name of making health care more available for lower-income people. The White House plan would make employer-provided health insurance taxable for the first time. But it would create a big new tax deduction -- $15,000 for families and $7,500 for singles -- for everyone who gets insurance, whether at work or on their own. The plan would also help states extend insurance coverage by diverting money that now supports hospitals that care for the poor into state-created programs that subsidized basic insurance plans.

The foreign-policy component of Mr. Bush's remarks contained an implicit acknowledgment of how much U.S. power has ebbed in recent years because of the war in Iraq -- and how the conflict has significantly reduced leverage over adversaries such as Iran and North Korea. White House aides privately conceded before the speech that U.S. failures in Iraq had sharply increased Iran's influence, and that Tehran seemed to be gambling the U.S. would be unable to wage a military campaign against Iran because the American military was so overstretched.

Mr. Bush's public remarks about the Middle East have in the past focused heavily on Sunni Muslim extremist groups like al-Qaeda, but Mr. Bush last night said, "The Shia and Sunni extremists are different faces of the same totalitarian threat."

The speech also featured a revival of Mr. Bush's argument that the fighting in Iraq shouldn't be looked at in isolation, but as part of a broader confrontation with Islamic militants and as a more ideological conflict between forces of moderation and extremism. Both wars, Mr. Bush said, would last long after he had left office.

Bush Turns Domestic, But War Won't Go Away (CHIT)

By Michael Tackett

Chicago Tribune, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- It was no small irony that President Bush seemed to be channeling Al Gore on energy policy on the very day that Gore's documentary film on global warming, "An Inconvenient Truth," was nominated for an Oscar.,

After several years of using war and terror as the defining themes of his State of the Union message, the president who came to office with little inclination toward foreign affairs tried to recast his presidency Tuesday night with a notable emphasis on domestic issues. Indeed, the president was more than 3,100 words into his speech before his first invocation of Iraq.

He did spend considerable time on energy. And while he didn't mention global warming specifically, he did emphasize a call to reduce U.S. gasoline usage by 20 percent over 10 years. Though he has mentioned energy independence seven straight years, his proposals have advanced only sporadically. Now the president's tone is far closer to the man he denied the White House in 2000, with talk of "hybrid vehicles," "biodiesel" and "solar and wind energy."

The president also made pitches for changes in health care, education and immigration. Much of it had the ring of George W. Bush, circa Sept. 10. 2001, which is to say an agenda focused tightly within America's borders.

But he confronts an older and more formidable reality. No matter the merits of his plans offered Tuesday night, his presidency almost certainly seems destined to be defined by his stewardship of the war in Iraq.

His audience was much different this time as well, at least in terms of relative power. Democrats, who for six years had in essence served as the loyal opposition, now hold effective veto power over anything the president sends up to Capitol Hill. And instead of having his ever-applauding wingmen of Dennis Hastert, as House speaker, and Vice President Dick Cheney, the president had new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi staring over his left shoulder, her vibrant sea foam ensemble a vivid contrast to the dark suits who have held her post.

Bush began with a grace note about Pelosi, the first woman speaker to preside over the chamber during a State of the Union speech. Those words came easily. Others, though didn't seem to roll naturally off Bush's tongue, such was when he talked of the State of the Union as a "rite of custom" and spoke of "endeavors underway."

DOJ_NMG_0120738

In body language, and in words, the Democrats were skeptics. And now they have the votes to go with it. This might well mark the night that the president formally ceded control of the national agenda.

Presidents use their State of the Union addresses to try to shape national priorities in their own vision. By using the first half of his address to talk about things close to home, the president signaled a new intention for the final two years of his term in office.

"…We are all held to the same standards and called to serve the same good purposes: to extend this nation's prosperity, to spend the people's money wisely, to solve problems, not leave them to future generations," the president said.

Many of his proposals, though, were studies in incrementalism. Wrong though they might be, there's hardly a national firestorm over earmarks, the dark-of-night practice by members of Congress of inserting pet projects into spending bills.

The early signs from Democrats evidenced their serious doubts about Bush's sincerity.

In many important respects, Bush really gave his State of the Union speech two weeks ago when he announced his plan to flood Iraq with about 21,500 additional troops to try to halt the sectarian violence. And on that score, the president must also shore up support among Republicans, including Sen. John Warner (R-Va.), a leading voice on military affairs who just a day ago rejected the Bush plan. Democrats seem to be ever more vocal in their opposition, a viewpoint forcefully expressed by Virginia's other senator, the newly elected Democrat, James Webb, who delivered his party's response.

Beyond specific proposals tied to issues, the president offered what in another context might be seen as a poetic appeal for bipartisanship. But if ever a twist was born of necessity this was it, and Democrats didn't seem to be in a reciprocal mood.

Webb seemed outwardly combative, particularly on Iraq, a conflict he opposed even before the first shots were fired. A decorated Marine in Vietnam, the son of a soldier, and the father of a Marine now serving in Iraq, Webb has a special credibility on military matters.

"This country has patiently endured a mismanaged war for nearly four years," Webb said.

"… The president took us into this war recklessly. …We are now, as a nation, held hostage to the predictable {ndash} and predicted {ndash} disarray that has followed." The barbed tenor of Webb's words sent a strong signal of just how much the center of gravity has shifted in Washington.

And how much the debate has shifted on Iraq. While the president was slow in coming to Iraq in his speech, he nonetheless devoted nearly half of his time to the war, with a now familiar narrative. That war, however, will occupy a much larger space in the history of his presidency.

Bush Asks For Time On Plan For Iraq (BSUN)

By Julie Hirschfeld Davis

The Baltimore Sun, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush appealed to a recalcitrant Congress and an anxious public Tuesday night to give his Iraq troop increase a chance, seeking to revive his waning influence with plans to reduce gasoline usage and expand access to health coverage.

Bush offered a conciliatory tone and a suite of proposals on hot-button domestic issues for his first State of the Union before a Democratic Congress, one in which his aides said he was trying to be "gracious" and acknowledge a new dynamic on Capitol Hill.

"Congress has changed, but not our responsibilities," Bush said, after congratulating Democrats for their victories.

With his poll numbers sagging and war criticism swirling, the president called on Congress to work with him on issues of shared concern such as energy and health care. He renewed his calls for an immigration overhaul that would allow some illegal immigrants the chance to become citizens and a reauthorization of the "No Child Left Behind" education law.

"We are not the first to come here with government divided and uncertainty in the air. Like many before us, we can work through our differences and achieve big things for the American people," Bush said.

Singling out House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, Bush said he had the "high privilege and distinct honor" of being the first president to begin his annual address with the words "Madam Speaker."

DOJ_NMG_0120739

"In his day, the late Congressman Thomas D'Alesandro Jr., from Baltimore, Md., saw Presidents Roosevelt and Truman at this rostrum. But nothing could compare with the sight of his only daughter, Nancy, presiding to night as speaker of the House of Representatives," Bush said, turning to clasp hands with a beaming Pelosi as he began his 50-minute speech.

But the specter of Iraq hung heavily over the speech, which came a day after House and Senate Republicans signaled grave reservations about Bush's 21,500 troop build-up, adding their skeptical voices to the nearly unanimous chorus of Democrats who oppose the move.

The president acknowledged the doubts -- "I respect you, and the arguments you have made," he said -- but he made it clear that he was not about to change his mind.

"Whatever you voted for, you did not vote for failure," Bush said. "Our country is pursuing a new strategy in Iraq, and I ask you to give it a chance to work."

Democrats tapped Sen. James Webb of Virginia, a Vietnam veteran who has been a vocal critic of Bush's war strategy, to give their official response. He had scathing criticism for the president, who he said "took us into this war recklessly" and had bungled every aspect of it and who he blamed for presiding over an economy where "benefits are not being fairly shared" with the average worker.

Invoking the examples of Theodore Roosevelt and Dwight D. Eisenhower, two popular Republican presidents who he said took on steep economic and national security challenges, Webb called on Bush to turn things around on both fronts: "If he does, we will join him. If he does not, we will be showing him the way."

Republicans, for their part, said the president had provided a basis for bipartisan compromise on important issues.

Bush "outlined an agenda that addresses our nation's most pressing challenges and lays the groundwork for continued economic growth and prosperity," Sen. Jon . Kyl of Arizona, the Senate's No. 3 Republican, said in a statement.

The president "brought serious proposals to the table to begin the debate," Kyl added.

Rep. John A. Boehner of Ohio, the House Republican leader, said Bush had "laid out a series of ambitious proposals addressing the nation's priorities, and I hope Congress will give each a fair hearing. If Democrat leaders are going to oppose the president's agenda, they have an obligation to present their own alternatives."

Bush defended his choice to add troops amid raging sectarian violence in Baghdad and elsewhere in Iraq, first announced in a speech he gave two weeks ago from the White House.

"Our military commanders and I have carefully weighed the options. We discussed every possible approach," Bush said. "In the end, I chose this course of action because it provides the best chance for success."

He did not specifically mention the tangle of measures opposing the strategy that could come before Congress in the coming weeks and instead focused on articulating the stakes for Americans if the mission in Iraq were to fail, something he called a "nightmare scenario."

"Nothing is more important at this moment in our history than for America to succeed in the Middle East, to succeed in Iraq, and to spare the American people from this danger," Bush said.

Pelosi and Senate Majority Harry Reid of Nevada said they welcomed the bipartisan spirit in which Bush spoke but said he "continues to ignore the will of the country" on Iraq and promised an "up-or-down" vote on his plan.

Bush faced an audience that reflected a new and very different political reality from the one surrounding his past appearances in the well of the House: one where Democrats outnumbered Republicans in a crowd dotted with the faces of presidential aspirants of both parties, whose intense competition is already sucking attention and influence from the current White House occupant.

The president laid out a narrowly tailored set of domestic proposals designed to build on possible areas of compromise with Democrats, but it was fraught with risks and challenges.

Aiming to make a splash with a proposal to reduce gasoline consumption by 20 percent within 10 years, Bush called weaning the country off of oil a national-security imperative. He said he would do so by substantially increasing federal mandates for the amount of ethanol blended into fuel each year -- a step the White House said would reduce gasoline usage by 15 percent. In addition, Bush proposed raising fuel efficiency standards for cars, which could displace gas by an additional 5 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0120740

Taking a new -- and somewhat controversial -- approach to expanding health insurance access, the president proposed making employer-provided coverage taxable, then creating a standard deduction of $15,000 per family or $7,500 per individual for those receiving it or purchasing their own private plan.

He said he would work with Health and Human Services Secretary Michael O. Leavitt to help states find ways to help uninsured patients afford private health coverage.

Bush plans to take his domestic proposals on the road starting Wednesday, with remarks on his energy initiatives in Wilmington, Del., and a roundtable on his health care proposals tomorrow in Lee's Summit, Mo.

Many senior Democrats are adamantly opposed to Bush's new health care proposal, which would open at least some middle- class workers who receive generous employer-provided benefits -- the White House estimates about 20 percent -- to higher income taxes.

Rep. Pete Stark, a California Democrat who chairs a key health subcommittee, said he would not even hold hearings on the proposal, saying it would "make a bad problem worse."

Rep. Charles B. Rangel, a New York Democrat who chairs the Ways and Means Committee, said Bush "really should have done more to reach out to Democrats before his speech to see if we can come together, rather than simply exchange policies and press releases." <

Democrats also say Bush's energy plans do not go far enough in encouraging the development of alternative fuel sources and combating global warming, such as through mandatory limits on carbon-dioxide emissions.

Some in Bush's own party are dead-set against his immigration plan, which crumbled last year amid conservative opposition to an approach that was branded as "amnesty" for lawbreakers.

Still, there were obvious attempts to reach out to Democrats and entice them with policy prescriptions they support. Bush promoted the potential benefits of his energy initiatives, for instance, on curbing carbon dioxide emissions believed to be a main culprit in global warming -- a problem Democrats have vowed to address. Expanding the use of alternative fuels including ethanol also has substantial bipartisan appeal.

Many Democrats have backed Bush's immigration plan, which has a ready-made bipartisan coalition left over from last year's abortive attempt to enact a new law.

Bush "has been a leader on this issue, and I am hopeful that he will continue his efforts with members of his party so that we can pass legislation that that will solve the problem once and for all," said Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, a Massachusetts Democrat who was a main sponsor of a Senate-passed immigration plan that tracked closely with the president's ideas.

Some Democrats also have supported the president's educational reforms, though many have complained since their 2001 enactment that Bush has shortchanged them in his annual budgets, and they are sure to oppose his call to move poor children in underperforming schools to private schools.

The president's speech also was notable for what it did not include.

Burned by his disastrous Social Security overhaul attempt in 2005, Bush steered clear of offering any specific plan for tackling the growth of huge government entitlement programs -- Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid -- that are eating up unsustainably large portions of the federal budget each year. He said only that policymakers were "failing in [the] duty" to fix them and invited Congress to join with him in doing so.

A Shift In Power, Starting With 'Madam Speaker' (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 — From the president's very first words of the evening, it was clear how much had changed in the capital.

"Tonight, I have the high privilege and distinct honor to begin a speech with the words 'Madam Speaker,' " President Bush said Tuesday night in the House, setting off a wave of thunderous applause.

He referred, of course, to Representative Nancy Pelosi of California, the first woman to be speaker of the House and the first Democratic one of Mr. Bush's presidency, whom he greeted with a smile and a warm handshake. In preparation, her staff had coached Ms. Pelosi, an ardent critic of the president, to keep a neutral face, warning her that the cameras trained on him would capture any raised eyebrow or pursed lip.

But while Ms. Pelosi emphasized that she would be "respectful," her very choice of words earlier in the day signaled the new dynamic. "We always give the president a warm welcome as our guest in the chamber," she said, with the operative word, "guest."

The day was full of such reminders of how power has flowed away from the president in the new Washington. Not just because he spoke before a Democratic-led Congress for the first time in his presidency. Not just because his poll numbers are dismal. Not just because the mayor of the nation's capital had rejected the White House's invitation to sit with the first lady, Laura Bush, in her box and instead came as Ms. Pelosi's guest.

Even Republicans, while noting that it was "the president's day," as Senator John W. Warner of Virginia described it, yielded him only a share of the spotlight.

Mr. Warner and others were working with Democrats, whom six months ago they derided as Defeatocrats, on resolutions opposing Mr. Bush's proposal to increase the number of troops in Iraq. They had unveiled their resolutions in the days before the speech and planned to take them up the morning after.

The guests in the boxes on either side of the chamber — Ms. Pelosi's on one, the first lady's on the other — were a tableau of change.

In years past, Mr. Bush invited Iraqis to make his case for the war, including Ahmed Chalabi, the exile-turned-advocate for the war who has now fallen from favor, as well as ordinary Iraqis with ink-stained fingers to prove that they had cast their ballots in their first democratic elections. This year, the only reminders of Iraq were a few soldiers, but the box was mostly filled with educators, entrepreneurs, an energy researcher and those with heartwarming 9/11 stories.

The Democrats, meanwhile, invited people who symbolized the legislation they have passed in their first two weeks in office: people who support embryonic stem cell research, those who fought for national security reforms after the Sept. 11 attacks, and labor leaders who backed an increase in the minimum wage.

The city itself offered reminders of how much has changed for Mr. Bush; in a boxy courtroom down the street, I. Lewis Libby Jr., the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney, was on trial on perjury charges stemming from the administration's efforts to promote its Iraq policy. Democrats had decided it not in their interests to look churlish during the speech. Lawmakers were advised to take their cues when to stand up and sit down, when to applaud from Ms. Pelosi, who sat on the dais next to Mr. Cheney, her junior by several months, but a reminder of an older generation of white male politicians. They exchanged few words as they stood waiting for the parade of lawmakers to assemble. At some points, she beat him in jumping to an ovation.

Her caucus said that they expected Ms. Pelosi to, in the words of Representative John B. Larson of Connecticut, show "poise, dignity, comity."

Appearances were obviously important to Ms. Pelosi, who had changed from the brown suit she had worn earlier in the day to a soft green one, which offered more contrast to her leather speaker's chair.

The noise level in the chamber seemed more muted, as Democrats exercised their new majority by sitting on their hands and staying off their feet during many applause lines. Republicans, who had promised to be "boisterous" to make up for their diminished numbers, greeted Mr. Bush with a series of "ho's!"

Democrats, in turn, shouted, "Hey!" and "Yeah!" when the president introduced Ms. Pelosi as the first female speaker. The president's congratulations to the "Democrat majority" won only polite applause from both sides The chamber erupted most unanimously and loudly for Wesley Autrey, the man who leapt into the tracks of a New York subway to save a fellow passenger. (The only ones not clapping, it appeared, were Mr. Autrey's two young daughters, who napped beside him in their bubblegum-colored dresses.)

Democrats leapt to their feet with the Republicans when Mr. Bush said he wanted to balance the federal budget, provide affordable health care, leave medical decisions to doctors and patients rather than bureaucrats, reduce gasoline consumption and increase alternative fuels.

But the applause was more Republican-only when Mr. Bush said he could balance the budget without raising taxes. Almost no Democrats clapped when he said his candidates for federal judgeships should get quick "up or down votes."

DOJ_NMG_0120742

And there were lines that got little support from Mr. Bush's own side of the aisle. When he pledged to uphold the "tradition of the melting pot," the Republican House leader, Representative John A. Boehner of Ohio, grimaced and clapped just once. When Mr. Bush went further and vowed "comprehensive immigration reform" — code words for the plan the House rejected the Senate approved last year — two top House Republicans, Roy Blunt of Missouri and Adam Putnam of Florida, stayed seated, hands quiet.

And when the president addressed the issue that has dominated discussions on Capitol Hill in recent weeks, his proposed increase in troops in Iraq — there was little unanimity between the parties, or within them. Most Democrats remained seated as the president urged the chamber to "find our resolve." Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York cast a disapproving eye on those who stood, including Senators Joseph I. Lieberman and John Kerry. And while Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice sat forward in her seat and nodded as he described the increase in troops, Republicans who have criticized the plan, including Mr. Warner, stayed off their feet. Perhaps the most poignant commentary on the war and the plan to increase troops came in the Democratic response to the speech, given by Senator James Webb of Virginia. He had been chosen because, as Senator Harry Reid, the Democrats' leader, said, he understood what it meant to go to war. A former secretary of the Navy and ex-marine, his son is serving in Iraq.

During his speech, he held up a tattered photograph of his own father serving as an Air Force captain serving in Germany. He had carried it with him for most of his life, he said. And as a child, he had taken it to bed for three years as he prayed for his father's safe return.

Energy, Healthcare Are Major Points Of Bush's Address (LAT)

By Doyle Mcmanus And Maura Reynolds

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

Washington — President Bush, seeking to regain political ground lost to the new Democratic-led Congress, called Tuesday for bipartisan action on energy and other domestic issues while forcefully defending his unpopular decision to send more U.S. troops to Iraq.

Delivering his annual State of the Union Address before both houses of Congress with the nation's first woman speaker of the House, Rep. Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), seated behind him, Bush acknowledged that millions of voters deserted his Republican Party in November. Still, he asserted that as president he could set the nation's agenda.

"We're not the first to come here with government divided and uncertainty in the air," he said. "Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on, as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done."

But on the nation's most divisive issue — the war in Iraq — Bush stuck to his guns. "Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq, because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far reaching," he said.

Yet before the president arrived at the Capitol, the Democrats' designated spokesman, in comments to reporters, brusquely dismissed Bush's plan to add 21,500 troops to Iraq as feckless.

"They don't have a plan," said Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.), a Vietnam veteran whose upset election in November was key to giving the Democrats their majority in the Senate. "What they have put on the table is more a tactical adjustment."

Inside the House chamber, the atmosphere was cordial and polite. Bush drew cheers from members of both parties when, at the start of his speech, he noted that he was the first president in history to begin his State of the Union Address with the words "Madam Speaker."

In domestic policy, Bush presented a series of proposals that aides said were designed to appeal to Democrats as well as Republicans, with the aim of enticing at least some of the president's opponents to acknowledge that his ideas were worth considering.

He proposed cutting the nation's consumption of gasoline 20% in 10 years by requiring energy companies to use more alternative fuels such as ethanol, which can be produced from grains and grasses, and by raising fuel efficiency standards for automobiles.

He also expanded on a proposal he unveiled Saturday to make spending on health insurance tax deductible up to a ceiling of $15,000 per family, a plan that would make insurance more affordable for some but more expensive for others.

Democrats largely applauded Bush's energy proposal — Webb said they "look forward to working with the president and his party" to encourage alternative energy sources — but criticized his healthcare plan as a threat to traditional employer-provided insurance.

For Bush, the stakes went beyond those individual issues: he sought to demonstrate that in the final two years of his presidency, he can still command enough popular support to compel both Democrats and Republicans to pay him heed.

During his first six years in the White House, Bush enjoyed the support of a solidly Republican majority in the House and, for most of that time, in the Senate. He wielded both his personal popularity and his fundraising prowess as weapons to keep his party in line. But now he faces a Democratic congressional majority that wants to overturn many of his policies — at a time when his own popularity has been badly diminished by the war.

In his official response, Webb did not echo the president's notes about bipartisanship, saying simply: "We in the Democratic Party hope that this administration is serious about improving education and healthcare for all Americans, and addressing such domestic priorities as restoring the vitality of New Orleans."

Bush did not mention New Orleans or Hurricane Katrina, which devastated the city in 2005, in his speech.

Instead, Webb focused on two issues on which he said the parties stand "in contradiction" — the state of the nation's economy and Iraq.

"Wages and salaries for our workers are at all-time lows as a percentage of national wealth, even though the productivity of American workers is the highest in the world," he said.

On Iraq, he charged that Bush "took us into this war recklessly" despite warnings from many senior military officers.

"The war's costs to our nation have been staggering," Webb said. "The majority of the nation no longer supports the way this war is being fought; nor does the majority of our military. We need a new direction."

On energy, Bush's call for reducing gasoline consumption by 20% in the next decade rested on two specific initiatives:

He proposed raising the federal government standard for motor fuel to require the nation's energy supplies to include a much higher percentage of alternative fuels such as ethanol. The White House estimated that their proposed standard would reduce by 15% the amount of gasoline used to fuel cars.

Second, Bush called on Congress to alter the federal fuel efficiency requirement for passenger cars from the average standard of 27.5 miles per gallon to about 34 miles per gallon. White House officials estimated that this change would reduce gasoline consumption by another 5% over 10 years.

Environmentalists welcomed the administration's support for reduced energy consumption. In earlier years, the Bush administration focused its energy policies almost exclusively on increasing U.S. energy production.

"This could be the breakthrough we have been waiting for on fuel economy," said David Friedman, research director at the Union of Concerned Scientists.

But Friedman, along with other environmentalists and some Democratic lawmakers, complained that Bush's proposal fell short of their hopes of broader action against global climate change.

On healthcare, Bush outlined a two-part strategy to reduce the number of Americans who do not have health insurance, now nearly 47 million. But he stopped short of making a commitment to covering all the uninsured.

The first part of his plan would create the new health insurance tax deduction of $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals. That would make it easier for people who don't get coverage through an employer to purchase their own private plan. But those with employer plans that have annual premiums worth more than the deduction would have to pay taxes on the difference.

An analysis by Senate Democrats estimated that more than 7 million people could face higher taxes as a result.

The second part of Bush's health plan calls on each state to design its own plan to cover uninsured residents. To support the states, the federal government would redirect a portion of the billions of dollars it now spends on care for the poor and uninsured.

DOJ_NMG_0120744

For instance, instead of paying hospitals and other providers to treat the uninsured after they get sick, states could use the funds to help the poor obtain their own private coverage.

On immigration, Bush returned to familiar territory — reaffirming a proposal he first made in his 2004 State of the Union address, only to find that his ideas divided his own party.

The president stressed the need for a guest worker program to fill America's future labor needs. He also called for unspecified measures to "resolve the status of the illegal immigrants who are already in our country," without offering a path to automatic citizenship or "amnesty."

Advocates and opponents of Bush's vision for immigration reform said his comments did little to advance the debate, leaving it to Congress to hammer out the details.

There was no sign that Bush's comments swayed the GOP lawmakers who want to focus solely on tougher enforcement of immigration law and who last year thwarted efforts for the broader approach pushed by the president.

Rep. Dana Rohrabacher (R-Huntington Beach) harshly criticized Bush's position, saying he "has destroyed his own base."

On education, Bush cited the "No Child Left Behind" law he passed with Democratic help in the early stages of his presidency as an example of how the two parties can and should work together on domestic policy. He called on Congress to renew the law, which expires this year.

At the same time, Bush risked Democrats' ire by calling for a so-called voucher system that would permit parents to use government money to send their children to private schools. The president did not use the term "voucher," but he called for building on the success of No Child Left Behind "by giving families with children stuck in failing schools the right to choose something better."

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), the principal Democratic sponsor of the 2001 education law, charged that Bush's proposal would dilute the successes the president touted.

"Once again, he proposes siphoning crucial resources from our public schools — already reeling from increased requirements and budget cuts — for a private school voucher program," Kennedy said.

After outlining his domestic proposals, which aides described as the core of the speech, Bush offered a vigorous reiteration of his view of the war in Iraq and its relationship to the world-wide struggle against terrorism — evidence of the president's passion for the issue, which he has called his central mission.

The fight against terrorism "is more than a clash of arms — it is a decisive ideological struggle," he said. "And the security of our nation is in the balance."

Bush said that in the last two years, the forces of democratic change have advanced in the Middle East, from Lebanon, to Afghanistan and Iraq, only to see a violent reaction by those who oppose it.

"We have been sobered by the enemy's fierce reaction," he said.

He said the war in Iraq, with its sectarian fury, "is not the fight we entered in Iraq. But it is the fight we are in It is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle. So let us find our resolve, and turn events toward victory."

He said that he and U.S. military commanders had chosen the new strategy in Iraq after discussing "every possible approach."

"In the end, I chose this course of action because it provides the best chance of success," he said. "Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq — because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far reaching."

Following tradition, each party invited special guests to watch the speech from the galleries and released lists of their names.

First Lady Laura Bush's guests included basketball star Dikembe Mutombo and New York City subway hero Wesley Autrey, who recently jumped onto the tracks to save a man suffering from a seizure from being hit by a train. Pelosi's guests included AFL-CIO President John Sweeney, Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and several relatives of the victims of the Sept. 1, 2001 terrorist attacks.

'We Must Not Fail In Iraq' (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

President Bush pleaded with Congress last night to give his new strategy for victory in the struggle in Iraq a chance because "America must not fail in Iraq."

Defeat in Iraq, he said, would be "grievous and far-reaching" because the fighting in Iraq is part of a broader struggle against Islamic extremists across the Middle East and stretching to the farther reaches of the globe.

He proposed wide-ranging domestic goals in his 50-minute State of the Union address, proposing to balance the budget with no new taxes over the next five years, slash gasoline consumption by 20 percent over the next 10 years, double the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to 1.5 billion barrels of oil over the next 20 years, offer tax benefits for Americans who buy their own health insurance, create a "temporary worker program" as the first step in comprehensive immigration reform and "remain a clear voice for freedom" in Cuba, Belarus and Burma.

The domestic goals were relatively modest, but the president was at his most impassioned in arguing that the war in Iraq must not be abandoned.

America faces "a generational struggle that will continue long after you and I have turned our duties over to others," he said. "That is why it is important to work together so our nation can see this great effort through.

"For all of us in this room, there is no higher responsibility than to protect the people of this country from danger. ... To win the war on terror, we must take the fight to the enemy. Both parties and both branches should work in close consultation."

Democrats, who now control both the House and the Senate, sat quietly as Republicans stood in a raucous ovation when the president declared "nothing is more important at this moment in our history than for America ... to succeed in Iraq." Vice President Dick Cheney often stood to applaud as House Speaker Nancy Pelosi remained seated, unsmiling.

Mr. Bush avoided a focus on major initiatives on contentious matters that divide the two parties, as he did in 2005, for example, when he made major Social Security reform a central theme of his speech, only to see it fail.

He focused instead on Democrat-friendly issues, calling on Congress to enact immigration reform this year, set up new health care tax breaks by 2009, increase the military by nearly 100,000 members in the next five years, double the Strategic Petroleum Reserve by 2027 and cut congressional earmarks in half in the next fiscal year.

As he did two weeks ago, the president said the only way to secure the war-torn country is to send in thousands of additional troops.

"Our military commanders and I have carefully weighed the options. We discussed every possible approach. In the end, I chose this course of action because it provides the best chance of success. Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq -- because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far-reaching," he said.

Democrats, many of whom support resolutions of opposition to the president's plan, quickly repeated their opposition in the wake of the speech.

"The president took us into this war recklessly," said Sen. James H. Webb of Virginia, who has been in office less than a month, who delivered the Democratic response. "The majority of the nation no longer supports the way this war is being fought; nor does the majority of our military. We need a new direction," including "strong regionally based diplomacy" and "a formula that will in short order allow our combat forces to leave Iraq."

The president urged Congress to unite in the struggle against international terrorism as Americans did in the days after the September 11 terrorist attacks.

"We went into this largely united -- in our assumptions and in our convictions. And whatever you voted for, you did not vote for failure. Our country is pursuing a new strategy in Iraq, and I ask you to give it a chance to work," Mr. Bush said. "And I ask you to support our troops in the field, and those on their way."

Mr. Bush acknowledged that terrorists have made inroads across the Middle East and said sectarian violence and insurgents have outstripped American forces in Iraq.

"This is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we are in. Every one of us wishes this war were over and won, yet it would not be like us to leave our promises unkept, our friends abandoned, and our own security at risk."

DOJ_NMG_0120746

He said the United States cannot withdraw.

"If American forces step back before Baghdad is secure, the Iraqi government would be overrun by extremists on all sides. ... For America, this is a nightmare scenario. On this day, at this hour, it is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle. So let us find our resolve, and turn events toward victory."

Mr. Bush sought at several points to soothe harsh partisan feelings, opening his address by noting the ascendancy of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, the first woman to head either chamber of Congress.

It was "high privilege and distinct honor," he said, echoing Mrs. Pelosi's words introducing him, to be the first president ever to start the address by thanking "Madame Speaker." As the gathered lawmakers and officials gave a standing ovation, Mr. Bush turned from his lectern and shook Mrs. Pelosi's hand.

At that moment, Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones, Ohio Democrat, flexed her arms in the boxer's stance, as Mrs. Pelosi did at her swearing-in week.

After a rare round of bipartisan applause, Mr. Bush reached out to Democrats, challenging the new majority to work with Republicans to get things done.

"Congress has changed, but our responsibilities have not," the president said. "We are not the first to come here with government divided and uncertainty in the air. Like many before us, we can work through our differences and achieve big things for the American people."

Despite growing rancor between the two parties -- Mrs. Pelosi last week accused the president of swiftly enacting his "surge" plan to prevent opponents on Capitol Hill from blocking the strategy, words the White House labeled "poisonous" -- Mr. Bush said that "both parties and both branches should work in close consultation."

"Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on -- as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done," he said.

Mr. Bush urged the congressmen to increase funding for his signature No Child Left Behind Act and reconsider school vouchers, urging Congress to give "families with children stuck in failing schools the right to choose some place better."

He repeated his rejection of new taxes, touted the booming economy -- in its 41st straight month of job growth, he noted -- and vowed to erase the federal deficit within five years.

Mr. Bush won far more applause from Democrats than from Republicans when he called for a "comprehensive" immigration bill and when he called for action to combat global warming. The entire Democratic side of the room stood for both, while many Republicans remained sitting and some of them shook their heads in seeming dismay.

Cameras in the chamber cut away to Rep. Tom Tancredo, the Colorado Republican who leads the House immigration caucus. Mr. Tancredo shook his head "no."

The biggest applause line of the night for Mr. Bush among Republicans was his call for an up-or-down vote in the Senate on his judicial nominees. But on the Democratic side just two stood -- Sens. Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, an independent who caucuses with the Democrats.

Mr. Bush made only a brief undetailed call for reform of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid. "Somehow we have not found it in ourselves to act," he said. "So let us work together and do it now."

One Republican-friendly feature of previous State of the Union addresses was notably absent. Mr. Bush made no mention of efforts to amend the Constitution against homosexual "marriage" by defining the union as joining a man and a woman.

In keeping the tradition, one Cabinet member -- last night it was Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales -- did not attend the speech in case of a major attack on the Capitol.

The White House sought to highlight the president's energy initiative, holding an afternoon briefing for reporters featuring senior administration officials and lifting the usual embargo on specific proposals in the address. "It is in our vital interest to diversify America's energy supply, and the way forward is through technology," he said.

According to the president's proposal, Americans could cut gasoline consumption by 20 percent within 10 years by sharply increasing the amount of ethanol and other alternative fuels that the government mandates must be blended into the fuel supply.

Under current law, fuel blenders must use 7.5 billion gallons of renewable fuel annually by 2012; Mr. Bush wants to increase that to 35 billion gallons by 2017, which would achieve a 15 percent cut. The president's plan also calls for raising the fuel economy standards for passenger cars, a plan that Mr. Bush has proposed in the past but failed to win from Congress. Doing so would reduce annual gasoline consumption by 8.5 billion gallons, a further 5 percent reduction.

"Achieving these ambitious goals will dramatically reduce our dependence on foreign oil, but not eliminate it," he said.

Mr. Bush, who last year declared in his State of the Union that Americans are "addicted to oil," again urged lawmakers to move forward to reduce U.S. reliance on foreign petroleum.

Another major initiative in Mr. Bush's speech called for tax breaks for employer-financed health care benefits, analogous to the current child allowance. Instead of paying for health insurance with wages that already had been taxed, persons could pay for a significant part of their health insurance -- $15,000 per family and $7,500 for individuals -- with pre-tax dollars.

The White House said 80 percent of workers with health insurance through their jobs would see a tax cut as a result of the change. Still, analysts say some 20 percent could see a tax increase, including those workers whose health insurance cost more than the standard deduction.

As evidence of the partisanship in the House, Rep. Pete Stark, California Democrat and chairman of the Ways and Means health subcommittee, said he would not even consider holding hearings on the plan.

Other proposals in Mr. Bush's speech included a call for "new resources" to expand the No Child Left Behind education act, which requires testing in elementary and middle schools to make sure students are learning. The president wants to expand the program and is seeking to give poor students the right to private-school vouchers.

The administration's proposal calls for giving vouchers to students in schools that repeatedly fail to meet standards set by the federal law, but Democrats blocked that idea when the bill was drafted five years ago.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and new chairman of the Senate committee overseeing education, said again yesterday that he would work to keep vouchers out of the education law.

President Strays Into Democrats' Priorities, Themes (WP)

By Jonathan Weisman And Michael A. Fletcher

Washington Post, January 24, 2007

In an overture to the new majority in Congress, President Bush strayed into Democratic territory last night with proposals on health insurance, gasoline efficiency and even the first real tax increase of his presidency.

Rhetorically, the shift was remarkable. The language he used to sell his health plan dwelled on the plight of the uninsured and on a tax on the well-to-do, a pitch that Republicans have dismissed as class warfare. His energy plan asked for new authority to raise automotive fuel-efficiency standards, a regular theme of the Democratic Party's liberal wing.

But senior Democrats for the most part responded with icy disdain, saying that Bush may be on their turf, but that he continues to clutch his conservative, free-market principles with little regard to the radically changed political terrain he faces.

Democratic displeasure stemmed from both the substance of the proposals Bush laid out and the way he did it: Fully formed, without prior consultation and without an acknowledgment of who controls Capitol Hill. If White House officials want to work with Democrats to reach a compromise, then take credit, that would be fine, Democrats said yesterday, before the speech. But they blanched at being dictated to on policies vital to their constituents.

"For some people to think this is bringing us together, I don't get it," said House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), whose panel will decide the fate of Bush's centerpiece proposal on health insurance and taxes. "To be honest with you, I feel sorry for the guy. It seems to me somebody ought to talk to the guy and see if he can get some goodwill going for him down here."

In calling for an end to the Iraq war and a new emphasis on economic equality, Sen. James Webb (Va.) implored Bush to embrace those Democratic priorities. "If he does, we will join him," Webb said in the Democratic response to the State of the Union address. "If he does not, we will be showing him the way."

White House officials said they are mindful of the new political order in Washington. "Like many before us, we can work through our differences and achieve big things for the American people. Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on -- as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done," Bush said in his speech.

But Democrats said they did not see much movement toward them beyond the rhetoric. At particular issue is Bush's proposal to encourage the purchase of individual health insurance policies through tax deductions financed by a new tax on the value of employer-provided health insurance. Under the plan, the government would allow each family to deduct $15,000 a year from its taxable income to offset the cost of health insurance -- and those who file their tax returns as individuals would be allowed $7,500 each. To pay for this tax break, the value of employer-provided health insurance exceeding the deductions would be taxed as income.

White House officials framed the proposal as a progressive plan to help cover the uninsured by taxing those with Cadillac-style health coverage, primarily well-paid workers and executives.

But Democrats did not buy it. Instead, they said they view it as a continuation of Republican efforts to drive workers away from employer-provided health insurance and into the free market. Even some conservatives questioned how it could help the uninsured. The conservative Tax Foundation said 53 percent of Americans without health insurance pay nothing in federal income taxes and would, therefore, get nothing from a tax break on such taxes.

Low-income workers would get a reduction in their Social Security and Medicare taxes, but probably not as large as the White House suggests, Democrats said. Half of those payroll taxes are paid by workers and half by employers. To reach their generous assessment of the proposal for the working poor, White House economists assume that employers would pass on their payroll tax cut to their workers in the form of raises.

"C'mon," scoffed Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Ways and Means subcommittee on health.

Democrats did marvel that Bush proposed a significant tax boost, but they were not about to embrace what they called a tax increase on the middle class while the president was simultaneously calling for Congress to make permanent the first-term cuts on income and inheritance taxes on the super-rich. The White House said its proposal would affect the highest 20 percent of incomes, starting at around $75,000 to $80,000 a year. That threshold is well above the U.S. median income, but to senior Democrats from high-cost West Coast and Northeastern districts, those are their constituents' incomes.

"I'm all for progressive tax policy," Stark said, " but they are being rather selective here."

Perhaps the biggest problem Bush faces in Congress is the question of trust. Rep. Chris Van Hollen (Md.), the chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, called it a "large credibility gap."

"He's good at identifying the challenges we face as a country," he said. "But he has failed to enact concrete solutions. The challenges he talked about tonight he's talked about for the past six years."

The president's call for an extension of the landmark No Child Left Behind education law might have been expected to be well-received by one of the its authors, House Education and Labor Committee Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.). But in an era of no-growth domestic budgets, Miller was not impressed.

"The task of renewing the law will be made much more difficult if the president's budget fails to provide a substantial increase in funding for schools to carry out their responsibilities under the law," Miller warned.

Bush Challenges Foes Of Iraq Troop Plan (AP)

By Terence Hunt

AP, January 24, 2007

A politically weakened President Bush implored a skeptical Congress Tuesday night to embrace his unpopular plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq, saying it represents the best hope in a war America must not lose. "Give it a chance to work," he said.

Facing a political showdown with Democrats and Republicans alike, Bush was unyielding on Iraq in his annual State of the Union address. He also sought to revive his troubled presidency with proposals to expand health insurance coverage and to slash gasoline consumption by 20 percent in a decade.

Democrats — and even some Republicans — scoffed at his Iraq policy. Unmoved by Bush's appeal, Democrats said the House and Senate would vote on resolutions of disapproval of the troop buildup.

DOJ_NMG_0120749

"We need a new direction," said freshman Sen. Jim Webb, picked by the Democrats to deliver their TV response. "The majority of the nation no longer supports the way this war is being fought; nor does the majority of our military," said Webb, a Vietnam veteran opposed to Bush's invasion of Iraq.

Republican Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota, also took issue with Bush. "I can't tell you what the path to success is, but it's not what the president has put on the table," he said.

It was a night of political theater as Bush went before the first Democratic-controlled Congress in a dozen years with his lowest approval ratings in polls.

Democratic Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, the first woman to lead the House, sat over Bush's shoulder, next to Vice President Dick Cheney. Reaching out to the Democrats, Bush opened with a tribute to Pelosi and paused to shake her hand. He also asked for prayers for Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson, hospitalized for more than a month after suffering a brain hemorrhage, and Republican Georgia Rep. Charlie Norwood, suffering from cancer.

The speech audience included up to a dozen House and Senate members who have announced they are running for president or are considered possible contenders.

Bush divided his 49-minute address between domestic and foreign issues, but the war was topic No. 1.

Pelosi set the tone for Democrats. She sat silently and did not applaud as Bush warned of high stakes in Iraq and said American forces must not step back before Baghdad is secure.

With Congress poised to deliver a stinging rebuke on his troop increase, he made a personal plea to lawmakers.

"I have spoken with many of you in person. I respect you and the arguments you made," Bush said. "We went into this largely united, in our assumptions and in our convictions. And whatever you voted for, you did not vote for failure."

"Our country is pursuing a new strategy in Iraq and I ask you to give it a chance to work," Bush said. "And I ask you to support our troops in the field and those on their way."

Pelosi and Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid gave Bush a swift answer. "While the president continues to ignore the will of the country, Congress will not ignore this president's failed policy," they said in a joint statement after his address. "His plan will receive an up-or-down vote in both the House and Senate, and we will continue to hold him accountable for changing course in Iraq."

Bush said the Iraq war had changed dramatically with the outbreak of sectarian warfare and reprisals.

"This is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we are in," the president said. "Every one of us wishes that this war were over and won. Yet it would not be like us to leave our promises unkept, our friends abandoned and our own security at risk.

"Ladies and gentlemen: On this day, at this hour, it is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle," the president said. "Let us find our resolve and turn events toward victory."

Key Republicans have joined Democrats in drafting resolutions of opposition to the plans he announced two weeks ago to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq. Bush said his approach had the best chance to succeed, but clearly many lawmakers — and overwhelming majority of Americans — disagreed.

"Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far reaching," the president said. "If American forces step back before Baghdad is secure, the Iraqi government would be overrun by extremists on all sides."

In such a case, he forecast "an epic battle," Shiite extremists backed by Iran against Sunni extremists aided by al-Qaida and supporters of Saddam Hussein's government, leading to violence that could spread across the Middle East. "For America, this is a nightmare scenario," Bush said.

On domestic matters, he pressed Congress to help find ways to overhaul entitlements such as Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid before they impose huge problems for future generations.

"Somehow we have not found it in ourselves to act," he said. "So let us work together and do it now."

On immigration, too, the president made a plea to lawmakers that he has made before, seeking comprehensive changes including a guest worker program, that go beyond tougher border controls. Members of his own party were the main obstacle to success in that area — a fact Bush acknowledged even as he pressed for a better result now than Capitol Hill is run by Democrats more amenable to his ideas.

DOJ_NMG_0120750

"Convictions run deep in this Capitol when it comes to immigration," he said. "Let us have a serious, civil and conclusive debate."

Bush said his energy proposals would cut American imports by the equivalent of 75 percent of the oil coming from the Middle East. His prescription, as always, relied primarily on market incentives and technological advances — not government mandates.

"America is on the verge of technological breakthroughs that will enable us to live our lives less dependent on oil," he said. "These technologies will help us become better stewards of the environment — and they will help us to confront the serious challenge of global climate change."

Bush called for changing the tax code to encourage more people not covered by medical insurance to buy a plan, and to discourage others from keeping the most costly health care plans.

Under Bush's proposal, employer-financed health care benefits would be considered taxable income after a deduction of $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals. Those buying their own plan would get the same deductions on their taxes.

The White House said 80 percent of workers with health insurance through their jobs would see a tax cut as a result of the change. But about 20 percent would see a tax increase — those workers whose health insurance cost more than the standard deduction.

"With this reform, more than 100 million men, women and children who are now covered by employer-provided insurance will benefit from lower tax bills," Bush said. "At the same time, this reform will level the playing field for those who do not get health insurance through their job."

The administration sought to make Bush's energy initiatives — in particular a 20 percent cut in gasoline usage by 2017 — an eye-catching centerpiece of his address, the one major element not revealed until hours before the speech. "It is in our vital interest to diversify America's energy supply, and the way forward is through technology," Bush said.

The cut would be achieved primarily through a sharp escalation in the amount of ethanol and other alternative fuels that the government mandates must be blended into the fuel supply. The rest would come from raising fuel economy standards for passenger cars, a plan that Bush has proposed in the past but failed to win from Congress.

Acknowledging that some would say such a drastic increase in alternative fuels is unrealistic, the White House argued that the new mandate — which would need approval from Congress — would spur investments in the industry and give technological research a boost.

While setting cutback goals, the president spurned appeals from environmentalists and some major corporations to impose mandatory ceilings on U.S. greenhouse gas emissions in hopes of slowing climate change.

Bush Reaches Out To Skeptical Democrats (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson

McClatchy Newspapers, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON - Facing a Democratic-controlled - and hostile - Congress for the first time, a politically weak President Bush bowed to political reality in his State of the Union address Tuesday night by advancing domestic policies that he hoped might win bipartisan support.

Little consensus was apparent, however.

The president proposed to boost alternative fuels, reduce auto emissions and offer a tax break for buying health insurance - unless your employer buys an expensive plan for you, and then Bush would make you pay tax on it.

On the dominant issue of the day, the president was unyielding on Iraq and his plan to send 21,500 more U.S. troops there, despite bipartisan congressional opposition and polls showing that a large majority of Americans are against it.

"On this day, at this hour, it is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle. So let us find our resolve and turn events toward victory," Bush told a joint session of Congress in the packed chamber of the House of Representatives.

"Our country is pursuing a new strategy in Iraq - and I ask you to give it a chance to work."

Yet the war is so divisive that it may overwhelm chances for bipartisan compromise on anything, despite Bush's invitation to try.

DOJ_NMG_0120751

"We are not the first to come here with government divided and uncertainty in the air. Like many before us, we can work through our differences, and achieve big things for the American people," Bush said.

Democrats reacted with skepticism and, on some issues, outright hostility.

On Iraq, "the majority of the nation no longer supports the way this war is being fought; nor does the majority of our military. We need a new direction," said Sen. James Webb, D-Va., delivering his party's official reaction to Bush's speech.

On health insurance, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., said: "Punish people because they have good insurance? I don't think they would agree with that. Taxing people who have health insurance doesn't make sense to me."

The one major initiative where Bush won what appeared to be genuine bipartisan response was his call to revive his stalled plan to overhaul immigration law, including a guest worker program and a path to citizenship for illegal immigrants here now. That won a standing ovation.

Still, that was the exception.

On prospects for bipartisan partnership, Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., chairman of the powerful House Ways and Means Committee, said, "I appreciate the president's visit tonight, but he really should have done more to reach out to Democrats before his speech to see if we can come together, rather than simply exchange policies and press releases."

While Republican leaders rallied behind the president, even some of their rank-and-file backbench GOP lawmakers seemed hard-pressed to cheer.

"He's facing a legislative body that's changed as a result of his policies, in large part because of his way of running the worldwide war on terror, especially in Iraq," said Rep. George Radanovich, R-Calif.

Bush Defends Iraq Plan To Skeptical Congress, Nation: 'America Must Not Fail' (USAT)

By David Jackson

USA Today, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush appealed Tuesday to a skeptical Congress to give his new Iraq plan "a chance to work" and called on lawmakers to help expand health insurance coverage and reduce gasoline use by 20% over the next decade.

In his first State of the Union address before a Congress controlled by Democrats, Bush said failing in Iraq would create "a nightmare scenario" and urged support for his plan to boost U.S. troop levels by 21,500. The Senate Foreign Relations Committee begins debate today on a resolution opposing the Bush proposal.

STATE OF THE UNION: The speech's key points | Full speech text

"On this day, at this hour, it is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle," Bush said. "Let us find our resolve and turn events toward victory."

With his popularity and Americans' support for the Iraq war both sagging, Bush devoted less than half his speech to domestic initiatives that he believes Democrats can accept. Among them: reducing U.S. dependence on foreign oil, tax breaks for health insurance, and flexible education rules.

"Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on — as long as we're willing to cross that aisle when there's work to be done," he said.

Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va., whose victory in November helped oust Republicans from power, said Bush's domestic proposals fall short and his plan for Iraq holds the USA "hostage" to chaos and disarray.

"The majority of the nation no longer supports the way this war is being fought," said Webb, a Vietnam War veteran chosen to give the formal Democratic response. "We need a new direction."

Bush's plan for Iraq, unveiled two weeks ago, has also been criticized by Republicans such as Sen. John Warner of Virginia.

The president did not mention the Senate resolution but said the boost in troop strength was necessary to stabilize a country riven by sectarian violence. The plan "provides the best chance of success," Bush said, while failure in Iraq would strengthen terrorists who want to strike the USA again.

DOJ_NMG_0120752

On energy policy, Bush said Americans' dependence on imported oil "leaves us more vulnerable to hostile regimes and to terrorists." The president said increasing the supply of alternative fuels will help to reach his goal for cutting gas consumption over 10 years. He also asked Congress to help improve fuel-efficiency standards for passenger vehicles.

Other issues:

•Immigration. Bush again asked Congress to send him a bill that includes more opportunities for temporary workers from other countries. "Convictions run deep," he said about "guest workers" and immigration. He urged "a serious, civil and conclusive debate."

•Military size. He asked Congress to authorize an increase in the active-duty Army and Marine Corps by 92,000 troops over five years.

•Entitlements. Bush again urged Congress to work on addressing the long-term solvency of Social Security and controlling the costs of Medicare and Medicaid. He did not offer specifics.

Tone Not As Bold As A Year Ago (USAT)

By Susan Page

USA Today, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — A year ago, President Bush bragged in his State of the Union address that the United States was "writing a new chapter in the story of self-government" across the Middle East and pledged to "seek the end of tyranny in our world."

On Tuesday night, the president's tone was less confident and his promises considerably more constrained. He pleaded for patience from lawmakers who are moving toward resolutions that urge a new course in Iraq and oppose his decision to commit another 21,500 U.S. troops to the fight.

WARTIME ADDRESSES: A look at speeches by previous presidents

Sitting behind him was a new speaker of the House, Democrat Nancy Pelosi of California, elected to the post after Republicans lost control of Congress in November elections driven in large part by opposition to the war.

As he begins his seventh year in office, Bush finds his presidency held hostage to a war that has drained his political standing and divided his party. Amid bipartisan criticism and a dismal 34% approval rating in the latest USA TODAY/Gallup Poll, some question whether Congress and the public are open to hearing Bush's case on Iraq or the domestic initiatives that he sought to spotlight in his speech.

Wartime presidents from Franklin Roosevelt during World War II to Lyndon Johnson during Vietnam have found domestic proposals difficult to deliver, says Robert Dallek, a presidential historian and author of Flawed Giant: Lyndon Johnson and His Times. "Energy is very hard to focus" during war, he says. "War, especially a war that's going badly, is an all-encompassing concern."

'Achieve big things'

Bush called for reducing Americans' gasoline consumption by 20% in 10 years, providing a path to legal status for illegal immigrants now in this country and modifying the tax code to help those without health insurance buy it. "We can work through our differences and achieve big things for the American people," he declared.

His proposals deal with some of the priorities of the new congressional majority — including global climate change and the problems of the 46 million who are uninsured — although Bush's prescriptions were dismissed as inadequate or ill-conceived by some Democrats. Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid of Nevada, for one, called Bush's health care plan "ridiculous."

Still, scoring progress on these domestic issues would bolster Bush's legacy, now defined by the war. It also would demonstrate that he still can command the powers of his office during the final two years of his tenure.

"He has a very attractive, very aggressive proposal on health coverage that has been long overdue," says Michael Franc, a former Republican House aide now at the conservative Heritage Foundation. "But I don't think anyone is going to listen, unfortunately."

The White House is calculating that the president can tap Americans' desire for action on the domestic front even as the war continues to rage. In a nationwide poll by the non-partisan Pew Research Center released Monday, there was an almost even split between those who said Bush should focus on domestic issues or foreign ones.

DOJ_NMG_0120753

"There's a great appetite to hear about domestic issues," says Andrew Kohut, director of the center. And for bipartisanship, even among Democrats: 4 in 10 said their party leaders should "work with President Bush" rather than "stand up" to him.

Bush opened his speech with a tribute to Pelosi as the first woman to be elected speaker of the House. As his speech continued, however, there was a visible partisan divide between the Republicans to his left, the Democrats to his right.

That was particularly true when, near the midpoint of the 49-minute address, he turned from domestic issues to Iraq. When he said U.S. forces couldn't withdraw until Baghdad was secure, many Republicans rose and applauded while Pelosi and most Democrats sat in their seats, silent.

Russell Riley, a presidential scholar at the University of Virginia's Miller Center of Public Affairs, says members of Congress "will be inclined to pay more attention to the message that they got in November from the electorate than the message coming from the well of the House" by Bush.

In surveys, Americans overwhelmingly oppose the increase in U.S. force levels. Most now say the invasion of Iraq was a mistake.

Bush was braced for a mixed reception, aides said beforehand.

"Our country is pursuing a new strategy in Iraq, and I ask you to give it a chance to work," he said almost plaintively. "And I ask you support our troops in the field — and those on the way."

Rallying support

In a State of the Union nearly 200 years ago, James Madison argued that British aggression demanded "manly resistance" and justified the War of 1812. Since then, wartime presidents have used the annual addresses to rally support and chastise critics. Many of them, even Franklin Roosevelt, asked for patience when war fatigue rose.

"If we put forth our best efforts this year — and next year — we can be 'over the hump' in our effort to build strong defenses," Harry Truman said in 1952. He added, "This is a time for courage, not for grumbling and mumbling."

In his 1966 State of the Union, Lyndon Johnson said there was "no cause to doubt the American commitment" in Vietnam. He focused on promoting his Great Society domestic initiatives. A year later, he spoke at length about both, acknowledging, "Abroad, the question is whether we have the staying power to fight a very costly war."

And in 1968, Johnson promised that the United States would "persevere" in Vietnam. Two weeks later, however, the Tet Offensive crystallized opposition to the war. Beset by protests, his popularity sagging, Johnson unexpectedly decided not to run for re-election.

Dallek sees parallels between the situation Bush faces in Iraq and the one that Johnson faced in Vietnam — including efforts by Johnson and his successor, Richard Nixon, to push the government that the United States was backing to adopt reforms and take charge, freeing U.S. troops to come home. "The echoes are so powerful," he says.

The Speech's Key Points And Their Context (USAT)

USA Today, January 24, 2007

What the president said on the critical issues of the coming year.

Balanced budget

What President Bush said: "In the coming weeks, I will submit a budget that eliminates the federal deficit within the next five years. I ask you to make the same commitment. Together, we can restrain the spending appetite of the federal government and balance the federal budget."

Context: Bush inherited a $128 billion budget surplus. Within three years, a recession and the war on terrorism turned it into a $412 billion deficit. Rising tax receipts fueled by record corporate profits have since driven the deficit down to $248 billion.

Getting back to balance won't be easy if the president is realistic about the future costs of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan and the impact of extending his tax cuts, which he vows to do. Bush will be long gone before any balanced budget is enacted. Even if balance is achieved, the long-term growth of Medicare, Medicaid and Social Security threaten much larger deficits in the future.

Economy

DOJ_NMG_0120754

What Bush said: "A future of hope and opportunity begins with a growing economy — and that is what we have. Unemployment is low, inflation is low, and wages are rising."

Context: The economy, while slowing, continues to be a bright spot for the president. Americans' earnings are keeping ahead of inflation, interest rates have stabilized, the jobless rate remains low at 4.5%, and more jobs have been created for 40 consecutive months. Gasoline prices are down from their summer peak; health care inflation, while high, is the lowest since 1999. Tax collections are running 8.2% higher than a year ago.

Whether this is tied to Bush's tax cuts in 2001 and 2003 remains in dispute. Bush says he can balance the budget by 2012 while making all his tax cuts permanent. Democrats are focused on the uneven nature of the recovery, which has left lower-income families behind. They want to redirect spending on tax cuts and the Iraq war to their priorities, such as health care, education and alternative energy. Expect a major clash of priorities over the 2008 budget, which Bush will unveil Feb. 5.

Education

What Bush said: "Five years ago we rose above partisan differences to pass the No Child Left Behind Act … And because we acted, students are performing better." Bush wants the act reauthorized.

Context: No Child Left Behind, Bush's ambitious 2002 education overhaul law, remains one of his few bipartisan successes. It expires this year, and Congress must reauthorize it. That effort could meet stiff resistance as lawmakers try to hold it off until after the 2008 election.

Members on both sides of the aisle have good reasons to wait: Many Democrats don't like the law's annual tests and punishments for failing schools. They don't want to give Bush a victory on education, traditionally a Democratic issue. Republican lawmakers in states such as Utah and Virginia have criticized the law for allowing too much government intervention.

Ethics

What Bush said: "Let us work together to reform the budget process … expose every earmark to the light of day and to a vote in Congress … and cut the number and cost of earmarks at least in half by the end of this session."

Context: Congress has required more public disclosure of earmarks, as the special projects that lawmakers quietly insert in spending bills are known. Lawmakers have not called for reductions; many defend the practice because they know best what their states and districts need.

Bush wants to go further; he even wants line-item veto power to eliminate earmarks, an idea Democratic leaders reject.

The use of earmarks has mushroomed in recent years — with $67 billion in taxpayer money going to these special projects in fiscal year 2006 alone, according to the Congressional Research Service.

Global disease

What Bush said: "We hear the call to take on the challenges of hunger, poverty and disease — and that is precisely what America is doing."

Context: In 2003, Bush announced a five-year, $15 billion initiative to combat AIDS, the largest international health campaign to target a single disease. The program targets 15 countries that are home to about half the world's 39 million people who are HIV-positive. Bush has also called for Congress to reauthorize the $2.1 billion Ryan White Care Act, the largest federal program for people with HIV/AIDS.

The White House says that before the program, 50,000 people were receiving drug treatment for AIDS, while today, more than 800,000 people are receiving medications. Democrats have acknowledged the treatment success of the 2003 Bush initiative but have complained that it focuses too much on promoting abstinence in trying to prevent HIV infections.

Bush announced a $1.2 billion, five-year plan in 2005 to control malaria in Africa. The goal of the initiative is to reduce malaria deaths by half in 15 target countries.

Homeland security

What Bush said: "For all the people in this room, there is no higher responsibility than to protect the people of this country from danger."

Context: Immigration reform and border security will continue to be hot political issues in 2007 and beyond.

DOJ_NMG_0120755

House Democrats have said they will reconsider legislation passed last year to build 700 miles of fence along the Mexican border. Government auditors have said the project could cost $30 billion. The Homeland Security Department, meanwhile, plans a new "virtual fence" that would help Border Patrol agents with cameras, sensors and other high-tech equipment.

Beyond the border, House Democrats this month passed a sweeping bill that would require inspections of all cargo on passenger airplanes and screening of cargo containers before they're loaded on ships headed to U.S. ports. The White House and some senators in both parties have questioned how the government will pay for the inspections.

Immigration

What Bush said: "Extending hope and opportunity in our country requires an immigration system worthy of America, with laws that are fair and borders that are secure. … Let us have a serious, civil, and conclusive debate — so that you can pass, and I can sign, comprehensive immigration reform into law.

Context: Immigration is one issue where Democrats and Bush are likely to reach a deal. Bush has been pressing since taking office for a major overhaul of immigration laws that would include giving legal status to an estimated 12 million people now living in the country illegally.

Last year, the Senate approved a bipartisan bill that met the president's requirements, but House Republicans blocked it. Now Democrats are in charge and are making it a priority.

Bipartisan negotiations already are underway to begin writing a bill that would beef up border security, create a secure ID system to help employers determine who can legally work for them and strengthen penalties on those who hire illegal employees. Still to be determined: how many of those now here illegally will be given a chance at citizenship, and how many conditions they will have to meet.

Iran

What Bush said: "The United Nations has imposed sanctions on Iran and made it clear that the world will not allow … Tehran to acquire nuclear weapons."

Context: The Bush administration has intensified pressure on Iran to stop trying to make nuclear fuel and to stop backing Iraqis who target U.S. troops. European nations, such as France and Germany, urged the United States to talk to Iran; in May, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the United States would take part in multinational talks if Iran suspended uranium enrichment. Iran continued the program.

The United Nations Security Council passed a resolution in December forbidding trade that could help Iran's nuclear or missile programs.

The Bush administration rejected the Iraq Study Group's call for U.S.-Iranian talks. Instead, the administration increased pressure to ban foreign investment in Iran's oil industry and to stop Iranian banks from using U.S. dollars. Bush also sent a second aircraft carrier group to the Persian Gulf.

Iraq

What Bush said: "Our military commanders and I have carefully weighed the options. We discussed every possible approach. In the end, I chose this course of action because it provides the best chance of success. Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq — because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far-reaching."

Context: Attacks on U.S. troops and sectarian violence continue to plague Iraq. The Pentagon's most recent report to Congress in November noted a 22% increase in attacks, with 68% of them directed at U.S.-led coalition troops.

That has prompted Bush to forge a new strategy. The president's "new way forward" includes sending 21,500 additional U.S. troops and $1 billion in aid. The plan also would bolster the number of U.S. advisers in Iraqi security units.

Bush's plan has met opposition in Congress and among the public. Several Republican senators have joined Democrats behind a resolution expressing disagreement with Bush.

More than 60% of Americans surveyed by USA TODAY said they support a non-binding congressional resolution that opposes sending more troops.

Bush Can't Reclaim Bipartisanship That Never Existed (MCT)

DOJ_NMG_0120756

By Steven Thomma

McClatchy Newspapers, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON - George Bush tried to go home Tuesday night.

His goal was what he thought he left behind in Texas when he was a Republican governor with a Democratic legislature. But the mythical bipartisan place he tried to reach out to in his State of the Union address Tuesday was never like the one he romanticized in Texas. It's not what he's built in six years in Washington. And today it's as elusive as Oz.

"We can work through our differences," Bush said hopefully Tuesday.

He spoke the language of cooperation, singling out four big issues on which he and Democrats both want action: education, energy, health care and immigration.

But his proposals were mostly familiar, and on energy, notably small-bore. There's little prospect that either he or the Democrats will shed their mistrust of each other, or that they'll compromise enough to find genuine agreement, with the possible exception of overhauling the nation's immigration policies.

"They're difficult issues. They're ones that have been attempted to solve in the past and have come up short," White House counselor Dan Bartlett said Tuesday. "We go into this process with no illusions about the atmosphere in which we're operating in."

Bush wanted to convince Americans watching on television that he's heard them and that he wants again to work with Democrats.

"Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on," he said, "as long as we're willing to cross that aisle when there's work to be done."

Yet the chasm between the parties is wide and deep, the politics between them are poisonous and Bush bears much of the blame.

After reaching out to Democrats his first year, Bush governed after the 2001 terrorist attacks as the leader of a one-party state.

In Congress, his party locked Democrats out of negotiations, then hammered votes through without chance of input.

From the White House, Bush tacked "signing statements" onto bills he signed and used the threat of terrorism in three successive elections to attack Democrats as weak or, worse, aiding the enemy. Last fall he warned that if the Democrats won control of Congress, "terrorists win and America loses."

That makes it hard for Democrats to take his olive branch Tuesday without looking for thorns.

Democrats, too, share responsibility for the nation's polarized politics. These aren't the go-along, get-along, conservative Democrats that Bush ruled with in Texas.

"Dangerously incompetent," was the way Sen. Harry Reid, D-Nev., described Bush during last year's campaign. "A loser," he said another time.

Then there's the Iraq war.

Bush didn't spend the entire speech on the Iraq war, a political loser on which he's alienated virtually all Democrats and even many Republicans in Congress.

And it might not matter.

He said he's sending more troops to Iraq regardless of what the Democrats, the Congress or the country thinks.

The Democrats signaled in response that they're not in the mood for compromise either - on Iraq or at home. They want Bush to get U.S. troops out of Iraq and shift the government away from the wealthy and toward the poor.

"If he does, we will join him," said Sen. James Webb. D-Va., who gave his party's formal response to Bush's speech. "If he does not, we will be showing him the way."

The adulation continued Tuesday for the Harlem construction worker who jumped onto subway tracks in New York City this month to save a man. Wesley Autrey was a guest of Laura Bush during the State of the Union address.

Autrey has received the Bronze Medallion, New York's highest award for civilians; a trip for his family to Walt Disney World; and $10,000 from Donald Trump. Tuesday, he was among two dozen guests of the first lady for President Bush's speech.

Many of the guests were representative of the themes Bush laid out. They included one servicemember each from the Army, Air Force, Navy, Marines and Coast Guard for a speech that focused largely on the war in Iraq. Among the military invitees was Air Force Tech. Sgt. Michelle Barefield, a Bronze Star recipient who survived three attacks with improvised explosive devices while patrolling the Baghdad airport.

Nancy Ho, a molecular biologist at Purdue University who is researching yeasts necessary to develop ethanol, was on hand as Bush called for a massive increase in ethanol use to help cut gasoline consumption by 20% within 10 years.

Dan Jones of Kansas City owns a technology firm that he says cannot afford to pay for health insurance for its three full-time employees. A news release from the White House said Jones would save $2,272.50 a year if he purchased health insurance under Bush's health care proposal.

Listening to Bush's call for immigration reform was Alejandro Monteverde, a Mexican filmmaker who became a U.S. citizen last year. Monteverde got visas for his final year of high school and later to attend the University of Texas film school. As he worked to become a permanent resident and later a U.S. citizen, Monteverde won the People's Choice Award at the 2006 Toronto International Film Festival.

Bush asked Congress to help curb the spread of malaria and AIDS. Joining the first lady was retired admiral Tim Ziemer, former director of World Relief, who now leads the President's Malaria Initiative.

And with the recovery of New Orleans ongoing, Laura Bush hosted Craig Cuccia, who co-founded Reconcile New Orleans. The program started as Café Reconcile, a restaurant that provided culinary training for disadvantaged young people. The non-profit operation began feeding emergency workers and city residents in the weeks after Hurricane Katrina and has expanded to provide construction training to help rebuild the ravaged city.

House Speaker Nancy Pelosi invited 21 guests, including former speakers Jim Wright and Tom Foley, 9/11 widows Carrie Lemack and Mary Fetchet and officeholders from around the country.

Guests Speak Louder Than Words At Capitol (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

Presidents use their State of the Union speeches to send a message to Congress, but lawmakers are increasingly using their guest tickets to send a message right back at him.

For last night's address, Rep. Jim Langevin, Rhode Island Democrat, invited actor Michael J. Fox, whose campaign commercials in favor of expanded embryonic stem-cell research may have helped Democrats win control of the Senate.

From the other side of the aisle, Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, California Republican, invited the wife of a U.S. Border Patrol agent whom the administration prosecuted for a shooting incident involving a suspected drug smuggler.

Meanwhile, Adrian M. Fenty, who as D.C. mayor would usually sit in first lady Laura Bush's box, refused as a protest against the District's lack of a voting representative in Congress. But the Democrat was present, as the guest of new House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat.

"This has gotten to be such a big production about everything other than the address," said one Senate aide. "It's become a forum for everybody who wants to air grievances to a national audience rather than a forum to hear from the president on the state of the union."

Mr. Rohrabacher, who has been a vocal critic of President Bush's immigration plans, said inviting Monica Ramos "sends a powerful message" to the Bush administration.

Ignacio Ramos, Mrs. Ramos' husband, and fellow agent, Jose Alonso Compean, have been imprisoned for shooting a drug-smuggling suspect in the buttocks after he assaulted one of them, dumped nearly 800 pounds of marijuana along the Rio Grande and then fled into Mexico. They are serving 11- and 12-year sentences, respectively.

DOJ_NMG_0120758

"As these two fine men sit in federal prison cells unjustly, I am put in the position of consoling a devastated wife whose life has been destroyed, instead of having the opportunity to reward these men and their families for their brave service as law-enforcement officers," Mr. Rohrabacher said.

Mr. Langevin, a quadriplegic and disabilities advocate who has pushed for broader stem-cell research, said he tries to invite guests who have a high profile on big issues. In 2005, he hosted Dana Reeve, wife of actor Christopher Reeve.

"Michael will help to further Chris and Dana's legacy and underscore for the president just how serious I am about pursuing the promise of stem-cell research," Mr. Langevin said after issuing his invitation to Mr. Fox.

A guest invited by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, New York Democrat, to highlight the health plight of his father, a September 11 emergency worker, learned that his father died last night just before the speech, according to the Associated Press.

The most coveted invitation at a State of the Union address is to sit in the first lady's box.

As mayor of the host town, Mr. Fenty would sit with her by tradition. But instead he joined a host of Democratic luminaries in Mrs. Pelosi's section. The new speaker invited former House Speakers Tom Foley and Jim Wright, both Democrats; Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley; Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa; and Bruce Gordon, president of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Because of the way the chamber is situated, Mrs. Bush, sitting to the president's left, looked directly at Mr. Fenty and Mrs. Pelosi's other guests as her view across the chamber.

Among Mrs. Bush's 24 guests this year was Dikembe Mutombo, a pro basketball player and recently naturalized U.S. citizen who spends his off-season working to improve conditions in his native Democratic Republic of the Congo.

Mr. Mutombo, who played basketball at Georgetown University, towered over Mrs. Bush as he stood after the president recognized him.

"He came to Georgetown University on a scholarship to study medicine -- but Coach John Thompson got a look at Dikembe and had a different idea," Mr. Bush said, drawing a giant smile from Mr. Mutombo.

The president also pointed out Wesley Autrey, who saved the life of a man who fell onto the subway tracks in Harlem. Mr. Autrey pulled the man into a space between the rails as the train went by.

In the past, Mrs. Bush has hosted then-Afghan Interim Authority Chairman Hamid Karzai; the then-president of the Iraqi Governing Council, Adnan Pachachi; and a military German shepherd bomb-sniffing dog who had been deployed to Iraq.

The tradition of recognizing guests was started by President Reagan in his first State of the Union speech in 1982, when he acknowledged the presence of Lenny Skutnik, who just 13 days before had dived into the Potomac River to rescue a victim of the Air Florida plane crash.

Last year, the guest who garnered the most attention was anti-war activist Cindy Sheehan, who was arrested for demonstrating in the Capitol and removed from the House gallery minutes before Mr. Bush spoke. She was the guest of Rep. Lynn Woolsey, California Democrat.

The public galleries in the House have 623 seats occupying the tops of two sides and the wall the president faces. All but a few seats were taken, and the chamber was so packed that dozens of ticket holders ended up sitting on the steps in the aisles between the seats.

Not everyone gets into the act with his tickets.

Both Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, and Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican, gave tickets away to other offices who needed extra tickets.

And many offices offer tickets to mayors or other officials from back home.

Bush: Give Iraq Plan "A Chance To Work" (AP)

AP, January 24, 2007

(CBS/AP) A politically weakened President Bush implored a skeptical Congress Tuesday night to embrace his unpopular plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq, saying it represents the best hope in a war America must not lose. "Give it a chance to work," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0120759

Facing a political showdown with Democrats and Republicans alike, Mr. Bush was unyielding on Iraq in his annual State of the Union address. He also sought to revive his troubled presidency with proposals to expand health insurance coverage and to slash gasoline consumption by 20 percent in a decade.

Democrats — and even some Republicans — scoffed at his Iraq policy. Unmoved by Mr. Bush's appeal, Democrats said the House and Senate would vote on resolutions of disapproval of the troop buildup.

"We need a new direction," said freshman Sen. Jim Webb, picked by the Democrats to deliver their response to the president's speech. "The majority of the nation no longer supports the way this war is being fought; nor does the majority of our military," said Webb, a Vietnam veteran opposed to Mr. Bush's invasion of Iraq.

Republican Sen. Norm Coleman of Minnesota, also took issue with Mr. Bush. "I can't tell you what the path to success is, but it's not what the president has put on the table," he said.

It was a night of political theater as the president went before the first Democratic-controlled Congress in a dozen years with his lowest approval ratings in polls.

A CBS News poll conducted by Knowledge Networks immediately after the speech found that 82 percent of viewers generally approved of the president's proposals while 18 percent disapproved. However, 68 percent of viewers said Mr. Bush will not be able to accomplish his goals, while 32 percent think he will.

Mr. Bush rallied some support for his Iraq plan among those who watched the speech, according to the poll. Before the State of the Union, 43 percent of them backed the plan, while 52 percent of them supported it after the speech.

"This was a much better speech and a much better argument for his position than he made when he made the speech announcing the troop increase two weeks ago," CBS News chief Washington correspondent Bob Schieffer said. "But frankly, it comes down to this: If the president is right on this, this is going to be seen as a great profile in courage. If he's wrong, it will be seen as something much different."

With debate over the Iraq war sending Republicans scurrying away from the president, Mr. Bush's job approval rating stood at a new low of 28 percent in the latest CBS News poll.

Democratic Speaker Nancy Pelosi of California, the first woman to lead the House, sat over Mr. Bush's shoulder, next to Vice President Dick Cheney. Reaching out to the Democrats, the president opened with a tribute to Pelosi and paused to shake her hand. He also asked for prayers for South Dakota Democratic Sen. Tim Johnson, hospitalized for more than a month after suffering a brain hemorrhage, and Republican Rep. Charlie Norwood of Georgia, who's suffering from cancer.

The speech audience included up to a dozen House and Senate members who have announced they are running for president in 2008 or are considered possible contenders.

Mr. Bush divided his speech between domestic and foreign issues, but the war was topic No. 1.

Pelosi set the tone for Democrats. She sat silently and did not applaud as Mr. Bush warned of high stakes in Iraq and said American forces must not step back before Baghdad is secure.

With Congress poised to deliver a stinging rebuke on his troop increase, the president made a personal plea to lawmakers.

"I have spoken with many of you in person. I respect you and the arguments you made," Mr. Bush said. "We went into this largely united, in our assumptions and in our convictions. And whatever you voted for, you did not vote for failure."

"Our country is pursuing a new strategy in Iraq and I ask you to give it a chance to work," he said. "And I ask you to support our troops in the field and those on their way."

The president said the Iraq war had changed dramatically with the outbreak of sectarian warfare and reprisals.

"This is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we are in," he said. "Every one of us wishes that this war were over and won. Yet it would not be like us to leave our promises unkept, our friends abandoned and our own security at risk.

"Ladies and gentlemen: On this day, at this hour, it is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle," the president said. "So let us find our resolve and turn events toward victory."

Key Republicans have joined Democrats in drafting resolutions of opposition to the plans he announced two weeks ago to send an additional 21,500 troops to Iraq. Mr. Bush said his approach had the best chance to succeed.

DOJ_NMG_0120760

"Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far reaching," the president said. "If American forces step back before Baghdad is secure, the Iraqi government would be overrun by extremists on all sides."

In such a case, he forecast "an epic battle," Shiite extremists backed by Iran against Sunni extremists aided by al Qaeda and supporters of Saddam Hussein's government, leading to violence that could spread across the Middle East. "For America, this is a nightmare scenario," Mr. Bush said.

On domestic matters, the president pressed Congress to help find ways to overhaul entitlements such as Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid before they impose huge problems for future generations.

"Somehow we have not found it in ourselves to act," he said. "So let us work together and do it now."

On immigration, too, the president made a plea to lawmakers that he has made before. Members of his own party were the main obstacle to success in that area — a fact Mr. Bush acknowledged even as he pressed for a better result now than Capitol Hill is run by Democrats more amenable to his ideas.

"Convictions run deep in this Capitol when it comes to immigration," he said. "Let us have a serious, civil and conclusive debate."

Mr. Bush said his energy proposals would cut American imports by the equivalent of 75 percent of the oil coming from the Middle East. His prescription, as always, relied primarily on market incentives and technological advances — not government mandates.

"America is on the verge of technological breakthroughs that will enable us to live our lives less dependent on oil," he said. "These technologies will help us become better stewards of the environment — and they will help us to confront the serious challenge of global climate change."

Mr. Bush called for changing the tax code to encourage more people not covered by medical insurance to buy a plan, and to discourage others from keeping the most costly health care plans.

Under the president's proposal, employer-financed health care benefits would be considered taxable income after a deduction of $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals. Those buying their own plan would get the same deductions on their taxes.

The White House said 80 percent of workers with health insurance through their jobs would see a tax cut as a result of the change. But about 20 percent would see a tax increase — those workers whose health insurance cost more than the standard deduction.

"With this reform, more than 100 million men, women and children who are now covered by employer-provided insurance will benefit from lower tax bills," Mr. Bush said. "At the same time, this reform will level the playing field for those who do not get health insurance through their job."

The administration sought to make Mr. Bush's energy initiatives — in particular a 20 percent cut in gasoline usage by 2017 — an eye-catching centerpiece of his address, the one major element not revealed until hours before the speech. "It is in our vital interest to diversify America's energy supply, and the way forward is through technology," Bush said.

The cut would be achieved primarily through a sharp escalation in the amount of ethanol and other alternative fuels that the government mandates must be blended into the fuel supply. The rest would come from raising fuel economy standards for passenger cars, a plan that Mr. Bush has proposed in the past but failed to win from Congress.

Acknowledging that some would say such a drastic increase in alternative fuels is unrealistic, the White House argued that the new mandate — which would need approval from Congress — would spur investments in the industry and give technological research a boost.

While setting cutback goals, the president spurned appeals from environmentalists and some major corporations to impose mandatory ceilings on U.S. greenhouse gas emissions in hopes of slowing climate change.

President's Portrayal Of 'The Enemy' Often Flawed (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120761

In his State of the Union address last night, President Bush presented an arguably misleading and often flawed description of "the enemy" that the United States faces overseas, lumping together disparate groups with opposing ideologies to suggest that they have a single-minded focus in attacking the United States.

Under Bush's rubric, a country such as Iran -- which enjoys diplomatic representation and billions of dollars in trade with major European countries -- is lumped together with al-Qaeda, the terrorist group responsible for the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. "The Shia and Sunni extremists are different faces of the same totalitarian threat," Bush said, referring to the different branches of the Muslim religion.

Similarly, Bush asserted that Shia Hezbollah, which has won seats in the Lebanese government, is a terrorist group "second only to al-Qaeda in the American lives it has taken." Bush is referring to attacks nearly a quarter-century ago on a U.S. embassy and a Marine barracks when the United States intervened in Lebanon's civil war by shelling Hezbollah strongholds. Hezbollah has evolved into primarily an anti-Israeli militant organization -- it fought a war with Israel last summer -- but the European Union does not list it as a terrorist organization.

At one point, Bush catalogued what he described as advances in the quest for freedom in the Middle East during 2005 -- such as the departure of Syrian troops from Lebanon and elections in Iraq. Then, Bush asserted, "a thinking enemy watched all of these scenes, adjusted their tactics and in 2006 they struck back." But his description of the actions of "the enemy" tried to tie together a series of diplomatic and military setbacks that had virtually no connection to one another, from an attack on a Sunni mosque in Iraq to the assassination of Maronite Lebanese political figure.

In his speech, Bush argued that "free people are not drawn to violent and malignant ideologies -- and most will choose a better way when they are given a chance." He also said that terrorist groups "want to overthrow moderate governments."

In the two of the most liberal and diverse societies in the Middle East -- Lebanon and the Palestinian territories -- events have undercut Bush's argument in the past year. Hezbollah has gained power and strength in Lebanon, partly at the ballot box. Meanwhile, Palestinians ousted the Fatah party -- which wants to pursue peace with Israel -- from the legislature in favor of Hamas, which is committed to Israel's destruction and is considered a terrorist organization by the State Department.

In fact, many of the countries that Bush considers "moderate" -- such as Egypt and Saudi Arabia -- are autocratic dictatorships rated among the worst of the "not free" nations by the nonpartisan Freedom House. Their Freedom House ratings are virtually indistinguishable from Cuba, Belarus and Burma, which Bush last night listed as nations in desperate need of freedom.

Bush also claimed that "we have a diplomatic strategy that is rallying the world to join in the fight against extremism." But Monday, a poll of 26,000 people in 25 countries was released that showed that global opinion of U.S. foreign policy has sharply deteriorated in the past two years. Nearly three-quarters of those polled by GlobeScan, an international polling company, disapprove of U.S. policies toward Iraq, and nearly half said the United States is playing a mainly negative role in the world.

In his State of the Union address a year ago, Bush said that progress in Iraq meant "we should be able to further decrease our troop levels" but that "those decisions will be made by our military commanders, not by politicians in Washington, D.C." Bush now proposes to increase troop levels, after having overruled the concerns of commanders. In his speech last night, he sidestepped this contradiction, saying that "our military commanders and I have carefully weighed the options" and "in the end, I chose this course of action."

On domestic policy, Bush at one point said that "the recovery" has added more than 7.2 million jobs since August 2003. But the net number of jobs created since Bush became president in January 2001, is much lower -- just 3.6 million. The Bush administration's performance is fairly mediocre for the sixth year of a presidency, according to historical statistics maintained by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. Nearly 18 million jobs were added by the sixth year of Bill Clinton's presidency -- and nearly 10 million were added at this point in Ronald Reagan's presidency.

Bush claimed credit for cutting the budget deficit ahead of schedule and proposed to eliminate it over the next five years. He did not mention that he inherited a huge budget surplus -- $236 billion in 2000 -- compared with a $296 billion deficit in the 2006 fiscal year, largely as a result of Bush's tax cuts and spending increases. Bush claimed that the No Child Left Behind Act has helped students to "perform better at reading and math, and minority students are closing the achievement gap." But states made stronger average annual gains in reading during the decade before the law took effect, education researchers have found, and half a dozen recent studies have shown little progress in narrowing the test-score gap between minority and white students.

Bush Insists U.S. Must Not Fail In Iraq (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 — President Bush tried to resuscitate his ailing presidency Tuesday night, using his State of the Union address to present a modest agenda of energy and health care proposals while warning an increasingly assertive Congress against undercutting his new Iraq strategy.

It was a speech that reflected Mr. Bush's difficult circumstances. It was limited in ambition and political punch at home, with no proposals to rival his call two years ago to remake Social Security, no mention of rebuilding New Orleans and no allusions to limiting stem cell research or banning gay marriage.

And when it came to his plan to send additional troops to Iraq, he was forced to plead with the Democrats who now control Congress — and with a growing number of Republican critics — to "give it a chance to work."

In an admission that the United States now finds itself trapped in the cross-fire of a sectarian conflict, Mr. Bush said, "This is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we are in." While he insisted that America could not afford to fail, he also warned the Iraqi government that "our commitment is not open-ended."

His freshest initiative was setting a goal of reducing projected gasoline consumption 20 percent over the next 10 years. This hit a theme tailored to his appeal for bipartisanship in a city where the balance of power has shifted markedly against Mr. Bush since the last State of the Union address. Although he did not propose any measures to deal with emissions from power plants and factories, the main sources of greenhouse gases, he spoke of "the serious challenge of global climate change."

The other main element of his domestic agenda, a package of proposals intended to improve access to health insurance, had drawn intense opposition from Democrats long before Mr. Bush walked to the well of the House chamber on Tuesday night, a scene he could not have relished but handled graciously. Behind him sat a Democratic House speaker, Representative Nancy Pelosi, sitting alongside Vice President Dick Cheney. In front of him was an audience of Democrats growing increasingly comfortable with their new power, including quite a few who are jockeying to take his job and reverse the policies he has put in place.

Mr. Bush gamely ticked off other goals he would like to achieve before leaving office in three days short of two years. They included overhauling immigration laws, taking steps toward a balanced budget, dealing with the long-term financial condition of Social Security and Medicare, and imposing tighter standards on schools.

Yet the proposals were overwhelmed by the Iraq debate.

"Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq," Mr. Bush said, "because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far-reaching."

While Mr. Bush has traditionally used these speeches to present a hopeful vision of Iraq's future, he could not do so on Tuesday night. His own nominee to take over the command of United States forces in Iraq, Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, told the Senate Armed Services Committee earlier in the day that "the situation in Iraq is dire."

Mr. Bush started his speech 12 hours before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was to begin working on a bipartisan resolution in opposition to his plan to send additional troops to Iraq. Despite his proposal of a bipartisan council to advise him on the battle against Islamic extremism, Democrats immediately assailed him, and members of his own party continued to show signs of edging away.

In the Democratic response to his address, Senator Jim Webb of Virginia, whose son is a marine serving in Iraq, said that Mr. Bush "took us into this war recklessly," and that the United States was now "held hostage to the predictable and predicted disarray that followed." Mr. Webb called for "a formula that will in short order allow our combat forces to leave Iraq," and said that if Mr. Bush did not change course in Iraq and in his economic policies, "we will be showing him the way."

Mr. Bush got a polite reception, but one far more muted than in previous appearances. He waited until the end of his nearly 50-minute speech to deliver the assessment that typically opens these addresses, that "the state of our union is strong." For a man who finds himself struggling to maintain public and political support, Mr. Bush delivered the speech in a confident tone, with easy and relaxed smiles.

Seeking new ground for consensus, Mr. Bush reached back to a theme that marked the first days of his presidency, when he would regularly appeal for bipartisanship. "Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on, as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done," he said.

But the power dynamic on Tuesday night was completely different. In the six years in which Republicans controlled one or both houses of Congress, Democrats said they saw little of that bipartisan instinct at work, and despite vows to behave differently, they have not shown much in return.

In fact, Mr. Bush's argument on Tuesday night for embracing his Iraq plan amounted to a reverse of the argument that he made from the same podium four years ago, when he contended that dealing with Saddam Hussein would help the United States bring other rogue states to heel. This time, Mr. Bush spoke of a "nightmare scenario," of an Iraq "overrun by extremists on all sides." He said the violence in the country would turn contagious, spread beyond Iraq's borders and inflame the entire Middle East.

And he appealed to Democrats to remember the votes many of them cast in 2002 to authorize the invasion, throwing some responsibility their way in the process.

"We went into this largely united, in our assumptions and in our convictions," he said, recalling the days when his approval ratings were sky-high. "And whatever you voted for, you did not vote for failure."

Mr. Bush was careful in describing what many in his administration believe could be a coming confrontation with Iran. While he vowed that the world would never allow Iran to obtain a nuclear weapon, he made no threats, saying he was relying on diplomacy to deal with both Iran and North Korea, the two countries that, five years ago, he declared in a State of the Union address made up an "axis of evil" with Saddam Hussein's Iraq.

There were no such labels on Tuesday, a reflection of the reality that with American forces tied down in Iraq, Mr. Bush's options are limited.

But the effect of Iraq extends to the domestic front. Even his allies say the war threatens the prospects of the new initiatives he described.

"Iraq casts a huge shadow over anything in the domestic policy arena that the president talks about," said Glen Bolger, a Republican pollster. "The situation makes it very difficult for the president to get Americans to pay attention to what he's saying on issues like energy and health care."

Dan Bartlett, the White House counselor, argued otherwise. "If you talk about the issues the public cares about, and you put forward innovative, bold ideas," Mr. Bartlett said, "the American people, regardless of what the polls say that day, will say, 'This is worth study, this is worth engaging the Democratic Congress on.' "

Ms. Pelosi and Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Senate majority leader, said in a joint statement that Mr. Bush's goals on energy were "commendable," but suggested they would seek to achieve them through different policies.

Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, speaking on ABC News, said Mr. Bush would find "a receptive audience" for his energy and health care goals, though she later said she found the early details of his health care plan "really troubling." The Republican minority leader in the Senate, Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, said the two parties should find innovative ways to tackle the issues.

Mr. Bush's aides and allies argue that he could exert some leverage by accusing Democrats of intransigence and "do-nothingness" should they flatly shoot down his proposals, as they were starting to do even before his speech.

"The real question is not whether he can make it work; he's extended his hand several times now," said Senator Jon Kyl, Republican of Arizona. "The real question is how much do the Democrats want to cooperate with him."

But the Democrats have been in control only a few weeks, and polls indicate that for now the public is more likely to side with them in a fight. And it is not clear that Mr. Bush's new proposals would do anything to reverse the political balance of power.

Bush Urges Congress To 'find Resolve' On Iraq (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

President George W. Bush on Tuesday night made his most pessimistic and assertive defence of his new policy on the war in Iraq as he warned of a "nightmare scenario" of sectarian violence that could draw the entire region into the conflict.

In his annual State of the Union address, Mr Bush - battling criticism over the rationale for going to war and his strategy - sought support of Congress and the American people for sending an additional 21,500 more troops to Iraq.

"It is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle. So let us find our resolve and turn events toward victory," he said.

He also offered a stark warning to senators and members of Congress who have opposed the surge.

"We could expect an epic battle between Shia extremists backed by Iran, and Sunni extremists aided by al Qaeda and supporters of the old regime. A contagion of violence could spill out across the country - and in time the entire region could be drawn into the conflict," the president said on Tuesday night.

"Chaos is their greatest ally in this struggle. And out of chaos in Iraq, would emerge an emboldened enemy with new safe havens, new recruits, new resources and an even greater determination to harm America. To allow this to happen would be to ignore the lessons of September 11 and invite tragedy."

The president's speech set no new policy on Iraq and painted a positive domestic agenda. At the centre of this was a new energy policy.

For the first time in his presidency he called the threat of global climate change a "serious challenge" and outlined plans to address the rise in greenhouse gas emissions by calling for Americans to cut demand for petrol by 20 per cent over the next 10 years.

His comments reflected a chastened president bowing to rising international and domestic criticism of his policy on global warming, and seeking to forge a legacy based on shifting the US from its dependence on foreign oil, echoing last year's most memorable line that "America is addicted to oil."

Mr Bush outlined his plans for an aggressive shift to alternative fuels such as ethanol, a politically popular stance in the Midwest, and a greater focus on energy efficiency with a call to increase fuel economy standards in the US, which remain below those of China. "These technologies will help us become better stewards of the environment and they will help us to confront the serious challenge of global climate change."

According to a White House document the plan "will confront climate change by stopping the projected growth of carbon dioxide emissions from cars, light trucks and SUVs within ten years."

The so-called "Twenty by ten" goal marks a significant shift for the White House towards recognising that it must give a higher priority to addressing domestic demand for oil as well as bolstering supply. It bows to pressure from international leaders, corporations and domestic concern to act on climate change, and recognises that Democrats have radically shifted the focus of energy policy towards energy efficiency. Mr Bush's first five State of the Union speeches have not directly addressed climate change, and in 2001 he summed up his energy policy as "We can't conserve our way to energy independence."

Mr Bush said he would achieve his goal of cutting US demand for petrol by raising fuel economy standards and shifting to alternative fuels. About three-quarters of the shift will come from moves towards fuels such as ethanol, rather than a more aggressive stance on fuel economy.

President George W. Bush triggered the biggest one-day jump in oil prices in 16 months on Tuesday when he set out plans to double US strategic oil reserves.

Oil prices rose 4.7 per cent to $55 a barrel after Mr Bush pledged to double the size of the reserves by 1.5bn barrels by 2027. Sam Bodman, energy secretary, said his department would start "purchasing crude oil in the spring at a rate of about 100,000 barrels per day".

In an echo of last year's most memorable line that the US is "addicted to oil", Mr Bush on Tuesday night warned: "For too long our nation has been dependent on foreign oil. And this dependence leaves us more vulnerable to hostile regimes, and to terrorists who could cause huge disruptions of oil shipments."

DOJ_NMG_0120765

Mr Bush's address comes as he faces the lowest approval ratings for any president ahead of a State of the Union since Richard Nixon in 1974. A recent Washington-Post/ABC News poll gave Mr Bush a 33 per cent approval rating. Dan Bartlett, White House counselor, said it reflected the fact that officials were "under no illusions about the atmosphere we are operating in."

Faced with opposition from Democrats and rising Republican dissent about his plans for a troop surge in Iraq, Mr Bush defended his strategy. "Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq – because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far reaching."

Although Mr Bush called for bi-partisan co-operation in Iraq Democrats swiftly attacked his proposals. Jim Webb, the newly elected senator from Virginia, who was selected to give the Democratic party's rebuttal to the speech, criticised the president.

"He took us into this war recklessly. He disregarded warnings from the national security adviser during the first Gulf war, the chief of staff of the army, two former commanding generals of the central command, whose jurisdiction includes Iraq, the director of operations on the joint chiefs of staff."

The White House energy policy fell short of hopes it would engage in international discussions about a post Kyoto accord after 2012 to control greenhouse gases or support tougher economy wide mandatory caps on carbon dioxide.

Higher oil prices pushed energy stocks up sharply. The S&P's energy sector rose 2.4 per cent with shares in Exxon Mobil up 2.2 per cent at $74.49 and Chevron 1.9 per cent to $72.56.

Getting A Read On The Speech Makes For Quite A Snapshot (WP)

By Tom Shales

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

George W. Bush flirted with eloquence only at the end of his so-so, nuts-and-bolts State of the Union speech last night: "The state of our union is strong," he said, "our cause in the world is right, and tonight that cause goes on." With a quick "God bless" he bolted from the podium as members of Congress, almost applauded out by that time, gave him his final ovation of the night.

Bedecked in yet another of his pale blue neckties, Bush began the speech on a conciliatory and bipartisan note, declaring himself "the first president to begin the State of the Union message with these words: Madam Speaker" -- a reference, of course, to Democrat Nancy Pelosi, who now presides over the House. Bush also congratulated "the Democratic majority" that he was facing en masse for the first time.

As seen on all the major and minor networks, the speech was workmanlike and the presentation presentable. Bush seemed determined to keep it low-key. Campbell Brown, reporting for NBC News, called it "extremely subdued." Brown had an unusual perspective, at least for a correspondent. Before the speech began, anchor Brian Williams told viewers that a journalist was being allowed to report from the floor of the House, right down there with the legislators, for the first time.

Brown was heard but not seen, however; she was not accompanied by a camera.

On CBS, Bob Schieffer called Bush's address "a much better speech" than the one in which he announced his plan to send more than 20,000 additional troops to Iraq, a speech delivered from the White House library earlier this month. Bush spoke of that plan last night as a fait accompli, not something he wants to talk over with anybody on Capitol Hill. "We are deploying" additional troops, he said -- not "we want to deploy" or "I would like to deploy."

To its credit, ABC News, alone among the three major networks, stayed on the air with coverage for the rest of the hour after Bush finished talking. Charles Gibson anchored from outside the Capitol in a topcoat. Even more exhaustive coverage was available on HDNet, a high-definition network whose anchor is Dan Rather. Yes, that Dan Rather, who preceded and followed the speech with interviews and features, signing off at 11 p.m.

On C-SPAN, which went to live pictures from the House chamber 15 minutes before the speech began, commentator Kenneth Walsh, of U.S. News & World Report, noted the presence of guest stars in the balcony both in the first lady's box and in the section controlled by Democrats. He predicted "dueling images of heroes and celebrities" during the speech.

Actually, it was more a case of dueling standing ovations as Republicans and Democrats took turns jumping to their feet to express approval for something Bush said. When the president used the terms "global warming" and "global climate change" -- probably for the first time in one of his State of the Union speeches, if not ever -- Democrats rose and clapped away. A moment later, when he called for quick approval of judges nominated to federal courts -- "a prompt up-or-down vote" in Congress, it was the Republicans' turn to stand and applaud, while most of the Democrats stewed in their seats.

Some members of Congress, forgetting they might be in a reaction shot at any moment, also forgot that it's best not to read along with the president from printed copies of his speech that they'd been given in advance. In a telling two-shot, viewers saw Illinois Sen. Barack Obama in the foreground reading from the speech, and thus appearing almost to be asleep, and right behind him New York Sen. Hillary Clinton, quite possibly Obama's major foe in pursuing the Democratic presidential nomination for 2008, looking bright-eyed (and for all we know, bushy-tailed) and appearing to give the president her full and eager attention.

Sen. Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) was caught by cameras reading the speech, too, but he looks so venerable and distinguished by now that it's hard to get a bad picture of him. In fact he seems more and more to resemble Claude Rains as a veteran white-haired senator in Frank Capra's classic movie "Mr. Smith Goes to Washington." Life imitating art's imitation of life.

Although Katie Couric is the presiding anchor on CBS, she increasingly relies on the expertise of Schieffer when covering big political events. They are now virtual co-anchors. While Couric read from prepared historical information about past State of the Union addresses, Schieffer did the up-to-date political analysis. In fact, he seemed to get even more screen time than Couric in the minutes leading up to the speech.

MSNBC's Keith Olbermann told viewers the speech was to begin at 9:01:30 but allowed as how it could take 12 minutes for the president to make his way down the aisle to the podium, depending on how many hands got shaken. A lot did. And Bush didn't enter the chamber until 9:09; he finally began speaking at 9:13 (concluding at 10:03).

The Democratic response to the speech -- delivered last night by Virginia Sen. Jim Webb -- traditionally doesn't air until the president is out of sight. Could Bush have intentionally been delaying it by grasping every hand in sight and giving countless autographs when he got to the exit from the chamber? Whatever, he was, as the cliche goes, all smiles at this point, seemingly oblivious to the fact that he is now, according to polls, as unpopular as Richard Nixon was when wallowing in Watergate.

Some 2008 Contenders Disagree, Politely (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Anne E. Kornblut

Washington Post, January 24, 2007

President Bush's audience at the Capitol last night included at least 10 Republicans and Democrats who hope to succeed him, and their response to his State of the Union address ranged from enthusiastic to tepid.

The most generous was Sen. John McCain of Arizona, a leading contender for the GOP nomination and Bush's chief defender on the Iraq war, including the administration's latest plan to deploy an additional 21,500 troops.

"This strategy ought to be given a chance, because the consequences of failure are immense, and we'll be back again some day," McCain told ABC News in a post-speech interview. "This is going to be long and hard and tough."

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), the Democratic front-runner, was more skeptical, urging Bush to seek a more "comprehensive approach" to the Iraq crisis. Bush's troop escalation proposal, she said, was "really more of the same. We've gone down this road before."

"Most Americans believe that escalation will not bring the war in Iraq to a responsible end, and that's why I've proposed not just a troop cap, but a phased redeployment that will start bringing our troops home," added Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), another major contender.

Bush was the main event last night, but the 2008 contenders created their own media sideshow. As lawmakers milled around on the House floor prior to the speech, cameras caught Obama joking with colleagues and Sen. Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) and applauding politely as Cabinet secretaries filed into the chamber. Obama sat directly in front of Clinton during the speech, while McCain sat with his head bowed, following along with a written version.

Presidential prospects dominated post-speech television coverage, with the national networks staking out a separate interview staging ground for party VIPs in the Russell Senate Office Building rotunda, away from the hoards of local television crews that packed Statuary Hall in the Capitol. Obama showed up first, immediately after the speech ended at 10:15 p.m., and announced that he hadn't heard anything surprising, although he did describe the mood in the chamber as "courteous."

Meanwhile, Clinton stood a few steps away, noting the "very crowded rotunda" as she peered around for a way to duck past Obama.

As of last night, Obama had been booked on all the major morning news programs, while Clinton declined to appear. Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.), another 2008 contender, had been scheduled on several programs, but was bumped, according to a senior Democratic Senate aide.

John Edwards, a former senator and the 2004 Democratic vice presidential nominee, watched the speech from Miami and made a series of television appearances from there. He responded to Bush's speech with a full-page ad today in the Capitol Hill newspaper Roll Call that asks Congress to use its power to stop President Bush from sending more troops to Iraq.

The text reads, "Last night, you heard the president speak. Today, listen to the American people," and is followed by a list of voters who have endorsed Edwards's proposal that Congress block funding for a troop increase.

Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), the 2004 presidential nominee, offered some of the harshest criticism of the night, saying Bush "glossed over the disastrous war and its multibillion-dollar price tag and implied again that our presence in Iraq is somehow improving the situation in that chaotic and turbulent country."

Kerry added that he would soon introduce legislation to demand that the White House set a date for withdrawing troops from Iraq.

Democratic candidates were most generous in their response to Bush's domestic proposals, particularly ideas to expand health coverage and cut gasoline consumption. "The president offered some serious proposals tonight on two issues -- energy and health care -- that we all agree must be addressed," Obama said in a post-speech statement. "I'm glad he did and I think it's important to respond in a constructive way."

Clinton echoed Obama's more conciliatory response to the president's domestic proposals. "I'm willing to work with anyone," he said. "Let's try to get something done."

On the Republican side, former New York mayor Rudolph W. Giuliani, another major contender for the GOP presidential nomination, had warm things to say about Bush's speech during an interview on Fox.

"I thought the speech was a very good one and I thought it did what the president had to do, which is to get us kind of beyond Iraq, meaning there are a lot of other things we have to concentrate on," he said.

The State Of The Union (NYT)

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

The White House spin ahead of George W. Bush's seventh State of the Union address was that the president would make a bipartisan call to revive his domestic agenda with "bold and innovative concepts." The problem with that was obvious last night — in six years, Mr. Bush has shown no interest in bipartisanship, and his domestic agenda was set years ago, with huge tax cuts for wealthy Americans and crippling debt for the country.

Combined with the mounting cost of the war in Iraq, that makes boldness and innovation impossible unless Mr. Bush truly changes course. And he gave no hint of that last night. Instead, he offered up a tepid menu of ideas that would change little: a health insurance notion that would make only a tiny dent in a huge problem. More promises about cutting oil consumption with barely a word about global warming. And the same lip service about immigration reform on which he has failed to deliver.

At times, Mr. Bush sounded almost as if he'd gotten the message of the 2006 elections. "Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on — as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done," he said.

But we've heard that from Mr. Bush before. In early 2001, he promised to bring Americans together and instead embarked on his irresponsible tax cuts, a divisive right-wing social agenda and a neo-conservative foreign policy that tore up international treaties and alienated even America's closest allies. In the wake of 9/11, Mr. Bush had a second chance to rally the nation — and the world — only to squander it on a pointless, catastrophic war in Iraq. Mr. Bush promised bipartisanship after his re-election in 2004, and again after Hurricane Katrina. Always, he failed to deliver. He did not even mention New Orleans last night.

When Republicans controlled Congress and the White House, Mr. Bush's only real interest was in making their majority permanent; consultation meant telling the Democrats what he had decided.

DOJ_NMG_0120768

Neither broken promises nor failed policies changed Mr. Bush's mind. So the nation has been saddled with tax cuts that have turned a budget surplus into a big deficit, education reform that has been badly managed and underfinanced, far-right judges with scant qualifications, the dismantling of regulations in order to benefit corporations at the expense of workers, and a triumph of ideology over science in policy making on the environment and medical research. All along, Americans' civil liberties and the constitutional balance have been trampled by a president determined to assert ever more power.

Now that the Democrats have taken Congress, Mr. Bush is acting as if he'd had the door to compromise open all along and the Democrats had refused to walk through it.

Last night, Mr. Bush also acted as if he were really doing something to help the 47 million people in this country who don't have health insurance. What he offered, by the White House's own estimate, would take a few million off that scandalously high number and shift the burden to the states. Mr. Bush's plan would put a new tax on Americans who were lucky enough to still have good health-care coverage through their employers. Some large portion of those are middle class and represented by the labor unions that Mr. Bush and the Republicans are dedicated to destroying.

Mr. Bush's comments on Iraq added nothing to his failed policies. He did, at last, propose a permanent increase in the size of the Army and Marines that would repair some of the damage he has done to those forces. But that would take years, and it would do nothing to halt Iraq's spiral. Mr. Bush failed to explain how he would pay for a larger force, which would almost certainly require cutting budget-busting weapons programs. That would mean going up against the arms industry and its lobbyists — something Mr. Bush has never been willing to do.

Mr. Bush almost certainly didn't intend it, but his speech did reinforce one vital political fact — that it's not just up to him anymore. There was a big change last night: the audience. Instead of solid Republican majorities marching in lock step with the White House, Congress is controlled by Democrats. It will be their task to give leadership to a nation that desperately wants change and expects its leaders to work together to deliver it. The Democrats' challenge will be to form real coalitions with willing Republicans. If they do, Mr. Bush may even be forced, finally, to compromise.

Say what you will about the flaws and shortcomings of the two-party system. After six years of the Bush presidency, at least we know it's a lot better than the one-party system.

Speaking On Demand (LAT)

Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

The State of the Union address, a constitutional requirement, seemed more forced than ever this year.

IT IS ALWAYS tempting to take the State of the Union address seriously. It is the Constitution, after all, that requires that the president "from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union," and even if the substance of the address rarely inspires, there is always the spectacle itself: the full chamber, the shouts and applause of the audience, the surprise guests in the gallery.

This year, however, the speech felt even more compulsory than usual. President Bush seemed at times to be going through the motions, reasserting his position or making proposals on a number of issues — immigration, healthcare, education, the war in Iraq, energy independence — in an effort to remain relevant in the face of a Democratic Congress and plummeting public support. It's difficult to know how many of his ideas will amount to anything. On a few fronts, however, they're either interesting or relevant (though not often both).

Immigration reform is the most pressing domestic business left from the previous Congress. It's also the policy area in which Bush's goal of establishing a "legal and orderly path for foreign workers to enter our country to work on a temporary basis" became more feasible, rather than less so, with the Democratic takeover of Congress.

Given that this is not a new debate, it would have been nice if the president had been more specific. But, in any event, the burden is now on the Democratic congressional leadership to, as Bush said, "resolve the status of the illegal immigrants who are already in our country." Alluding to the excessively prolonged legislative battle over immigration, Bush was right to plead for a "conclusive" debate on Capitol Hill.

Like his remarks on immigration, Bush's rhetoric on the need for affordable healthcare was hardly new; he has cited the issue in four previous State of the Union speeches. On Tuesday, Bush did tout two interesting proposals: offering a standard tax deduction that would make health insurance more affordable to workers without benefits, and letting states use some federal healthcare funds to provide insurance to low-income residents. Both ideas have merit. Yet both are long shots politically.

It's worth noting that on more than a few items on the president's domestic agenda, the real action is in the states. It's hard to say how much Bush's thinking owes to leaders such as former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (on healthcare) and Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger (on healthcare and global warming), but they can claim that they helped put these issues on the agenda. Both problems can only be solved at the national level, so the president's attention is encouraging.

Of course, much of the president's speech concerned Iraq, although he said little that was particularly original or helpful. What happens there, even more than what he said Tuesday night, will be the true test of the president's seriousness and resolve in the months ahead.

The State Of The Union (USAT)

USA Today, January 24, 2007

As President Bush delivered his State of the Union address Tuesday night, the scene around him was as telling as his words. On camera over his left shoulder sat Nancy Pelosi, the first Democratic House Speaker in 12 years and a symbol that the compliant Republican Congresses that rubber-stamped the president's Iraq policies are gone. For the first time in his presidency, Democratic majorities of both houses filled the chamber.

The president acknowledged that new reality in several ways. But not on Iraq. Bush appeared to be wedded Lyndon Johnson-like to a vision that is failing in the field, under bipartisan attack in Congress and opposed overwhelmingly by a public that expresses increasing restlessness in the polls.

He argued for his new plan but largely with his old ideas: that the stakes are so high there is no option but to succeed, and that failure would embolden radicals, posing a threat to U.S. allies throughout the Middle East and ultimately a threat to Americans.

All are distinct possibilities, but whether Bush's plan "provides the best chance of success," as he put it, is questionable.

The president didn't sound like a man down to his last chance, but he is. With voters already restless and angry over a war that was sold as a quick strike but is now almost four years old, no candidate of either party wants to go into the 2008 elections with nothing changed. That makes the end of this year the practical outside limit for Bush's policy to show success. Testifying to Congress earlier Tuesday, David Petraeus, the Army general who would carry out Bush's plan, called the situation in Iraq "dire" and said it might take until late summer to know whether the new strategy is working. That leaves a very small window for success.

Bush's hope is that the United States and its Iraqi allies can gain the upper hand by "surging" 21,500 additional U.S. troops to help subdue violence in Baghdad and hunt al-Qaeda in Anbar province. With the surge already under way, Americans should wish the troops well and hope for success. Even a glimmer of hope that the violence might begin to subside could change the equation. At the very least, it would give the United States leverage it hasn't had since the heady days after the fall of Baghdad to rally international support and bargain from strength with interventionist neighbors such as Iran and Syria.

But even Bush's staunchest backers concede success will take time and initially increase American casualties, which will at some point wear away what little is left of American support. The president has too often staked his credibility on plans for victory that turned out to be terribly flawed.

Today comes the inevitable price for that, as the Senate Foreign Relations Committee takes up nonbinding resolutions to disapprove Bush's surge policy. In the short run, the worst Bush can expect is a symbolic but politically painful rebuke.

Eventually, though, if Bush remains at odds with Congress, he could find himself pushed toward the sort of phased withdrawal outlined by the Iraq Study Group and largely backed by the senators pushing the resolutions. Among other things, they advocate refocusing a smaller U.S. force on training the Iraqi army to handle most security and positioning Americans to strike against al-Qaeda.

No president can sustain a war without support from the voters, and, as President Ford discovered when he pushed Vietnam to a final confrontation in 1975, no war can continue if Congress refuses to fund it.

Time is running out.

State Of Troubles (WP)

Washington Post, January 24, 2007

PRESIDENT BUSH offered the usual assurances last night about the healthy state of the union, but the state of his presidency has never been worse. He faces a Democratic majority in both chambers of Congress and a public increasingly unhappy about the war in Iraq and disenchanted with his leadership. By the time he delivers next year's State of the Union address, the primaries will be underway, and Mr. Bush's relevance will be fading. If he is to have a final chance to shape policy, this is it.

For that reason, Mr. Bush was probably right to save discussion of foreign policy for the second half of last night's speech. At this point, there isn't much he can do to convince skeptics in Congress or the public about the correctness of his approach in Iraq; the time to craft a policy with more public support and bipartisan agreement passed with Mr. Bush's speech two weeks ago. Mr. Bush's goal last night was not so much to argue anew for the troop increase but to drive home the point that the "consequences of failure would be grievous and far reaching." On this, Mr. Bush is assuredly correct.

There are more opportunities for bipartisan cooperation domestically, but here what was most significant -- and disappointing -- was what Mr. Bush left off his agenda. Once again, he did not offer a sustained and broad-scale effort to address climate change, instead choosing to treat progress on the issue as just a fortuitous byproduct of his effort to cut gasoline consumption. Similarly, Mr. Bush -- having tried and failed to reform Social Security, having promised a commission on entitlements in last year's State of the Union that he never managed to convene -- referred only briefly, and without specifics, to the need to tackle the coming explosion in entitlement spending. And at a time when the country could benefit from a serious discussion of the importance of free trade and the parallel need to mitigate the disruptions of globalization, Mr. Bush referred just glancingly to trade.

Mr. Bush concentrated his pitch on four domestic areas: energy, health care, immigration reform and reauthorization of his signature education measure, the No Child Left Behind Act. He called for reducing gasoline consumption by 20 percent in the next decade, in part by adopting new fuel economy standards but mostly through increased reliance on alternative fuels. These initiatives are attractive, but it's not clear that the president's ambitious plan -- he'd increase alternative fuel use from the current 4 billion gallons per year to 35 billion by 2017 -- is feasible.

On health care, Mr. Bush would cap the currently unlimited tax deduction for employer-sponsored health insurance; he'd replace that with a standard deduction -- $15,000 for a family policy -- available for all insurance, whether offered by employers or bought privately. This would improve progressivity and fairness, and help contain health-care costs. As written, the proposal has flaws, but those can be addressed -- if Democrats are willing to do more than hurl criticism.

"Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on -- as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done," Mr. Bush said last night. He missed key opportunities to put forward areas for such cooperation -- and in the past six years, he's done much to persuade Democrats that they have little to gain from partnership. Nonetheless, in the new political order that will dominate the final two years of the Bush presidency, it may be in the Democrats' interest as well as the nation's to seek bipartisan accomplishment. On energy, health care, education and immigration, Mr. Bush last night offered at least a reasonable basis for further discussion. Congress should engage, not reflexively dismiss.

State Of The Economy (WSJ)

Meanwhile, back at the economy, you may have noticed that 2006 ended without a recession. This follows the recessions of 2003, 2004 and 2005, all of which also never occurred, though they were widely warned about in the press and even forecast by many economists at some point during each of those years.

The big economic story going into this New Year is that growth is accelerating. Jobless claims have dipped, as the labor market stays tight amid a low 4.5% unemployment rate and rapidly rising real wages. Corporate profits continue to defy gravity, growing at nearly double-digit rates some five years into this expansion. Economist Ed Hyman's ISI Group reports that as of last Friday some 57% of companies had beat profit expectations for the fourth quarter.

Then there's the "trade deficit," which was supposed to have produced a crisis any day now but is instead contributing to faster growth as American exports soar. Peppier growth abroad is helping, especially in Europe, assuming Germany's big increase in value-added taxes this month doesn't get in the way. Oil prices have come down, and even the housing slump seems to have stabilized in some parts of the country.

If Bill Clinton were still President, he'd have used last night's State of the Union address to hail all of this as a triumph, taking political credit and claiming it was all due to his policies, with supportive headlines to match. It hardly matters what President Bush said last night; he still won't get any credit.

Democrats Slam Bush War Policy (AP)

By Laurie Kellman

AP, January 24, 2007

Democrats blistered President Bush's war policy Tuesday night, challenging him to redeem the nation's credibility — and his own — with an immediate shift toward a diplomatic end to the bloody conflict in Iraq.

"The president took us into this war recklessly," the Democrats' chosen messenger, Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia, said in response to Bush's State of the Union address Tuesday evening. "We are now, as a nation, held hostage to the predictable — and predicted — disarray that has followed."

Webb, a Vietnam veteran who was Navy secretary during Republican President Reagan's administration, called for a new direction.

"Not one step back from the war against international terrorism. Not a precipitous withdrawal that ignores the possibility of further chaos," said Webb. "But an immediate shift toward strong regionally based diplomacy, a policy that takes our soldiers off the streets of Iraq's cities and a formula that will in short order allow our combat forces to leave Iraq."

Bush offered no such plan in his speech before the most unfriendly joint session of Congress of his tenure.

Instead, the president focused on making the case that "failure would be grievous and far-reaching" and he defended his plan to send 21,500 more troops to Iraq in a short-term surge. He also issued a long list of domestic policy initiatives centered on such pet Democratic issues as energy independence and health care.

Newly installed majority Democrats welcomed his overtures of bipartisanship but weren't interested in changing the subject.

"Unfortunately, tonight the president demonstrated he has not listened to Americans' single greatest concern: the war in Iraq," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., said in a joint statement. "We will continue to hold him accountable for changing course in Iraq."

In a speech written himself and previewed by senior Democratic officials, Webb challenged Bush to support the House-passed minimum wage increase and nurture an economy that restores the middle class. And he said Democrats would work with Bush to promote energy independence.

But he chose harsher rhetoric for what he framed Bush's abuse of the public's loyalty, trust and welfare in the rush to war.

"The war's costs to our nation have been staggering," said Webb, whose son is serving in the military in Iraq. "Financially. The damage to our reputation around the world. The lost opportunities to defeat the forces of international terrorism, and especially the precious blood of our citizens who have stepped forward to serve."

Democrats also hammered home a message that achieving bipartisanship must be as much a part of Bush's agenda as proposals on the war, energy independence and health care.

"We hope to begin working with him to move our country in a new direction," Reid and Pelosi said in their statement.

"If he does, we will join him," Webb said. "If he does not, we will be showing him the way."

The speech capped the Democrats' effort to have the first, most frequent and last words on the president's annual address.

Seated in the gallery above the chamber was a reminder of a key factor in the Republicans' loss of congressional control and the lone veto of Bush's presidency. Actor Michael J. Fox, who has Parkinson's disease, attended as the guest of Rep. Jim Langevin, D-R.I., who is a quadriplegic, Langevin's spokeswoman said.

DOJ_NMG_0120772

Both men have health problems that some scientists believe might someday be cured or treated by embryonic stem cell research. Bush last year vetoed a bill that would have allowed taxpayer money to speed up those studies, arguing that public funds should not be spent on research that destroys budding human life.

Fox then appeared in several campaign commercials for candidates that support the bill, sparking a controversy and helping tilt the election in the Democrats' favor. The House earlier this month passed the same bill by a margin far short of the two-thirds majority required to override a second veto.

Va.'s Webb Offers A Blunt Challenge To Bush (WP)

By Michael D. Shear

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Sen. James Webb (D-Va.) delivered a forceful nine-minute response to President Bush's State of the Union address last night, promising an aggressive challenge to Bush's Iraq and economic policies from the newly empowered Democratic majority in Congress.

Speaking live from a historic Capitol Hill meeting room, Webb displayed the same blunt manner that won over Virginia voters in November and later generated headlines after a face-to-face exchange with Bush at the White House.

Webb accused the president of taking the country into Iraq "recklessly" and forcing it to endure "a mismanaged war for nearly four years."

"Many, including myself, warned even before the war began that it was unnecessary; that it would take our energy and attention away from the larger war against terrorism; and that invading and occupying Iraq would leave us strategically vulnerable," Webb said.

Webb held up a picture of his father as a young Air Force captain. As a small boy, he said, he took the picture to bed with him to remind him of his father's sacrifice. Now, Webb's son is serving in Iraq as a Marine infantryman.

"We need a new direction," said Webb, a decorated Marine veteran of the Vietnam War. "Not one step back from the war against international terrorism, not a precipitous withdrawal that ignores the possibility of further chaos, but an immediate shift toward strong, regionally based diplomacy."

Democrats owe their newfound control of the Senate to Webb's slim and improbable victory over former Virginia senator George Allen. Webb -- who served as secretary of the Navy under Ronald Reagan -- also embodies his party's central message: a determination to oppose the Iraq war while supporting the troops who are there.

Webb has become a folk hero among liberals and Democratic bloggers for brusquely telling Bush at a White House event that questions from the president about Webb's son are "between me and my boy."

So after just three weeks as a U.S. senator, Webb became the choice of the Democratic leadership in the Senate and House of Representatives to carry their blunt warning about Bush's new war strategy.

"He represents to me what the new America is all about," said Senate Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) as he faced about 40 reporters with Webb and House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (Calif.). "Someone who understands what it means to go to war, what it means to have peace, what it means to work on a bipartisan basis. I think he's the perfect person to answer the president."

For the second year, Democrats turned to a newly elected Virginian for their response to Bush. Last year, they picked Gov. Timothy M. Kaine, fresh from victory in the conservative state.

Kaine offered an upbeat, hopeful message tinged with a few jabs at Bush. Webb, a former boxer, offered a harsher critique of the president's six years in office. With his party in control of Congress, Webb gave a speech that was more aggressive and confident.

On the economy, he described a growing divide between rich and poor during the Bush presidency. "In short, the middle class of this country, our historic backbone and our best hope for a strong society in the future, is losing its place at the table," he said.

For Webb, the speech capped a remarkable year that began with an underfunded, largely dismissed campaign to unseat a leading presidential hopeful. For most of the year, his campaign was ignored by pundits and criticized by suspicious Democrats.

But his bid for office caught on as Allen's was rocked by gaffes and scandal. After his 9,000-vote victory, Webb thrust his son's combat boots over his head, the first time Webb had had them off his feet in public since the Senate campaign began.

Webb began yesterday by spilling a cup of coffee on his blue shirt, prompting an aide to urge a change of clothes rather than just a buttoning of his jacket. "I told him this was one of the biggest appearances he'd make in his life, so maybe we should change the shirt," said Jessica Smith, Webb's communications director.

For the first time, networks planned to broadcast the State of the Union and Webb's response in high-definition television. That prompted Webb's staff to hire a makeup specialist who could make sure that Webb looked good in crystal-clear pictures.

Aides said Webb took the speech seriously, vigorously rewriting the initial draft suggested by the offices of Reid and Pelosi. But like past State of the Union responders, Webb received much unsolicited advice. Asked why the speech grew from five minutes to more than eight, Smith said, "That's what happens when you have input from everyone."

Webb concluded his speech with references to former presidents Dwight Eisenhower and Theodore Roosevelt and a warning for Bush:

"These presidents took the right kind of action for the benefit of the American people and for the health of our relations around the world. Tonight, we are calling on this president to take similar action in both areas. If he does, we will join him. If he does not, we will be showing him the way."

Democratic Sen. Webb Rebukes Bush's Handling Of Iraq (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON - In a stinging Democratic Party response to President Bush's State of the Union address, freshman Sen. James Webb of Virginia said Bush "took us into this war recklessly" and "we are now as a nation held hostage to the predictable and predicted disarray that has followed."

Webb, whose Marine son is serving in Iraq, said Bush has lost the support of the majority of the country and the military.

Webb called for "not one step back from the war against international terrorism, not a precipitous withdrawal that ignores the possibility of further chaos, but an immediate shift toward strong, regionally-based diplomacy, a policy that takes our soldiers off the streets of Iraq's cities and a formula that will in short order allow our combat forces to leave Iraq."

The Democratic-led Senate and House of Representatives plan to pass nonbinding resolutions opposing the president's troop buildup, but as of now they aren't threatening to withhold funding for it.

Before Webb was a Vietnam War hero, or President Reagan's Navy secretary, or a best-selling author, or the Republican-turned-Democrat who beat Sen. George Allen last year to give Democrats the last seat they needed to take control of the Senate, he was a boxer at the U.S. Naval Academy.

On Tuesday night, he delivered his harshest blows against the war in Iraq.

But he also jabbed at other openings, saying that now that Democrats control Congress for the first time in Bush's presidency, they'll hold him to deliver on promises to improve public education, health care, the plight of Hurricane Katrina survivors and economic conditions for the working class.

Invoking the legacies of two past Republican presidents - Theodore Roosevelt for taking on corporate robber barons and Dwight D. Eisenhower for ending the Korean War - Webb challenged Bush to follow their examples.

"If he does, we will join him," he said. "If he does not, we will be showing him the way."

Democrats Hit Bush On Iraq And Economy (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia accused President Bush of presiding over a "mismanaged war" and an imbalanced economy Tuesday in a bluntly worded speech that reflected the new Democratic majority's willingness to flex its muscle in Congress.

Webb, who won last November in an upset after a campaign centered largely on his opposition to the war in Iraq, focused on the war in a nationally televised speech that served as his party's official response to the president.

DOJ_NMG_0120774

A decorated Vietnam War combat veteran, Webb invoked his family's tradition of military service. His father, an Air Force colonel, is buried in Arlington National Cemetery, and his son, Jimmy, is a Marine serving in Iraq.

"We owed them our loyalty, as Americans, and we gave it," he said. "They owed us sound judgment, clear thinking, concern for our welfare — a guarantee that the threat to our country was equal to the price we might be called upon to pay for defending it."

Bush and his advisers, he added, repaid the loyalty of the troops in Iraq by going to war "recklessly."

On the economy, Webb struck a populist note, decrying the widening disparity between the earnings of corporate executives and average workers, and the outsourcing of manufacturing jobs. "The middle class of this country, our historic backbone and our best hope for a strong society in the future, is losing its place at the table," he said.

The aggressive note struck by Webb in the Democrats' official rebuttal reflected the changed political reality on Capitol Hill. For the first time since assuming the presidency in 2001, Bush was addressing a Congress that his party does not control.

The change was personified by the presence of Nancy Pelosi, a California Democrat and the nation's first female speaker of the House, sitting next to Vice President Dick Cheney behind the president as he spoke. Even Republicans, having lost the majority, seemed less inclined to be generous with the huzzahs and ovations that have punctuated Bush's past appearances.

"There's a lot of angst," said Sen. Mel Martinez, a Florida Republican who served in Bush's Cabinet and now chairs the Republican National Committee. In a sign of how far the president's star has fallen on Capitol Hill, Martinez expressed concern about Bush's reception. "I hope it's respectful," he said before the speech.

Members from both parties made it plain the deference shown the president wouldn't last much beyond Bush's one-hour visit to the Capitol.

Rep. Patrick McHenry, R-N.C., called Bush's health care proposal "dead on arrival." He blamed Democratic leaders, but McHenry made it plain that he isn't enthused about a plan that would increase taxes on some Americans. "I'd rather see us focus on free-market measures, like health care savings accounts," he said.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., dismissed Bush's call for a bipartisan task force on Iraq as "ridiculous." He said the president should instead consult with congressional committees on defense and foreign affairs. "It's a gimmick," Murtha, the top-ranking Democrat on the House panel that controls the defense budget, said of Bush's proposal.

Others saw it differently. "The president's bold, specific challenge to the Congress is to work together to tackle the big issues facing our nation," said Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky. "I believe we can find big solutions to big problems but only if the debate is aimed at accomplishment over political gain."

In his speech, Webb said the Democrats are "serious" about wanting to achieve bipartisan agreement. But he questioned Bush's sincerity by noting "this is the seventh time the president has mentioned energy independence in his State of the Union message."

Pelosi shared Webb's skepticism, telling reporters that Bush's deeds have so far not matched his rhetoric when it comes to weaning Americans from fossil fuels. "He has talked the talk, but he hasn't walked the walk," she said.

While Bush was seeking to work with Congress on domestic issues, Democrats and some Republicans were preparing to challenge him on Iraq. This morning, less than 12 hours after the president leaves Capitol Hill, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee is set to begin debating a resolution to express congressional disapproval of his plan to commit more troops to the Iraq war.

To Deliver Their Remarks, Democrats Opt To Put A Fresh Face Front And Center (NYT)

By Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 — When President Bush concluded his State of the Union address, Democrats did not turn to the House speaker, Nancy Pelosi, or to the Senate majority leader, Harry Reid, to deliver their response. They chose a different face for the party: a former Republican, an ex-marine and a secretary of the Navy in the Reagan administration.

That Democrat, Senator Jim Webb of Virginia, who won his seat at least in part through his tenacious opposition to the Iraq war, wore his son's combat boots on the campaign trail last year. And on Tuesday evening, Mr. Webb invoked his own biography, and his family's three generations of military service, as he declared that today's soldiers could no longer trust the judgment of their commander in chief.

"The majority of the nation no longer supports the way this war is being fought, nor do the majority of our military, nor does a majority of our Congress," Mr. Webb said. "We need a new direction."

The choice of Mr. Webb was intended to provide a symbol, through his words and appearance, for the new majority in Congress. In a commanding voice, the senator chastised the administration for its economic and foreign policies, but said Democrats would try to work with Mr. Bush to change course.

"If he does not," Mr. Webb said, "we will be showing him the way."

Late last year, before being sworn into the Senate, Mr. Webb created a minor furor when he declined to stand in line for a photograph with the president at a White House reception. When the two men finally came face to face, Mr. Bush asked Mr. Webb about his son, who was deployed in Iraq, to which Mr. Webb replied tersely, "That's between me and my boy."

In a city that cherishes photo opportunities, where even political rivals are inclined to extend a hand and smile, the private moment highlighted deep tensions of the day. The conservative columnist George F. Will derided Mr. Webb as a "pompous poseur" disrespectful of the president, while liberal bloggers hailed him as a burst of fresh air.

Mr. Webb, 60, is a leading member of the freshman class of Democrats who arrived here with a mandate of change. His triumph over Senator George Allen, a one-term Republican, made him a hero among Democrats, particularly among antiwar activists, and prompted Representative Pelosi, of California, and Senator Reid, of Nevada, to tap him for the marquee position.

"He represents to me what the new America is all about," Mr. Reid, "someone who understands what it means to go to war, what it means to have peace, what it means to work on a bipartisan basis, someone who understands Reagan Democrats and the non-Reagan Democrats and independents and Republicans out there."

At the same time, Mr. Webb also illustrates the internal challenges facing Democrats as they settle on a response to the president's Iraq strategy. His five-minute speech did wade into the thorny question of whether the party will go beyond a symbolic resolution denouncing Mr. Bush's plan to send more troops to Baghdad.

"We are now, as a nation, held hostage to the predictable — and predicted — disarray that has followed," Mr. Webb said, speaking against a backdrop of a United States and Virginia flag on the Capitol's second floor. "The war's costs to our nation have been staggering."

In his speech, which was approved by Democratic Congressional leaders, Mr. Webb also criticized Mr. Bush as presiding over an era of economic injustice.

"It's almost as if we are living in two different countries," Mr. Webb said, noting that corporate profits might be reaching new highs, but that those benefits were reserved for the few. "The middle class of this country — our historic backbone and our best hope for a strong society in the future — is losing its place at the table."

Sending A Clear 'Daddy' Message To The Public (FT)

By Edward Luce In Washington

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

Often referred to as the "Mommy party", the Democratic party's choice of Jim Webb – the newly-elected senator from Virginia – to respond to Tuesday night's annual State of the Union address by President George W. Bush was designed to send a clear "Daddy" message to the public.

A former navy secretary in Ronald Reagan's administration and a veteran of the Vietnam war, Mr Webb holds the ideal credentials to criticise Mr Bush's "escalation" of the Iraq war while insulating the party against any charge of being soft on national security.

"Obviously Jim is a combat veteran who has very strong views on Iraq," said Jim Manley, spokesman for Harry Reid, the Democratic Senate majority leader. "During the [November mid-term] election campaign Jim spoke from the heart against the war and captured the mood of the American public."

DOJ_NMG_0120776

So strongly does Mr Webb feel about the Iraq war that he refused last month to have his picture taken alongside Mr Bush in the White House. The two also had a testy exchange when the president asked about Mr Webb's son, who is serving as a marine in Iraq.

Mr Webb said that he wanted to bring the soldiers home. "That's not what I asked you. How's your boy?" Mr Bush asked again. "That's between me and my boy," the senator shot back.

Mr Webb was criticised by some for his alleged discourtesy to the president. But others felt the exchange reflected what they most admired in the freshman senator – a reputation for plain-speaking and strong convictions.

Tuesday night's short speech by Mr Webb, seen by the FT beforehand, also focused on the other key issue that motivates the senator and many of the new intake of Democratic lawmakers from last November's congressional election victory.

In addition to his opposition to the Iraq war, Mr Webb based his election campaign on a platform of "economic fairness" couched in a language of suspicion of free trade and globalisation.

The 60-year-old self-described "Scots-Irish", whose wife, Hong Le, is Vietnamese, has railed against the "internationalisation of corporate America" and identified what he describes as a "growing class divide" in the US.

This month, he said Mr Bush should spend money on rebuilding New Orleans and other parts of the south damaged by Hurricane Katrina in 2005 rather than "wasting billions on Iraq".

Democratic strategists say the choice of Mr Webb was also intended to send a strong signal about the party's economic agenda in the 110th Congress. This is likely to include proposals to expand healthcare coverage to the 47m Americans who are uninsured, new tax breaks for the middle classes and a much tighter rein on the president's scope to pursue trade agreements with developing countries.

"The Democratic party's economic fairness agenda is something you will see evidence of in the committee hearings and debates on Capitol Hill over the next weeks and months," said J.B. Poersch, head of the Democratic Senate campaign committee. "It is something Jim Webb is very well qualified to symbolise."

As is virtually obligatory in Washington, Mr Webb also spoke on Tuesday night about the need for bipartisan co-operation. Mr Bush, who used similar sentiments, desperately needs to create a new "era of bipartisanship" on Capitol Hill to give the White House a chance of pushing through what remains of the president's relatively ambitious agenda.

In order to do so, however, Mr Bush will have to win over people like Mr Webb who, in spite of being a prize-winning novelist, is not easily impressed by high-sounding words.

Attorney General Skips Speech (AP)

ASSOCIATED PRESS

AP, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON (AP) - Attorney General Alberto Gonzales stayed away from the Capitol Tuesday night in case of a catastrophic attack or accident as President Bush delivered his sixth State of the Union address.

By long-standing tradition, a member of the president's Cabinet misses the speech to Congress as a precaution against the entire administration's being wiped out and to maintain the presidential line of succession. Last year, Veterans Affairs Secretary Jim Nicholson did not attend.

The State of the Union address typically draws most members of both congressional houses and other top government officials, including Vice President Dick Cheney, who is also the president of the Senate.

Using specious reasoning, Bush administration pushes out several veteran prosecutors

DOJ_NMG_0120777

Daniel Bogden, the U.S. attorney for Nevada, resigned last week, a victim of a Bush administration housecleaning. At least seven U.S. attorneys, most from the West, have been forced to resign, but no one will say why - not Bogden, not the Justice Department, not Sen. John Ensign, R-Nev., who was briefed by the Justice Department.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales told the Senate Judiciary Committee last week that it was simply good management, so he could get the "very best" people into office.

That strikes us as odd because those fired had done fairly well. Bogden, a well-respected career prosecutor confirmed by the Senate in October 2001, oversaw the successful prosecution of the G-sting political corruption case, as well as prosecutions that put more than 40 members of the violent Rolling 60s Crips gang in federal prison. Others fired include the U.S. attorney in San Francisco, who was leading the probe into steroid use among professional athletes, and the U.S. attorney in San Diego, who oversaw the successful political corruption prosecution of former Republican Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham.

Democrats wonder if the Bush administration is trying to use a provision in the Patriot Act that lets the president appoint an "interim" U.S. attorney without Senate approval. Gonzales denies the claim, but we note that one of the fired prosecutors was replaced with 38-year-old Tim Griffin, a former deputy to White House political guru Karl Rove, who would have little chance to survive confirmation in the Democratic-controlled Senate. A Justice Department press release said Griffin would serve "under an Attorney General appointment" as interim U.S. attorney.

While nominated by the president, U.S. attorneys have, once confirmed, traditionally been insulated from much political pressure. The sudden dismissal of these U.S. attorneys smacks of White House meddling. The justice system and the public deserve much better, starting with the truth.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Broadcom Restates $2.22 Billion, Blames Former Chief (Update3) (BLOOM)

By Peter J. Brennan

Bloomberg, January 24, 2007

Jan. 23 (Bloomberg) -- Broadcom Corp., a maker of chips for consumer devices, restated financial results to reflect $2.2 billion in costs for misdated stock-option grants, a problem the company blamed on former Chief Executive Officer Henry Nicholas.

Nicholas ``bears significant responsibility for the lack of adequate controls" in granting options, Irvine, California-based Broadcom said in a regulatory filing with the U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission. The filing also placed blame on former Chief Financial Officer William Ruehle and former Vice President of Human Resources Nancy Tullos.

Henry Samueli, who co-founded Broadcom with Nicholas and is still chairman and chief technical officer, ``reasonably relied" on outside experts when granting options, the filing said. Broadcom is being investigated by both the SEC and the U.S. Justice Department.

``It makes sense because Henry Nicholas was very much in charge of the company during his tenure," Stifel Nicolaus & Co. analyst Cody Acree said about the blame being placed on Nicholas. ``He was iconic in the industry, and he was Broadcom. Henry Samueli has always been more on the engineering side."

Broadcom restated its financial results for 1998 to 2005 and said the costs were noncash. ``Substantially all" of the extra costs were recorded in the periods before 2004, the company said.

Shares of Broadcom fell 20 cents to $29.46 at 4:20 p.m. in Nasdaq Stock Market trading and have dropped 8.8 percent this year.

Lawyer's Response

The stock options ``in hindsight should have been accounted for differently," Nicholas's attorney, John Spiegel, said in an e-mail. He said Broadcom didn't find Nicholas had benefited from the backdated options and didn't ``knowingly" engage in selecting grant dates after the fact.

DOJ_NMG_0120778

Ruehle, who was CFO for almost 10 years before resigning in September, forfeited $32.8 million in stock options, the filing said. He personally benefited from the backdating, it said. The company spent $5.2 million buying back Ruehle's shares that were granted before it went public in 1998.

Ruehle ``was at the center of the flawed option-granting process," the filing said. ``There is substantial evidence he engaged in the selection of grant dates after the fact."

Broadcom terminated more than $4 million of options of Tullos, who resigned in 2003, the filing said. Ruehle, Nicholas and Tullos didn't agree to be interviewed during the investigation, the filing said.

Former High Flier

Broadcom was a high-flying company with expensive Italian Lamborghini sports cars dotting the parking lot when the stock price rose to split-adjusted $183.17 in August 2000. The company used stock options as a way to attract talented engineers. Its stock price fell as low as $6.47 cents in October 2002.

Nicholas resigned in January 2003, citing marital problems. Broadcom hired Scott McGregor as CEO in January 2005. Both McGregor and acting CFO Bruce Kiddoo can certify the company's financial records, Broadcom said.

The company makes chips for consumer electronics such as television set-top boxes, Apple Computer Inc.'s video iPod and Nintendo Co.'s Wii game console.

Broadcom in July originally estimated the stock-option costs at $750 million. In September it said the expenses would be more than $1.5 billion. The costs don't affect the company's cash position or reported revenue in prior years.

``The bigger benefit is that there is some finality to this," Acree said. ``We've had management changes and now restatements. The management can now focus on the fundamentals."

Broadcom Co-Founder Nicholas Faces Much Of Backdating Onus (WSJ)

By Charles Forelle And James Bandler

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

Broadcom Corp. said Henry T. Nicholas III, its billionaire co-founder, bears responsibility for much of the stock-option backdating that occurred at the chip maker, which restated years of financial results and recorded $2.24 billion in extra expenses.

In restated securities filings made yesterday, Broadcom said it had slapdash options-granting procedures from its 1998 initial public offering through May 2003 that permitted the abuses, pointing to a "lack of adequate controls" thanks to the "tone and style of doing business" that Mr. Nicholas set.

The company noted 68 instances in which it couldn't find contemporaneous paperwork to document grant-approval meetings, and 18 cases when grant dates were selected after the fact. The restatement is the largest of any company of those forced to admit to errors or malfeasance in the options scandal. Broadcom's figure eclipses the up to $1.7 billion in charges insurer UnitedHealth Group Inc. has said it expects to take. Broadcom's disclosure may draw fresh attention to the role of Mr. Nicholas.

Broadcom said its evidence indicates Mr. Nicholas, who didn't receive any tainted options himself, was "at times involved with the selection of grant dates after the fact," noting he sought advice from William Ruehle, the longtime finance chief who left last year. Broadcom said there is "substantial evidence" Mr. Ruehle was involved in the backdating. Broadcom said the charges totaled $2.69 billion from 1998 through the first quarter of 2006; after adjusting for taxes and nearly $400 million of options forfeited because of employee terminations, the figure is $2.24 billion, the company said.

John W. Spiegel, attorney for Mr. Nicholas, said that the heady growth at Broadcom under Mr. Nichlolas' tenure and the high level of employee stock ownership resulted in "stock-option grants that in hindsight should have been accounted for differently." But Mr. Spiegel said the audit committee found that Mr. Nicholas "did not personally benefit, did not knowingly engage in selecting grant dates after the fact, and sought advice from appropriate persons regarding the process for option grants."

Mr. Ruehle's lawyer, Robert Feldman, said the Broadcom matter was less serious than that at the other companies under federal investigation. He said the board review "found no evidence of falsification or forgery -- conduct which is being found at many other companies." Mr. Feldman said the Broadcom case was distinguished "only by the size of the restatement, which relates not to the nature of the conduct, but to the volatility and number of shares."

A Nicholas family trust controls about 30% of Broadcom's voting power, according to the company's most recent proxy statement. The Irvine, Calif., company said 232.9 million options -- largely granted to nonexecutive employees -- bore faulty dates. Accounting rules in place at the time of the grants required companies to record charges for discount options -- those whose strike price was below the stock's market value at the time the grant was made. In Broadcom's case, some of the discounts were enormous -- due, in part, to the stock's volatility during the tech boom. That helped account for the size of the restatements. The company has said one grant, purportedly made on the day the stock hit its quarterly low in May 2000, was finalized later that year. By midsummer, Broadcom's shares had risen more than $100.

In addition to citing the roles of Messrs. Nicholas and Ruehle, Broadcom said a former human-resources executive, Nancy Tullos, "bears significant responsibility" for the options troubles. The company said it found evidence Ms. Tullos "was fully aware of what was occurring, and encouraged, assisted in and enabled it," though it didn't find she participated in choosing the dates.

Ms. Tullos' attorney, Ismail "Izzy" Ramsey, said, "Ms. Tullos is neither an accountant nor a lawyer. And, as the company acknowledged, she didn't select any of the favorable grant dates. As an HR executive, everything Nancy did to assist in processing option grants was directed and approved by her superiors and other professionals... And, in every instance, she did what everyone thought was in the best interests of Broadcom and its employees." Broadcom said Ms. Tullos, who left in 2003, still held options last month valued at more than $4 million. It terminated those options, along with $32 million of options held by Mr. Ruehle.

N.Y. Pension Fund To Lead Lawsuit Over Apple Options (WP/AP)

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

SAN JOSE -- A New York pension system will be the lead plaintiff in a shareholders lawsuit accusing Apple of illegally backdating stock options.

The New York City Employees' Retirement System was named the primary plaintiff in the lawsuit Friday by U.S. District Judge Jeremy D. Fogel, according to Grant & Eisenhofer, the law firm representing the group.

The system, which manages about $89 billion in retirement assets for more than 200,000 municipal employees, owns about 1 million shares of Apple stock. The plaintiffs are seeking class-action status for their case and want damages in connection with what they allege were illegally backdated stock options.

Fogel is also hearing a separate but similar securities case that consolidates a number of civil complaints about Apple's stock-options accounting. Apple has not yet responded to either case.

Federal prosecutors are investigating Apple's past stock-options practices, including a specific stock option award to chief executive Steve Jobs. Federal investigators last week questioned Jobs about the company's backdating practices.

Apple said its internal investigation cleared Jobs and other current management of wrongdoing.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Defense Says Libby Was 'Sacrificed' (LAT)

By Richard B. Schmitt

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby feared that White House officials were conspiring to make him the fall guy in the CIA leak scandal to protect political strategist Karl Rove, Libby's lawyer argued Tuesday.

In his opening remarks at Libby's perjury and obstruction trial, defense attorney Theodore Wells Jr. portrayed the former vice presidential aide as a sympathetic figure who was following his boss' orders to rebut an administration critic.

But Wells said Libby came to believe that he had lost the support of the administration he had sought to defend.

"Karl Rove was President Bush's right-hand person in terms of political strategy. Karl Rove was the person most responsible that the Republican Party stayed in office. His fate was important to the Republican Party. He had to be protected," Wells said.

DOJ_NMG_0120780

"The person who was to be sacrificed, that's Scooter Libby," Wells said. "The person whose neck had been put in the meat grinder, you'll learn, was Scooter Libby."

Vice President Dick Cheney was concerned that his chief of staff might be unjustly tarred, Wells said, producing an excerpt from a note handwritten by Cheney: "Not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others."

Special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald offered a sharply different portrait of the defendant, saying that Libby had obstructed the search for the truth to protect his boss. Fitzgerald said Libby assiduously gathered information about an outspoken critic of the administration's Iraq policy, former envoy Joseph C. Wilson IV, and his wife, Valerie Plame, from various officials and then discussed the findings with journalists in a series of conversations.

Libby is charged with five counts of perjury and obstruction of justice in connection with his descriptions of those conversations to FBI agents and a federal grand jury. The trial is expected to last up to six weeks and promises testimony from Cheney and such high-profile journalists as Judith Miller, then a reporter for the New York Times; "Meet the Press" moderator Tim Russert of NBC News; and Matthew Cooper, then of Time magazine.

The defense suggestion of a high-level conspiracy, made on the opening day of the trial, was the first indication of a breach within the normally secretive White House over the handling of a case that had cast a legal and political cloud over the Bush administration for three years.

Wells did not identify the officials who might have been involved. But he set the stage for a broad attack on some witnesses the government plans to call, saying they were not credible.

One of them, former White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer, had initially asserted his 5th Amendment right against self-incrimination in the case and had agreed to cooperate with federal investigators only after being granted immunity, Wells said. He also indicated that he plans to challenge the testimony of three journalists who are key to the government case.

The investigation that resulted in Libby's indictment grew out of the revelation by syndicated columnist Robert Novak on July 14, 2003, that Plame worked for the CIA. Eight days earlier, the New York Times had published an op-ed article by Wilson accusing Bush of misleading the public in his 2003 State of the Union address.

Bush had asserted that then-Iraqi President Saddam Hussein had sought nuclear material in Africa — a contention Wilson had investigated for the CIA in 2002 and rejected.

Novak's column disclosed that "Wilson's wife" worked for the CIA on weapons of mass destruction. It suggested that Wilson's 2002 trip to Africa was due to nepotism, calling into question the credibility of his findings.

In July, Novak revealed Rove was one of the "administration sources" who confirmed Plame worked at the CIA but added he did not initially learn about her from Rove. No charges have been filed against Bush's top political aide. Libby has denied giving information about Plame to the journalists, but the journalists say he did exactly that.

Disclosing the identity of a covert agent can be a felony under federal law. But Libby did not know, Wells said, that Plame had worked undercover, and he considered her a footnote in a broader dispute with her husband.

Wells foreshadowed his defense Tuesday with a sympathetic portrayal of Libby as an influential Cheney loyalist who, on the command of his boss, took on an effort to talk with reporters to rebut allegations by Wilson that the administration had twisted prewar intelligence.

He conceded the possibility that his client may have not told the truth to investigators but said it was not deliberate. Rather, he said, it was because Libby was preoccupied with such weighty matters as a daily stream of terrorism threats, rumors of presidential assassination plots, and nuclear proliferation in North Korea and Iran.

"There will be no witness who takes that stand during this trial who takes the oath [and] swears to God and says, 'I know Scooter Libby lied,' " Wells said, adding: "This is a weak, paper-thin circumstantial evidence case about 'he said, she said.' "

Fitzgerald recounted to the jury how Wilson's column in the New York Times reverberated in the White House the day it was published.

"It's Sunday, July 6, 2003, the last day of a three-day Fourth of July weekend," Fitzgerald began. "Sunday, the fireworks are over, but a different kind of fireworks are about to begin."

DOJ_NMG_0120781

Wilson had "leveled a direct attack on the White House's credibility and an attack on the vice president in particular," Fitzgerald said. The White House was "stunned," he said. "But then the White House began to push back" with Libby in the lead. In the crossfire, Fitzgerald said, "Wilson's wife got dragged in."

Fitzgerald said that the defense Libby has offered — that he did not deliberately lie — was not credible.

He cited as proof the events of the week after Wilson's column was published.

Libby allegedly revealed the identity of Plame in hushed tones over lunch to press chief Fleischer on Monday and shared that fact in a conversation with the New York Times' Miller the next day. But he testified before a grand jury that on Thursday, he was surprised to hear in a conversation with Russert that Plame worked for the CIA.

"You can't learn something startling on Thursday that you are giving out on Monday and Tuesday," Fitzgerald said.

Wells replied that he intended to test the credibility of some of those journalists. He said that Cooper had no notes showing that Libby had shared information with him about Plame, and that Miller had an acknowledged memory problem.

"Tim Russert is a great reporter, but he is a human being," Wells said. Libby had told investigators that he learned the identity of Plame from Russert. But Russert denied giving Libby that information.

Wells said Russert may have been the one who did not remember the conversation with Libby correctly.

The lawyer said that another NBC newsman, White House correspondent David Gregory, learned that Plame worked at the CIA from Fleischer while the two were on a presidential trip to Africa.

Gregory learned about Plame just hours before Russert spoke with Libby and conceivably could have passed along the information to Russert, Wells said. That would mean Russert could have told Libby about Plame, as Libby contends.

"Tim Russert had a deal. He had a deal with the government whereby he would only be questioned about his conversation with Scooter Libby, and he could not be questioned about anything else," Wells said. "So Mr. Russert was not required to answer questions about David Gregory…. We will explore that deal when Mr. Russert comes to court."

Liar Or 'Scapegoat'? 2 Depictions Of Libby As Trial Opens (USAT)

By Richard Willing

USA Today, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — Vice presidential adviser Lewis "Scooter" Libby repeatedly lied to FBI agents and grand jurors to impede a politically embarrassing investigation into how and why a CIA officer's classified identity was leaked to reporters in 2003, a federal prosecutor charged Tuesday.

"This is not a case about bad memory; this is not a case about forgetfulness," prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald said in his opening statement in Libby's trial.

Libby's attorney, Theodore Wells, attacked that argument. He said the case against Libby is weak and circumstantial. Wells said Libby is being made a "scapegoat" for White House political adviser Karl Rove. It was Rove, not Libby, the lawyer said, who identified CIA covert officer Valerie Plame in a phone call with a reporter.

When the White House press secretary said Rove was not involved in the leak but later refused to clear Libby, Wells said, Libby sought Vice President Cheney's help. " 'They're trying to set me up. They want me to be the sacrificial lamb,' " Wells said, describing Libby's part of the conversation. " 'I will not be sacrificed so Karl Rove can be protected.' "

"Libby was an important staffer," Wells said. "But Karl Rove was the lifeblood of the Republican Party."

Libby has not been charged with leaking classified information, Wells noted. "He had no motive to lie because he had done nothing wrong," Wells said.

Libby, 56, Cheney's former chief of staff and national security adviser, is charged with one count of obstruction and four counts of lying to FBI agents and a federal grand jury investigating how Plame's identity was leaked to reporters.

During his opening statement, prosecutor Fitzgerald said Libby leaked Plame's identity as part of a Bush administration plan to discredit her husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson. Eight days before Plame was identified in print as a CIA officer, Wilson alleged in a New York Times column that the Bush administration had twisted some intelligence reports "to exaggerate the Iraqi threat" in leading the country to war. A year earlier, Wilson had been sent to Africa to explore reports that Iraq had tried to buy uranium from Niger. He found the reports groundless.

No one was charged with disclosing Plame's identity. Identifying a covert CIA officer can be a crime, if it is done with knowledge that the officer's status is classified.

The story of Plame's "outing" and the investigation that led to Libby's indictment in 2005 riveted political circles for more than two years. That drama, Fitzgerald said Tuesday, was not part of his case. Instead, he said, he had a "narrow focus" on Libby's alleged lies.

Fitzgerald told jurors that Libby learned of Plame's CIA job from Cheney, then from two other CIA employees, from a State Department official and from a Cheney spokesman in June or early July 2003, before Libby passed the information to two news reporters. Matt Cooper, formerly of Time magazine, and Judith Miller, formerly of The New York Times, are to testify for the prosecution.

Fitzgerald said Libby played a key role in helping Cheney deflect criticism beginning in July 2003 that he was responsible for "twisting intelligence" to suggest that Iraq was in the process of acquiring uranium, possibly for a nuclear weapon.

Wells, by contrast, continually invoked the political atmosphere of summer and early fall 2003, the time that gave rise to the leaks and investigation. He said that Libby, distracted by al-Qaeda and other national security issues, only reluctantly agreed to talk to reporters to defend Cheney against allegations of manipulating intelligence.

Libby Portrayed As 'Sacrificial Lamb' At Trial (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

The defense in the CIA leak trial of I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby Jr. charged yesterday that senior White House officials sought to protect political strategist Karl Rove by making the former vice presidential chief of staff a "sacrificial lamb."

During opening arguments in Mr. Libby's perjury trial, the only criminal case to emerge from a three-year investigation into the 2003 leak of a CIA operative's identity, attorney Theodore Wells said the White House quickly cleared Mr. Rove of wrongdoing but did not seek to exonerate the vice presidential aide.

"They're trying to set me up. They want me to be the sacrificial lamb," Mr. Wells said, recalling a conversation between Mr. Libby and Mr. Cheney shortly after the story became public. "I will not be sacrificed so Karl Rove can be protected."

Mr. Wells also sought to portray Mr. Libby, who faces 30 years in prison if convicted on five counts of lying to FBI agents, as incredibly busy, so busy that he forgot when and how he learned the identity of CIA employee Valerie Plame, the wife of a former ambassador who had been critical of the administration's Iraq invasion.

"He spends his day trying to connect the dots to be sure we don't have another 9/11," Mr. Wells said.

But special prosecutor Patrick J. Fitzgerald said in the government's opening argument that Mr. Libby consciously lied.

"When the FBI and grand jury asked about what the defendant did," Mr. Fitzgerald said, "he made up a story. ... This isn't a case about having a bad memory; having a bad memory is not a crime. He knowingly and intentionally lied."

The trial is the culmination of a saga that stretches back to July 2003, when former U.S. Ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV accused the Bush administration of exaggerating the threat posed by Iraq to justify the invasion of Iraq. Mr. Wilson labeled as a lie Mr. Bush's claim that Iraq had sought uranium yellowcake from Africa.

The prosecutor said that in the days before syndicated columnist Robert Novak revealed that Mrs. Plame was married to Mr. Wilson, Mr. Libby learned her identity from at least five persons -- from his boss to members of the CIA and State Department.

Mr. Libby revealed her identity to at least three reporters, but later testified that he had actually learned her identity from them, Mr. Fitzgerald said.

Mr. Wells countered that Mr. Libby was too busy dealing with the world's most serious crises and simply couldn't recall "three phone calls, three reporters, three months later."

The defense attorney said Mr. Cheney shared Mr. Libby's concern that he was being set up to take the fall in an effort to protect Mr. Rove.

DOJ_NMG_0120783

"Not going to protect one staffer and sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder," Mr. Cheney's notes from the meeting said, according to Mr. Wells. He added that it was clear the White House wanted to protect Mr. Rove, the architect of both Bush wins in 2000 and 2004 and the 2002 mid-term upset.

Mr. Cheney is expected to testify in the trial, making him the first sitting vice president to take the stand in a criminal case. The proceedings are expected to take four to six weeks.

Defense Portrays Libby As Scapegoat (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Carol D. Leonnig

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby was "put through the meat grinder" by the White House shortly after the Iraq war began, scapegoated to conceal the fact that Karl Rove, the president's top political adviser, helped disclose an undercover CIA officer's identity, a defense attorney contended yesterday as Libby's perjury trial began.

The lawyer, Theodore V. Wells Jr., and Special Counsel Patrick J. Fitzgerald agreed that Vice President Cheney ordered Libby, then his chief of staff, to contact reporters early in the summer of 2003 in an effort to rebut criticism that the administration had selectively used intelligence to justify the invasion of Iraq.

According to Wells, the confidential conversations Libby had with several well-known journalists were not intended to spread the identity of Valerie Plame, the covert CIA officer. Instead, Libby's attorney said, he was acting at Cheney's instructions to respond to allegations that the vice president withheld information that would have raised doubts about whether Iraq was trying to develop weapons of mass destruction.

The dramatic opening statements in the first hours of the celebrated trial laid bare fissures deep inside the White House. They came as the prosecution and defense provided the jury crackling portrayals of their opposing theories of the case.

The two sides' accounts exposed jurors to handwritten notes by Cheney, the internal culture of major newsrooms, a tape recording of Libby speaking to grand jurors and a White House under fire as its justification for war was beginning to unravel.

Libby, 56, is accused of five felony charges stemming from a federal investigation into the leak of Plame's identity to the media. Libby is not charged with the leak itself, nor is anyone else. He faces two counts of making false statements to FBI agents, two counts of perjuring himself before a grand jury and one count of obstructing the investigation, and he has pleaded not guilty to all charges.

"How could we reach a point where the chief of staff for the vice president was repeatedly lying to federal investigators?" Fitzgerald asked jurors rhetorically. "That's what this case is all about."

During an hour-long opening statement that started the trial, the prosecutor painted for the jury what he called "a firestorm" inside the White House on the final day of the July 4, 2003, holiday weekend, when an op-ed article by Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph C. Wilson IV, attacked the administration. Wilson, who had been sent to Niger by the CIA to determine whether Iraq was seeking uranium for its nuclear weapons program, said the president and his aides "may have twisted the intelligence" concerning whether Iraq was seeking weapons of mass destruction.

Libby told investigators that at one point he was surprised to learn from NBC's Tim Russert in July 2003 that Wilson was married to Plame. But Fitzgerald contended that Libby, at Cheney's direction, had been actively telling people about Wilson at the same time.

He said Libby's claim to a grand jury that he simply had forgotten what he knew was implausible, because he had passed on Plame's name to reporters and then-White House press secretary Ari Fleischer days before speaking with Russert.

"You can't learn something startling on Thursday that you're giving out Monday and Tuesday of the same week," Fitzgerald said. "Day after day after day after day, he focused on this controversy."

Wells, the defense attorney, countered that "this is a weak, paper-thin, circumstantial evidence case about he-said, she-said."

Wells asserted that the vice president's former right-hand man gave investigators his "good-faith recollection" and that any mistakes in his memory were innocent. He also contended that the journalists and administration officials who are to testify during the trial also have imperfect memories. He said that Libby did not aggressively push the Wilson story, did not know that Plame worked in a covert role and had no motive to lie to investigators.

According to Wells, when the federal investigation of the leak began in the fall of 2003, Libby was not worried about his job, but was "concerned about . . . being scapegoated." Scott McClellan, the White House press secretary at the time, said publicly that Rove was not responsible for any leaks, Wells said, but did not say the same about Libby.

Libby, Wells said, told Cheney he feared "people in the White House are trying to set me up." Wells then showed the jury the text of a note Cheney had jotted that said: "Not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others."

Wells said: "That one person was Karl Rove. He was viewed as a political genius. . . . He had to be protected. The person who was to be sacrificed was Scooter Libby." According to Wells, the vice president tried to persuade White House colleagues to publicly clear Libby's name as the source of the leak.

Plame's name first appeared in a July 14 column by Robert D. Novak. Rove and Richard L. Armitage, then the deputy secretary of state, have acknowledged being Novak's sources for the story.

Wells did not make it clear how the White House's handling of Libby's role influenced what he later told the FBI and grand jury. But the attorney said the "meat grinder" Libby was put through meant he took on the extra task of having brief conversations with reporters while carrying out his "day job" dealing with crucial national security matters.

Asked about the defense's portrayal, White House spokeswoman Dana M. Perino said yesterday: "We are not commenting on an ongoing criminal matter."

Both sides yesterday provided small pieces of new information about the events leading to Libby's indictment.

Fitzgerald disclosed, for instance, that Libby had underlined his own copy of Wilson's op-ed piece. Fitzgerald also identified a CIA employee Libby asked about Wilson as Craig Schmall.

Late in the afternoon, the prosecution's first witness, Marc Grossman, a former undersecretary of state, testified that Libby had asked him in late May 2003 to look into Wilson's CIA-sponsored trip to Niger to investigate the uranium claim. Grossman said he spoke to Wilson and learned that his wife worked at the CIA and had appeared to help arrange the trip.

"I thought the whole business was of less than zero importance," Grossman testified. "I thought the wife was an interesting tidbit, though."

Libby Defense Portrays Client As A Scapegoat (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 — I. Lewis Libby Jr., the vice president's former chief of staff, was made a scapegoat by White House officials to protect the president's longtime political adviser, Karl Rove, Mr. Libby's lawyer asserted in his opening statement on Tuesday.

The unexpected assertion may foreshadow an effort to put distance between Mr. Libby and the administration.

The statement by the lawyer, Theodore V. Wells Jr., was the first indication that Mr. Libby, who is facing five felony counts of lying to investigators, would seek to deflect some of the blame onto his former White House colleagues.

Mr. Wells did not, however, fully explain the connection between an effort to protect Mr. Rove and the actions that led to Mr. Libby's indictment. It was also the first sign that there had been fighting within the Bush administration over the C.I.A. leak investigation.

Until Tuesday, Mr. Libby's defense on perjury and obstruction of justice charges was that he might simply have remembered incorrectly events he had described to a grand jury and to F.B.I. agents. But Mr. Wells told the jury that White House officials, whom he did not name, wanted to protect Mr. Rove because they believed his survival as President Bush's chief political adviser was crucial to the health of the Republican Party.

Mr. Wells said that his client was innocent and that a decision was made that "Scooter Libby was to be sacrificed," referring to Mr. Libby by his nickname. It was important to keep Mr. Rove out of trouble, Mr. Wells said, because he was Mr. Bush's right-hand man and "was most responsible for seeing the Republican Party stayed in office."

DOJ_NMG_0120785

"He had to be protected," Mr. Wells said.

Mr. Rove, who has not been charged, has acknowledged having been a source for a July 14, 2003, column by Robert D. Novak that first disclosed the identity of Valerie Wilson, who was known by her maiden name, Valerie Plame, as a Central Intelligence Agency officer. The disclosure led to the investigation resulting in Mr. Libby's indictment.

Mr. Wells's remarks followed the opening statement of the chief prosecutor, Patrick J. Fitzgerald, who told the jury that the evidence was clear that Mr. Libby had knowingly lied under oath about his conversations with three reporters about Ms. Wilson. Mr. Fitzgerald provided his own dramatic moment of the day when he played audiotapes of Mr. Libby's grand jury testimony in March 2004.

Before doing so, Mr. Fitzgerald meticulously laid the groundwork for his case that Mr. Libby had lied during those appearances. He first presented charts showing that Mr. Libby learned about Ms. Wilson in conversations with several fellow administration officials in June and early July 2003, and that he talked to reporters and other administration officials about her identity in that period.

Jurors then listened as Mr. Libby's voice wafted through the courtroom while he sat silently at the defense table. Mr. Libby was heard to say that he believed he first learned about Ms. Wilson in a conversation with Tim Russert of NBC on Thursday, July 10. Mr. Libby also told the grand jury that he had been taken aback by Mr. Russert's information.

"You can't be startled about something on Thursday that you told other people about on Monday and Tuesday," Mr. Fitzgerald said, referring to conversations Mr. Libby had only days before.

Further, he said, Mr. Russert will testify that his July 10 telephone conversation with Mr. Libby did not include any mention of Ms. Wilson. Mr. Libby, he said, had telephoned instead to complain about a talk show on the network.

"The evidence will show the conversation he claims took place about Wilson's wife never happened," Mr. Fitzgerald said. "And even if it did happen, he couldn't have been surprised."

Mr. Libby is charged with five felony accounts of lying to the grand jury and to officials of the Federal Bureau of Investigation who were investigating the leak of Ms. Wilson's name to Mr. Novak.

Ms. Wilson's identity was disclosed just days after her husband, Joseph C. Wilson IV, a former ambassador, wrote an Op-Ed article in The New York Times asserting that the Bush administration, to build its case for war, had distorted intelligence about Iraqi efforts to obtain uranium in Africa.

Mr. Libby had testified that he did not discuss Ms. Wilson's identity with Judith Miller, a former reporter for The Times, or with Matthew Cooper of Time magazine. Ms. Miller and Mr. Cooper testified that Mr. Libby did, in fact, discuss Ms. Wilson with them.

In the trial's opening day, Mr. Fitzgerald's task was to keep the issue before the jury simple: were Mr. Libby's statements about his conversations with reporters true? To that end, he spoke for only about an hour in outlining his case.

The mission of Mr. Wells, in contrast, was to present the case as hopelessly complicated, thus leaving the jurors in doubt about the validity of the charges. Mr. Wells spoke for nearly two and a half hours, ranging over issues of the reliability of memory; Mr. Libby's duties, which during the relevant period included crises in Liberia and Turkey; and threats from Al Qaeda on the days that Mr. Libby spoke to reporters.

But his most startling comment was his assertion that Mr. Libby had become enmeshed in legal difficulty because of White House efforts to protect Mr. Rove.

If Mr. Libby and his lawyers press their strategy of blaming the White House, it could prove risky, possibly even jeopardizing chances of a presidential pardon for Mr. Libby if he is convicted.

Mr. Libby, Mr. Wells said, complained to Vice President Dick Cheney that he was being set up as a fall guy. Mr. Cheney supported that view, Mr. Wells said, and handwrote a note saying, "Not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy who was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others."

This incident appears to have occurred in fall 2003, when Mr. Libby was troubled that Scott McClellan, then the White House press secretary, had publicly said that Mr. Rove had not been involved in the leak but had initially declined to do the same for Mr. Libby and others in the administration. At that time, Mr. Rove had a major role in guiding Mr. Bush's re-election campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0120786

Interpreting the vice president's note, Mr. Wells said that "incompetence" was a reference to the fact that the C.I.A. had mistakenly allowed the White House to use inaccurate information in Mr. Bush's 2003 State of the Union speech about Iraq's efforts to obtain uranium in Africa. The staff official whom the vice president believed should not be protected, he said, was Mr. Rove. Mr. Libby had been assigned to speak to reporters to straighten out the confusion from Mr. Bush's speech, a chore Mr. Cheney likened to sticking his head in the meat grinder.

Mr. Wells did not, however, make it clear how the efforts to shield Mr. Rove had caused Mr. Libby to become embroiled in the issue, though he suggested that the attention paid to the disclosure of Ms. Wilson's name had obliged Mr. Libby to engage in the perilous task of talking to reporters.

Mr. Wells noted that, in his grand jury appearances and in interviews with the F.B.I., Mr. Libby had also said that he first learned of Ms. Wilson's identity from Mr. Cheney.

The charges against Mr. Libby, Mr. Wells said, amounted to "a weak, paper-thin circumstantial case about 'he said-she said.' "

'Scapegoat:' Scooter's Stunning Defense (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff, Newsweek

Newsweek, January 24, 2007

A bombshell detonates on day one of the Libby perjury trial, as Cheney's longtime aide points the finger at Karl Rove

It was the last thing the White House needed at a time when President Bush is already on the defensive over Iraq: a circular firing squad in a federal courtroom in which the president's men—and Vice President Dick Cheney's—are all shooting at each other.

But that's how the perjury trial of I. Lewis (Scooter) Libby, Cheney's former chief of staff, began. Libby's long-awaited defense was laid out for the first time Tuesday in opening statements and it turned out to be a stunner: a "scorched earth" strategy in which his main defense lawyer pointed accusatory fingers at White House deputy chief of staff Karl Rove as well as other top current and former Bush aides.

Almost no legal experts had expected this plan of attack in the trial, the outcome of a drawn-out investigation into who leaked the identity of Valerie Plame, a CIA operative, to the media. According to chief prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald, the leak occured amid an effort by Bush administration officials to discredit Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, who had publicly cast doubt on the administration's case for war against Iraq. The FBI began an investigation after newspaper columnist Robert Novak exposed Plame's identity in 2003. Libby is accused of obstructing the probe and lying to investigators. Neither of the two men later identified as the sources for Novak's column, Rove or former deputy secretary of State Richard Armitage, was charged in the case.

Libby, it was widely thought by legal experts, was going to be the good soldier. He would play it safe at his trial in order to preserve his options; mainly, if convicted, to seek a presidential pardon before Bush leaves office.

But no sooner did he start his opening statement Tuesday morning than defense lawyer Ted Wells shocked the courtroom and all but tossed the "pardon strategy" out the window. Seeking to rebut Fitzgerald's contention that Libby had lied about his knowledge of Plame's CIA employment in order to save his job with Cheney, Wells shot back: "Mr. Libby was not concerned about losing his job in the Bush administration. He was concerned about being set up, he was concerned about being made the scapegoat."

According to Wells, the chief culprit, or at least the beneficiary of the plot was Rove, described by the defense lawyer as "the president's right hand man," whose survival was essential for the president's re-election. As related by Wells, his client was so worried that Rove's fate was taking priority over his that Libby went to his boss, Cheney, in October 2003 and complained: "I think people in the White House are trying to set me up. People in the White House are trying to protect Karl Rove."

Well's argument was both brilliant and complex-and perhaps difficult for non-news hounds on the jury to follow. But it raised the prospect that the Libby trial will now turn into a horror show for the White House, forcing current and former top aides to testify against each other and revealing an administration that has been in turmoil over the Iraq war for more than three years.

Libby is on trial for relatively narrow charges of perjury and obstruction: that he lied about what and when he knew about Plame's identity, falsely telling the FBI and a federal grand jury that he was told about her work at the CIA from journalists Tim Russert, Judy Miller and Matt Cooper in July 2003.

But Fitzgerald, in his own riveting opening statement, placed Cheney at the center of the case, telling the jurors that when Plame's husband, former ambassador Joseph Wilson, began accusing the White House of twisting intelligence about Iraq, it was the vice president himself who first disclosed Plame's identity to his chief of staff in June 2003. Cheney later intervened with the White House to get then-press secretary Scott McClellan to issue a misleading public statement clearing Libby of any involvement in the leak of Plame's CIA employment to reporters, Fitzgerald asserted.

Wells shot back that it was others at the White House and the State Department—and not just Rove—who were the real leakers. Former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer, Wells asserted for the first time, had gotten immunity from prosecution and then confessed to the FBI that he had personally leaked Plame's status to NBC White House reporter David Gregory. Dan Bartlett, now senior presidential counselor, also learned of Plame's identify and spread the information as well, according to Wells. (And, of course, Wells emphasized, it was then-deputy Secretary of State Armitage who set the whole case in motion by first disclosing Plame's identity to columnist Robert Novak.)

But, Wells contended, it was Rove—the political strategist—who had to be protected at all costs. He was, Wells said, "the lifeblood of the Republican Party" and the man George W. Bush absolutely needed for the coming re-election campaign. Indeed, after McClellan issued a public statement exonerating Rove of any involvement in the leak (a statement that turned out three years later to be false), Cheney and Libby huddled about the matter. McClellan had cleared Rove but at that point had said nothing about Libby, leaving the implication that Libby had leaked but Rove hadn't. Cheney personally wrote a note, an excerpt of which Wells read to the jury and highlighted by displaying on an audio-visual machine during his opening statement: "Not going to protect one staffer and sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others," Cheney's note read.

The translation, according to Wells: The vice president was not going to allow Karl Rove to be protected and Libby to be sacrificed. Libby had stuck his neck "in the meat grinder" because he had been authorized by President Bush himself to talk to reporters and rebut what the White House considered unfair criticism by Wilson that the intelligence about Iraq had been "twisted." And the "incompetence" Cheney was referring to was by the CIA which, he claimed, was responsible for whatever the White House had gotten wrong about Iraq's purported weapons of mass destruction.

The opening statements underscored what many had already suspected: that Cheney—who is slated to be called to testify by the defense—will be a crucial witness in the trial. But Wells' opening statement suggested that it will be more than just the vice president on the hot seat. Rove himself now appears likely to be called (he is on a list of possible witnesses) and forced to testify about how he had disclosed Plame's identity to then-Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper. Bartlett also appears likely to be called, as does Armitage, Fleischer and David Addington, Cheney's current chief of staff.

Libby Asserts He Was The Fall Guy (WSJ)

By Evan Perez

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Lawyers for Lewis "Scooter" Libby, the vice president's former chief of staff on trial for allegedly lying to federal investigators, moved to muddy the prosecution's case by alleging a White House effort to protect Karl Rove and make Mr. Libby the fall guy.

INITIAL SALVOS

• The Situation: Defense lawyers say White House officials trying to protect Karl Rove set up Lewis "Scooter" Libby to take the fall in the CIA-leak controversy.

• The Background: Mr. Libby, former chief of staff to Vice President Cheney, is on trial for allegedly lying to investigators and a grand jury during the leak investigation.

• What's Next: Mr. Libby's attorneys are expected to highlight conflicting witness statements as proof that "recollection problems" are common.

DOJ_NMG_0120788

The defense strategy shows that Mr. Libby is willing to part ways with his former colleagues at the White House. In opening arguments in federal court yesterday, Mr. Libby's attorney alleged that White House officials singled out the former aide to Vice President Cheney to take the blame for leaking the identity of a Central Intelligence Agency operative in an attempt to take the heat off Mr. Rove, President Bush's top political adviser.

As both sides laid out their strategies yesterday in federal court, it became clear that Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald's attempt to simplify a case that ended up far afield from its beginnings as a CIA leak investigation could be hampered by the defense's strategy to put the case in the context of the sharp-elbowed politics of the White House and the Iraq war. The trial is expected to provide a glimpse into the inner workings -- and infighting -- of a White House known for being cohesive and tightly managed. In addition, the strategizing behind the run-up to the Iraq war may get a public airing at the same time as a Democratic-controlled Congress is stepping up its scrutiny of the Bush administration's war policy. A White House spokeswoman declined to comment on the Libby case.

Addressing a jury of nine women and three men, Mr. Fitzgerald gave a one-hour summary of his case, which hinges on testimony and evidence he says show Mr. Libby knowingly deceived agents for the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the grand jury investigating the leak of the identity of former CIA agent Valerie Plame in 2003.

Mr. Fitzgerald told jurors that Mr. Libby was dispatched by Mr. Cheney to counter criticism of the administration from Ms. Plame's husband, former diplomat Joseph Wilson. Mr. Wilson had made a fact-finding trip, sponsored by the Central Intelligence Agency, in 2002 to Niger to investigate claims that Iraq, in a quest for nuclear weapons, had tried to buy yellowcake uranium from the country. Mr. Wilson subsequently contradicted the administration's claims about Iraq's efforts to build a nuclear-weapons program in a New York Times opinion piece and on television.

During Mr. Fitzgerald's investigation, both President Bush and a former White House spokesman said that any administration official found to have leaked the information would be asked to leave. Mr. Rove was among the officials who testified before the grand jury that Mr. Fitzgerald convened. Yesterday, Mr. Rove's attorney, Robert Luskin, declined to comment on opening arguments by Mr. Libby's attorney. Mr. Libby's defense team took jurors through a two-hour version of events that included the charge that Mr. Libby was the victim of a White House effort to make him the "sacrificial lamb" in order to protect Mr. Rove.

Theodore V. Wells Jr., an attorney for Mr. Libby, told jurors that as the Plame controversy exploded, Mr. Libby spoke to Mr. Cheney and expressed concerns that "they want me to be the sacrificial lamb. I will not be sacrificed in order for Karl Rove to be protected." Yesterday, Mr. Wells said that officials set up Mr. Libby to take the fall in the investigation because while he was "an important staffer," Mr. Rove was "the lifeblood of the Republican party."

Mr. Fitzgerald displayed to the jury a detailed timeline listing dates when Mr. Libby talked to reporters and to others in the White House about Ms. Plame. He suggested that Mr. Libby's misstatements to investigators about when he discussed Ms. Plame's identity and with whom weren't about "bad memory" but an effort to mislead investigators because he was afraid he would lose his job. In court yesterday, Mr. Fitzgerald played excerpts of tape recordings of Mr. Libby's testimony before the grand jury. In one segment, Mr. Libby told investigators he was surprised to learn that Ms. Plame worked for the CIA during a conversation believed to have taken place around July 10, 2003, with Tim Russert, host of NBC's "Meet the Press." But, Mr. Fitzgerald said yesterday, Mr. Libby knew of Ms. Plame's status, as he had learned it from others in the administration, including the vice president, and had passed along the information on July 7 to then-White House spokesman Ari Fleischer and on July 8 to Judith Miller, then a New York Times reporter.

Mr. Wells called the government's case "a weak, paper-thin circumstantial-evidence case about 'he said, she said.'" He told jurors to expect testimony from reporters including Mr. Russert and Ms. Miller, but suggested that, like Mr. Libby, they and other witnesses "have recollection problems."

Mr. Wells showed jurors his own timeline, emphasizing how Mr. Libby was asked by investigators about conversations with reporters many months after they occurred. He quoted from a handwritten note by Mr. Cheney, made after a conversation with Mr. Libby about the leak investigation, that read in part: "not going to protect one staffer & sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others."

The person being sacrificed was Mr. Libby and the incompetence was on the part of the CIA, Mr. Wells told jurors.

Libby: White House Wanted To Sacrifice Him For Rove (FINDLAW/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 24, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald described for jurors Tuesday a detailed Bush administration effort to beat back early criticism of the Iraq war and accused former White House aide "Scooter" Libby of covering up his role leaking the identity of a CIA operative.

I. Lewis Libby's attorney countered with a White House effort of his own, one in which Libby was blamed for the leak to protect Bush political adviser Karl Rove's own disclosures.

The investigation began after syndicated columnist Robert Novak revealed that a chief Bush administration critic of Iraq policy, Joseph Wilson, was married to CIA operative Valerie Plame. Rove was one of two sources for Novak's story.

As the trial opened with a preview of each side's position, it was clear that the jury will have to sort through conflicting statements in a high-profile case that has opened a very public window on the behind-the-scenes Washington practice of leaking sensitive information to the news media.

Nobody, including Rove, has been charged with the leak. Libby is accused of lying to investigators and obstructing the probe.

"They're trying to set me up. They want me to be the sacrificial lamb," attorney Theodore Wells said, recalling a conversation between Libby and his boss, Vice President Dick Cheney, as the leak investigation heated up in 2003. "I will not be sacrificed so Karl Rove can be protected."

By putting the focus on Rove, whom Wells referred to as "the lifeblood of the Republican party," Wells sought to cast Libby as someone who was drawn into discussions about Plame only to clear his own reputation. White House officials publicly cleared Rove of wrongdoing but originally stopped short of doing so for Libby.

Using a computerized calendar during opening statement, Fitzgerald cast Libby's actions much differently. Fitzgerald described a tumultuous week in 2003 when he said the White House was under "direct attack" from Wilson.

Fitzgerald said Libby learned from five people - from Cheney to members of the CIA and State Department - that Wilson's wife worked for the CIA. Libby discussed that fact to reporters and others in the White House, Fitzgerald said.

"But when the FBI and grand jury asked about what the defendant did," Fitzgerald said, "he made up a story."

Libby told investigators he learned about Plame from NBC News reporter Tim Russert. But Fitzgerald told jurors that was clearly a lie because Libby had already been discussing the matter inside and outside of the White House.

"You can't learn something on Thursday that you're giving out on Monday," Fitzgerald said.

Libby says he didn't lie but was simply bogged down by national security issues and couldn't remember his conversations with New York Times report Judith Miller, Time magazine reporter Matthew Cooper and Russert.

Opening statements were expected to continue into Tuesday afternoon. The trial is expected to last four to six weeks.

Prosecution Calls Libby A Liar During Opening Arguments (LAW)

By Emma Schwartz, Legal Times

Legal Times, January 24, 2007

During opening arguments Tuesday in the trial of ex-White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby Jr., the prosecution repeatedly fingered Libby as a liar who intentionally misled investigators about how he learned the identity of CIA employee Valerie Plame.

"This is not a case about bad memory," Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald told jurors. "It's about shifting information to reporters away from where he really learned it."

But defense lawyers for Libby accused the White House of making the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney the administration's fall guy for Fitzgerald's leak investigation. Addressing the jury, lawyer Theodore Wells Jr. tried to raise doubts about the memory -- and credibility -- of the government officials and reporters whose testimony is expected to contradict Libby's recollections.

DOJ_NMG_0120790

"It's a classic case of he said, she said, and what two people remember three months later," said Wells, telling the jury that the government's case is based entirely on circumstantial evidence and that no one will take the stand to say Libby lied.

Libby, 56, is charged with five felony counts of false statements, obstruction of justice, and perjury in connection with what he told the FBI and a grand jury about conversations he had with three reporters in 2003. He was the only person charged as a result of Fitzgerald's 2 1/2-year investigation into whether classified information about Plame's CIA employment was illegally leaked to the press.

The arguments came on the eve of President George W. Bush's State of the Union address. It was in that speech, four years ago, that the president suggested Iraq had tried to purchase uranium from Africa. The veracity of that claim later served as the basis for attacks by Plame's husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, on the administration's decision to invade Iraq and allegedly led to a campaign within the White House to discredit Wilson.

Although the trial, expected to last about six weeks, will not answer the question of whether the Bush administration intentionally misled the public about the rationale for invading Iraq, the war hung heavy over Tuesday's arguments.

Over the course of an hour, Fitzgerald laid out the government's case to the jury. By Fitzgerald's account, the timeline of Libby's conversations simply does not add up: How, he asked, could Libby claim that he first learned about Valerie Plame's CIA employment on July 10, 2003, from Tim Russert of NBC's "Meet the Press" when Libby had already had conversations about Wilson's wife with at least six government officials?

According to Fitzgerald's calculation, Libby first learned about Wilson's wife from Cheney on June 11, 2003, and discussed it with multiple government officials in the following days and month. Those officials included Undersecretary of State Marc Grossman; CIA Associate Director Robert Grenier; Cathie Martin, a press secretary for the Office of the Vice President; David Addington, Cheney's chief counsel; CIA briefer Craig Schmall; and former White House press secretary Ari Fleischer.

On July 6, 2003, The New York Times published an opinion piece Wilson wrote questioning the accuracy of the 16 words in the State of the Union speech about Iraq's alleged acquisition of uranium in Niger. The next day, Fitzgerald said, he told Fleischer over lunch that he had "hush-hush" information that Wilson's wife was employed in the CIA's weapons of mass destruction section. On July 8, Libby met with then-New York Times reporter Judith Miller at the St. Regis Hotel about Wilson's wife. That same day, he asked Addington, a former CIA official, about someone at the CIA sending a spouse on an investigation.

"You can't learn something starting on Thursday [that] you're giving out on Monday and Tuesday," Fitzgerald said.

To back up his claim about Libby's conversation with reporters, Fitzgerald played excerpts of Libby's grand jury testimony with Russert and Time magazine's Matthew Cooper. Although Russert has said that he never spoke about Wilson's wife with Libby, on the tape Libby said he did: "And then he said, 'Did you know that Ambassador Wilson's wife works at the CIA?' I was a little taken aback by that. I said, 'No, I don't know that' ... I wanted to be very careful not to confirm it."

Similarly, during his testimony about Cooper, Libby said, "I was very careful; in my mind I still didn't know it as a fact." He added, "I didn't even know he had a wife."

Taking roughly two hours to outline Libby's defense, Wells declared that Libby was completely innocent. Instead, Wells painted a picture of deep bureaucratic infighting and pointed the finger squarely at the White House. He suggested that the White House -- specifically presidential adviser Karl Rove -- and the State Department may have pushed information to the press. "But Scooter Libby didn't push any reporter," Wells said.

Libby was afraid that he was "being set up" as the scapegoat for Rove, whose "fate was important to the Republican Party," Wells said. So Libby went to Cheney for help, Wells said. "I will not be sacrificed so that Karl Rove can be saved," Wells said Libby told his boss.

Cheney made a note, intended for the president, that he was "not going to protect one staffer + sacrifice the guy that was asked to stick his neck in the meat grinder because of the incompetence of others," according to a note Wells displayed.

Indeed, Cheney specifically asked Libby to speak to reporters about Wilson's attacks -- but to do so on the merits. A note card Cheney approved that contained specific statements to rebut Wilson's argument included no mention of Wilson's wife, Wells said. But while defending the claims against Wilson may have been important, Wells said, Plame was not.

Wells also took aim at the credibility of many of the government's witnesses. For instance, Wells said, not all of the government witnesses remembered their conversations with Libby the first time around. And, some, like Fleischer, did not speak with federal investigators before receiving immunity. As for the reporters, he noted, they had very few or no notes to back up their conversations.

Wells raised the possibility that Russert might have known about Wilson's wife because two of his reporters were chasing the Wilson story. Wells said that on July 11, 2003, Fleischer told White House correspondent David Gregory about Wilson's wife. Wells also mentioned NBC reporter Andrea Mitchell, who said during an Oct. 3, 2003, television broadcast that it was widely known before July 14 by reporters covering intelligence that Wilson's wife worked at the CIA.

"If Andrea Mitchell knew, doggone it, Tim Russert knew," Wells said. (Mitchell later retracted this statement.)

Wells asked why Libby would concoct the story. "If you're going to cook up a story, why are you going to cook up a story about a phony conversation you had with one of the most respected reporters in the country?" Wells said, referring to Russert.

Instead, Wells suggested that Libby may simply have confused his conversations with Russert and with Robert Novak, whose column first disclosed the name of Wilson's wife. Around that same time, Libby spoke with Novak. Wells said Novak would take the stand and say, "It's possible when he had Libby on the phone that he said to Libby, 'Do you know his wife works at the CIA?' and that Libby did not confirm anything to him."

Libby Lawyers Attack Witness Credibility (NSDY/AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Attorneys for former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby say the testimony of the government's first witness in the CIA leak trial may have been improperly influenced.

Marc Grossman, the former No. 3 official at the State Department, took the stand Tuesday and testified that in June 2003 he was the first person to tell Libby that one of the Bush administration's most vocal critics on Iraq was married to a CIA operative.

Libby is charged with lying and obstructing the investigation into who leaked CIA operative Valerie Plame's identity to syndicated columnist Robert Novak. The leak came shortly after her husband, ex-ambassador Joseph Wilson, emerged as a prominent war critic.

Libby, who was Vice President Dick Cheney's chief of staff, told a grand jury that he believed he learned Plame's identity from NBC newsman Tim Russert. Grossman is the first in a string of government witnesses who will say they told Libby about Plame well before his conversation with Russert.

Foreshadowing a tactic he'll use throughout the case, defense attorney Theodore Wells planned to attack Grossman's credibility. Grossman's memory is spotty and Wells believes his testimony may have been influenced by his former boss at the State Department, Richard Armitage. The night before Grossman spoke to the FBI, Armitage confessed that he was Novak's original source and was a subject of the investigation.

As Grossman continued to the cooperate in the probe, defense attorneys say, he went back to Armitage and told him what the FBI was asking and discussed his answers. Prosecutors sought to block Wells from inquiring about those conversations but U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton refused.

"It seems to me there might have been some inappropriate behavior taking place," Walton said.

Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald is trying to make the case that it's implausible Libby would forget several conversations he had with officials about Plame.

Wells counters that Libby's memories are no more flawed than those of the government's key witnesses. The more doubt he can cast on their stories, the more likely Wells is to convince a jury that Libby made honest mistakes.

In opening arguments Monday, both sides described a tumultuous period in the White House in which the Bush administration was eager to rebut criticism from Plame's husband, Wilson, who charged in a New York Times opinion piece in July 2003 that the administration had distorted intelligence to justify its invasion of Iraq.

Fitzgerald believes that in such a high-stakes environment, Libby never would have forgotten details about in conversations with reporters. Wells countered that Libby was busy fielding intelligence on terrorist threats, possible assassination plots and Middle East tensions.

DOJ_NMG_0120792

Wells also accused the White House with unfairly blaming Libby for the leaks to protect political strategist Karl Rove's own leaks.

"They're trying to set me up. They want me to be the sacrificial lamb," Wells said, recalling Libby's end of a conversation with Cheney. "I will not be sacrificed so Karl Rove can be protected."

The trial is expected to last up to six weeks.

8 Arrested In 1971 Police Killing In San Francisco (AP)

By Marcus Wohlsen

AP, January 24, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO - A Florida man and seven others were arrested Tuesday in the 1971 slaying of a police officer that authorities say was part of a black power group's five-year campaign to kill law enforcement officers in San Francisco and New York.

Police said seven of the eight are believed to be former members of the Black Liberation Army, an offshoot of the Black Panther Party.

The Aug. 29, 1971, shooting death of Sgt. John V. Young, 51, at a San Francisco police station was one in a series of attacks by BLA members on law enforcement officials on both coasts, police said.

The attacks, carried out between 1968 and 1973, also included the bombing of a police funeral in San Francisco and the slayings of two New York City police officers, as well as three armed bank robberies that helped fund their operations, police said.

Murder and conspiracy charges were filed against Ray Michael Boudreaux, 64, of Altadena; Richard Brown, 65, of San Francisco; Herman Bell, 59, and Anthony Bottom, 55, both behind bars in New York state; Henry Watson Jones, 71, of Altadena; Francisco Torres, 58, of New York City; and Harold Taylor, 58, of Panama City, Fla.

The arrests were just the latest attempt in recent years to hold antiwar radicals and black-power militants responsible for crimes committed a generation ago.

The investigation of the Black Liberation Army killing spree was reopened in 1999 after "advances in forensic science led to the discovery of new evidence in one of the unsolved cases," the San Francisco Police Department said in a statement.

Morris Tabak, the department's deputy chief of investigations, would not elaborate on the evidence except to say: "It could be fibers. It could be DNA. It could be other biological evidence."

Bell's lawyer, San Francisco attorney Stuart Hanlon, called the arrests a "prosecution based on vengeance and hate from the '60s."

"There's a law enforcement attitude that they hate these people, the Panthers," Hanlon said. "Now they're going after old men."

Richard O'Neal, 57, of San Francisco, was also arrested on conspiracy charges.

A ninth suspect, Ronald Stanley Bridgeforth, 62, was still being sought. Police said he could be in France, Belize or Tanzania.

It's unclear whether Bridgeforth and O'Neal were members of the Black Liberation Army.

None of the suspects will face the death penalty, said Maggy Krell, deputy state attorney general. The death penalty law in effect at the time of the attack was declared unconstitutional in 1972.

The slain officer was killed when Bell and Torres, armed with guns and dynamite, raided a neighborhood police station, firing a shotgun through a hole in the lobby's bulletproof window, as accomplices were posted outside as lookouts, according to police officials in New York. A civilian clerk was wounded. Torres is accused of trying to ignite the dynamite as the pair fled the station, but the explosives failed.

DOJ_NMG_0120793

The station was nearly empty that night as most officers responded to a diversionary bombing of a bank by other conspirators, according to the NYPD.

After his arrest Tuesday in New York, Torres called the case "a frame-up."

Three men, including Taylor, were charged in the attack in 1975. But the charges were thrown out by a San Francisco judge because of a ruling that evidence was obtained by torture after the suspects were arrested in New Orleans.

Bell and Bottom are serving life sentences for the killings of two New York police officers.

Another suspect in Young's slaying, John Bowman of Oklahoma, died in December, according to his lawyer, Ann Moorman of Ukiah.

Ex-militants Charged In S.F. Police Officer's '71 Slaying At Station (SFC)

By Jaxon Van Derbeken And Marisa Lagos, Chronicle Staff Writers

San Francisco Chronicle, January 24, 2007

The arrest and charging of a group of former black militants Tuesday for the 1971 slaying of a San Francisco police sergeant ends years of frustration for investigators who say the men were soldiers in a five-year war on law enforcement in the late 1960s and early 1970s.

The accused -- all reputed former members of the radical militant group known as the Black Liberation Army -- carried out a "terror and chaos" campaign aimed at "assassinating law enforcement officers" that began in 1968 and ended in 1973, Deputy Police Chief Morris Tabak said.

Tabak said one of the casualties was Sgt. John V. Young, slain on Aug. 29, 1971, whose killing was the focus of the arrests and the charges Tuesday. He was killed when at least three men burst into Ingleside police station and one fired a shotgun through an opening in a bulletproof glass window.

"After three decades, it's a real victory for law enforcement that these folks will finally have to answer for their actions," Tabak said in announcing charges against nine men, eight of whom are in custody.

Authorities arrested two San Francisco men, Richard Brown, 65, a community activist, and Richard O'Neal, 57, who worked as a custodian at San Francisco's City Hall.

Also arrested were Francisco "Cisco" Torres, 58, in Queens, New York, Ray Boudreaux, 64, an electrician for Los Angeles County from Altadena, Henry Watson Jones, 71, also of Altadena, and Harold Taylor, 58, of Panama City, Fla.

Two other men charged in the case already are incarcerated in New York. Herman Bell, 59, and Anthony Bottom, 55, were convicted of May 21, 1971, killings two police officers in New York.

One man who was still being sought is Ronald Stanley Bridgeforth, 62. Authorities believe he might have fled the country.

Eight of the men were charged with murder in the slaying of Young and conspiracy to commit murder for a string of attacks on other officers. O'Neal faces only a broader conspiracy to murder police officers charge for his role in a Feb. 6, 1971, non-fatal shotgun attack on a San Francisco police patrol special officer outside at a Grove Street convalescent hospital.

The actions Tuesday -- carried out in cooperation with local, state and federal officials -- follow by two years a grand jury investigation of the Young killing that resulted in no arrests or indictments.

Lawyers for defendants contended that investigators haven't found new evidence since then that justifies bringing charges at this time.

"I don't think they have anything new," said San Francisco attorney Stuart Hanlon, who represents Bell. "I don't think they have a case."

A spokesman for new state Attorney General Jerry Brown acknowledged Tuesday that no new scientific evidence had been unearthed in an investigation made difficult by the lack of solid eyewitness testimony tying the defendants to Young's shooting.

Only two other people were in the Ingleside police station at the time of the attack -- Ellen Lipney, a civilian clerk who also was shot but survived, and Officer Jim Nance. Nance did not see the shooting, and Lipney and he provided only a limited description of one of the assailants.

DOJ_NMG_0120794

The station was largely empty because the rest of the officers were responding to a bombing at the Bank of America in Stonestown, which investigators later said was a diversion from the assault on the station.

"We don't have O.J.'s bloody gloves," attorney general's spokesman Nathan Barankin said Tuesday. "This is not going to be an easy prosecution, but we are committed to seeing it through."

The charges identify Torres, Bell and Jones as the men who entered the Ingleside police station.

Bell was armed with the shotgun and he opened fire, killing Young and wounding Lipney, according to the charges. Jones fired several rounds from a high-powered rifle, trying to get into the station's assembly room, according to the charges. Three other men, the late John Bowman, Brown and Taylor, acted as lookouts, according to the charges.

Boudreaux and Bridgeforth acted as getaway drivers, the charges state. As he fled, Torres tried but failed to set off a bomb intended to blow up the building, according to the charges.

A letter signed by the Black Liberation Army was sent to The Chronicle on Aug. 31, 1971, claiming responsibility for the killing.

According to the allegations, the group made several other attacks on police.

The campaign began with the attack on two San Francisco Housing Authority officers on Oct. 21, 1968, according to the charges. Three men, including Brown, fired at the officers as many as seven times, the charges say. The officers fired back and fled. Brown was found lying on the sidewalk with a .45-caliber handgun in his hand at the time.

The following month, three members of the group -- Bridgeforth, Boudreaux and Jones -- allegedly attacked a group of South San Francisco police officers as they attempted to arrest them for trying to use a stolen credit card.

All three men were arrested at the time, and weapons and blasting cap explosives were found in their car.

On Oct. 22, 1970, Bottom and another man allegedly bombed a police officer's funeral at St. Brendan Church in San Francisco, according to the charges.

Just before the start of the funeral for the officer, Harold Hamilton, who had been slain in a gunbattle with a bank robbery suspect, a bomb exploded in the crowded church, but no one was seriously hurt.

Bottom, Torres and Bell also were named in the charges as being involved in a March 30, 1971, attempted bombing of SFPD's Mission Station. The bomb, set on the roof of the station, had the power of 30 pounds of dynamite. Bottom, according to the charges, admitted that, with the help of Torres, he put the bomb on the roof while two other members of the group drove off.

The same group orchestrated the murder of New York City police officers Waverly Jones and Joseph Piagentini, on May 21, 1971, according to the allegations. Bottom, now serving time in New York for the killings, was arrested after the slayings in San Francisco while in possession of Jones' service revolver. He was caught fleeing after getting into a shootout with San Francisco police Sgt. George Kowalksi on Aug. 28, 1971. Police found a cache of arms in his vehicle, including Jones' gun, which was used to shoot Piagentini.

According to authorities, the group robbed at least three banks to pay for its efforts, raising at least $25,000 to finance the war.

Authorities believe a separate radical group committed an earlier incident, the Feb. 16, 1970, attack in which a bomb was planted at SFPD's Park police station. Sgt. Brian McDonnell, 44, was killed in that attack, and eight other officers were injured.

One man arrested Tuesday has long been linked to the Young case, having been arrested after the slaying only to be released. The outcome of the early arrest highlights the troublesome history of the case.

Two years after the Young killing, Taylor was arrested in New Orleans, along with two other men, Bowman, who recently died, and Ruben Scott, who is not currently charged.

All three allegedly were tortured into making what they later claimed were false confessions.

In 1975, the three men were charged with murder in the Young attack. But a court found that when the two San Francisco police investigators who came to Louisiana to interview the three men were out of the room, New Orleans officers stripped the men, blindfolded them, beat them and covered them in blankets soaked in boiling water. They also used electric prods on their genitals, court records show. The men were freed after a court found their rights had been violated and they were not allowed to have counsel.

DOJ_NMG_0120795

In 1999, the case was reopened after police say they obtained unspecified new physical evidence in one of the attacks on police. A state grand jury heard evidence in the Young slaying. Several members of the group who were subpoenaed refused to testify, some of them jailed until they were freed by court order. No one was indicted.

In 2005, after consulting with San Francisco District Attorney Kamala Harris, police took the case to the state attorney general's office. Harris's office said Tuesday that it was determined that the matter would be best handled by the state prosecutors, who were already familiar with the facts of he case.

One of those arrested in San Francisco, Brown, is a longtime activist in the Western Addition and had been a job counselor at the Ella Hill Hutch Community Center until he was recently laid off.

"He has been involved trying to make things better in this community," said the Rev. Amos Brown, who has known the accused for more than 30 years. "I don't know what to make of it, after all this time -- I don't know what evidence is there, I don't prejudge situations."

Richard Brown's attorney, Richard Mazer, said Tuesday that he had represented him when Brown was summoned to the grand jury in 2005. He was briefly jailed when he refused to testify, but no charges were filed.

"They have been pursuing Mr. Brown and others in this case for decades," Mazer said. "We don't know what new information, if any new information, they have."

O'Neal, who was arrested at his home on McAllister Street, near City Hall, and charged with one count of conspiracy to murder police officers, worked as a custodian for the city. He had previously worked at the city's Hall of Justice, where the case for years frustrated law enforcement.

O'Neal's attorney, Jim Bustamante, said Tuesday that his client was just 18 or 19 at the time of the alleged conspiracy and has been a city employee for more than 25 years.

"I'm not aware of anything they've got that is new," said Bustamante, referring to the time that has transpired since the grand jury investigation in 2005.

Hanlon, the lawyer representing Bell, agreed and suggested justice would best be served by dropping the case against his client.

"If they have a case, we'll deal with it. But I'm afraid that this is just more vindictiveness against the Black Panthers and other groups who were active in the '60s and '70s," he said. "To my knowledge, they've got absolutely nothing new in this case. If they do, let's see it."

The Black Liberation Army, to which the men arrested and changed Tuesday belonged, was an offshoot of the Black Panthers and operated from about 1971 to 1981.

Boudreaux's attorney, Michael Burt, said Tuesday that his client spent 23 days in jail for refusing to speak to the grand jury in 2005.

Burt said Boudreaux's only involvement in the Black Panther movement was to work in a school lunch program in Oakland. He served in the military in the Air Force in Vietnam, Burt said.

"My guy is not a member of any conspiracy, he didn't murder anybody -- this is part of a long-standing vendetta by law enforcement," Burt said. "He is innocent of these charges."

The lawyer also said he knows of no new evidence in this case. "How they are going to work around that is a very interesting issue."

8 Ex-radicals Arrested In '71 Police Slaying (LAT)

By John M. Glionna And Steve Chawkins, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — The racial tensions of the civil rights era marched back into this city Tuesday when eight former radicals — some now husbands, grandfathers and community organizers — were arrested in connection with the 1971 shotgun slaying of a white police officer.

The men, including a real-estate appraiser and a Los Angeles County employee both living in Altadena, were mostly taken into custody during early-morning raids in California, New York and Florida. They are accused of being part of what investigators called a five-year conspiracy that started in 1968 to kill police officers in the United States.

A joint state and federal task force identified seven of the arrested men as former members of the Black Liberation Army, a violent outgrowth of the Black Panthers.

San Francisco Police Sgt. John V. Young was gunned down Aug. 29, 1971, at a neighborhood police station. At the time, the Bay Area was a nexus for radical groups of all stripes.

Eight days earlier, a bloody prison riot after a foiled escape by a Black Panther engulfed San Quentin State Prison. Two inmates and three guards were killed. Attacks on police officers nationwide were being blamed on black militants.

Over 36 years, authorities doggedly pursued the Young case. Some suspects married and started families. Others committed crimes and went to prison. Two years ago, three went on a nationwide speaking tour to decry the renewed investigation. One died last month.

In the last two years, about a dozen suspects, including some of those arrested Tuesday, were called to testify before a grand jury in San Francisco and in recent months investigators sought DNA samples.

On Tuesday, 35 years after Young's death, charges finally were filed.

Charged in Young's killing were: Ray Michael Boudreaux, 64, and Henry Watson Jones, 71, both of Altadena; Richard Brown, 65, of San Francisco; Francisco Torres, 58, of Queens, N.Y.; Herman Bell, 59, and Anthony Bottom, 55, both incarcerated in New York state; and Harold Taylor, 58, of Panama City, Fla.

Another man, Richard O'Neal, 57, of San Francisco, was arrested on suspicion of conspiracy to murder police officers. He was not charged "as an active participant" in the Young killing, authorities said.

A ninth suspect, Ronald Stanley Bridgeforth, 62, was charged with murder, conspiracy to commit murder and aggravated assault on a police officer in connection with Young's killing. He was still at large Tuesday.

Defense lawyers and justice advocates Tuesday questioned the charges, one calling the long-running case "a perversion of justice."

"I'm stunned that the government is still trying to pursue criminal cases against these men. It's beyond explanation," said Charles Ogletree, a Harvard Law School professor and founder of the Charles Hamilton Houston Institute for Race and Justice, who appeared on the speaking tour.

"In the meantime, they've become husbands and grandfathers and neighborhood organizers," he said. "It's a reflection that with all they've been through, they've still been able to raise their heads high."

John Philipsborn, a San Francisco attorney who is representing Jones, added that he was skeptical that any convictions would result.

"This is a case that's been brought before," he said. "It's an old case, and the evidence we know of is of dubious value, given the fact that a number of statements had been several times found to be coerced."

The investigation, which was named the Phoenix Task Force, involves local, state and federal agencies and has been collecting evidence related to attacks on police officers in the turbulent years between 1968 and 1973.

They include the bombing of a police officer's funeral and the attempted bombing of a police station, both in San Francisco.

This is not the first time arrests have been made in Young's killing.

In 1975, three defendants were charged with the shooting, but a judge dismissed the case, ruling that evidence had been gained through torture. An attorney who represented one man said police in New Orleans had used cattle prods and electrodes to extract a confession. The statement was later thrown out of court.

Two then-San Francisco police inspectors, Frank McCoy and Ed Erdelatz, were present at the New Orleans police station when the confession was obtained. Attorneys say both were called out of retirement recently to work on the case.

"The problem with people like Erdelatz and McCoy is that they got the answer they wanted through improper means, and they have been running with it for 30 years," said Stuart Hanlon, who represents Herman Bell.

In the last two years, authorities convened two special grand juries to look into the killing.

DOJ_NMG_0120797

Ann Moorman, a Bay Area defense lawyer, said she represented Oklahoma City resident John Bowman, who was one of five suspects who refused to testify before the San Francisco grand jury hearing. They spent 20 days in jail.

"In my view this was another not-so-subtle effort to put pressure on them after decades, after they suffered extreme mental anguish," she said. "My client was tortured by the New Orleans police. He never forgot that."

Boudreaux, who also refused to testify, said he wasn't surprised when investigators showed up at his door in 2005.

"When I watched on TV the twin towers come down, deep in my heart I knew that someone will come by and visit me as soon as they can get it organized, and they did," Boudreaux told a Washington, D.C., news conference during the speaking tour. "Once upon a time, they called me a terrorist too. To expedite something in the system, they put the 'terror' tag on it, and it gets done."

Boudreaux was picked up on the way from his Altadena home to his job as an electrician for Los Angeles County, said his attorney, Michael Burt, of San Francisco.

At a news conference in San Francisco, task force members refused to discuss specifics of their investigation. They said in a news release that the probe into Young's death was reopened in 1999 "after advances in forensic science led to new evidence in one of the unsolved cases."

They would not confirm that DNA samples were part of the evidence. "It could be fibers. It could be DNA. It could be other biological evidence," said Morris Tabak, deputy chief of investigations for San Francisco police.

He said the Young murder was part of a tense era marked by racial strife nationwide.

"There was a strong anti-government sentiment in the late 1960s and early 1970s, when the BLA members were bent on creating terror and chaos by assassinating police officers," Tabak said. "We believe the motive for the crimes was the furtherance of these revolutionary views."

On the night of Young's killing, four black men strode into the Ingleside station about 9:40 p.m. As the officer stood behind bulletproof glass at the visitor's window, one of the men stuck a 12-gauge shotgun in the speaking hole and fired. The buckshot caught Young in the upper body. A female office clerk was hit in the left arm but was not seriously injured.

A second officer crawled to the wounded Young, who gasped, "Help me," according to a recent story in the SF Weekly.

"Recovered from his body were his most treasured possessions: his police star, rosary beads, religious medals and his wedding ring," according to a news release issued Tuesday.

Speaking at the news conference, San Francisco Police Chief Heather Fong described him as "someone who was doing community policing before the term was even coined."

Young worked with disadvantaged youths and was an avid fundraiser for groups such as the United Negro College Fund. After his death, a street near the station was renamed for him.

One retired San Francisco police officer recalled the turbulent times. "Everything was so racial back then, so much more than today," said Ed Collins, 58. "On the job we had to be double sure of everything. You never took anything for granted."

Queens man, 2 convicted in NYPD killings, arrested with five others in death of S.F. police officer

A Queens man and two other men who are already serving time for killing two New York Police Department officers in 1971 were arrested yesterday in the death of a San Francisco police officer that same year, officials said.

They were among eight suspects - seven of whom officials believe to be former members of the Black Liberation Army - who were arrested in New York, California and Florida.

DOJ_NMG_0120798

A violent offshoot of the Black Panther Party, the BLA carried out a series of attacks against law enforcement officials on both coasts, along with three armed bank robberies, between 1968 and 1973, authorities said.

"Today is a good day for police officers in New York and San Francisco and everywhere," New York Police Commissioner Ray Kelly said in a statement.

NYPD detectives coordinating with San Francisco police and the FBI arrested Francisco Torres, 58, at his home at 145th Street in Jamaica at 6 a.m. yesterday in connection with the death of San Francisco police Sgt. John V. Young. Officials described Torres as a former BLA member. New technology such as DNA testing allowed police to reopen the case.

Young, 51, was killed when two men raided a neighborhood police station, firing a shotgun through a hole in a bulletproof window on Aug. 29, 1971. A civilian clerk was wounded in the attack and authorities said other accomplices were outside as lookouts and get-away drivers.

Herman Bell, 59, and Anthony Bottom, 55, were arrested at an upstate prison for Young's killing. They are serving life sentences for killing NYPD Officers Waverly Jones, 33, and Joseph Piagentini, 28, in an ambush outside the Colonial Park Houses in Harlem on May 21, 1971.

A third man, Albert Washington, was also convicted in the New York case, but he died in prison in 2002.

"Today's developments only reinforce our opposition to their parole," Kelly, referring to Bell and Bottom, said in a statement.

"They shot two New York City police officers in the back, as part of a series of assassinations directed against police officers in those murderous days," Kelly said. "It may have been 35 years ago, but I certainly haven't forgotten. Neither has anyone who was a member of the police department back then. "

Authorities said charges of murder and conspiracy were filed against Torres, Bell, Bottom, Richard Brown, 65, of San Francisco; Ray Boudreaux, 64, and Henry Jones, 71, both of Altadena, Calif., and Harold Taylor, 58, of Panama City, Fla.

Richard O'Neal, 57, of San Francisco, was also arrested on conspiracy charges. He is not believed to have been a member of the Black Liberation Army.

No one answered the door at Torres' house last night.

Neighbors said Torres lived with a teenage son and a son in his 20s who has sickle cell anemia. They also said he often helped neighbors with snow shoveling and other tasks.

"I couldn't believe it," said Priscilla Levine, 53, a retired state clerical worker who lives two doors away.

Bell's attorney, Stuart Hanlon, of San Francisco, called the arrests a "prosecution based on vengeance and hate from the '60s. " Hanlon added: "There's a law enforcement attitude that they hate these people, the Panthers. Now they're going after old men. "

A ninth suspect in Young's killing is still being sought, police said.

8 Arrested In 1971 Killing Of San Francisco Police Officer (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, Jan. 23 — Eight men, including seven described as members of the radical Black Liberation Army, were arrested on Tuesday on charges of murdering a police officer here in 1971 and waging a violent five-year battle against the police and federal authorities.

The arrests, in morning raids in California, Florida and New York capped an investigation by San Francisco police into the murder of Sgt. John V. Young, who was killed by a shotgun at a desk in the Ingleside stationhouse on Aug. 29, 1971.

A civilian clerk was wounded.

New York police officials said two of the men arrested were the gunmen, Francisco Torres, 58, who was seized at his home in Queens, and Herman Bell, 59, who was rearrested at a New York prison where he is serving a murder sentence.

The rest of the aging men were said to have been lookouts, getaway drivers and participants in the assault on the police station and other attacks.

DOJ_NMG_0120799

A statement by the San Francisco police characterized Sergeant Young's killing as a part of a "conspiracy to kill law enforcement officers" from 1968 to 1973, a plan that included the murders of two New York police officers, four attempted murders of law enforcement personnel, the bombing of a police officers' funeral at a San Francisco church and the attempted bombing of another San Francisco police station, as well as three bank robberies, two here and one in Georgia.

In New York, Police Commissioner Raymond W. Kelly said the arrests dealt a blow to the legacy of the protest group, a violent offshoot of the black nationalist Black Panthers, which operated from the late 1960s until the early 1980s. Mr. Kelly said the arrests testified to the long memory of the police, especially for the killing of one of their own.

"It is a good day for police officers in New York and San Francisco and everywhere else," Mr. Kelly said in a telephone interview from Washington. "It underscores the fact that the law enforcement community is never going to forget."

Soon after the arrests, current and former defense lawyers for several of the men said they were skeptical of the charges in the nearly 36-year-old case, saying the police had harassed their clients for years.

Three men were charged with Sergeant Young's killing in 1975, The Associated Press reported, including one of the men arrested on Tuesday, but that case was dismissed.

A lawyer who represents Mr. Bell, Stuart Hanlon, said he thought that the case against Mr. Bell was based on a 30-year-old confession by a suspected Black Panther member that a judge threw out in the mid-'70s because it had been physically coerced.

"I think the police are outraged, and rightfully so, that one of their own was gunned down," Mr. Hanlon said. "They believe they are right. But the belief does not make it so."

Mr. Torres was one of the first arrested, taken from his red-brick home in Jamaica, Queens, before dawn. Also arrested in New York State were Mr. Bell, 59, and Anthony Bottom, 55, who were in prison for the murders in May 1971 of two New York City police officers, Waverly Jones and Joseph Piagentini.

All three men were charged with murder and conspiracy.

In San Francisco, the police arrested Richard Brown, 65, and Richard O'Neal, 57. They were held in $3 million bail with Mr. Brown charged with murder and conspiracy, and Mr. O'Neal, who is not believed to be a member of the so-called army, was charged with conspiracy.

The Los Angeles County sheriff confirmed the arrests of Ray Michael Boudreaux, 64, and Henry Watson Jones, 71, both of Altadena.

The police in Panama City, Fla., confirmed that they had taken Harold Taylor, 58, into custody without incident. He was held on $3 million bond.

The authorities said they were also seeking Ronald Stanley Bridgeforth, 62, on charges of murder, conspiracy and assault. Mr. Bridgeforth is thought to be living abroad.

In their statement, the San Francisco police said that in 1999 they began investigating again several killings of their officers after advances in forensic science had led to the discovery of new evidence in one case.

In 2005, a grand jury was convened to look into Sergeant Young's killing. Four of the men arrested on Tuesday were called to testify. They refused, and were briefly jailed.

A spokesman for the San Francisco police, Sgt. Neville Gittens, said the investigation into Sergeant Young's case and the other attacks would continue. Sergeant Gittens said the police and state attorney general were confident that enough evidence had been gathered to bring charges.

Mr. Hanlon said he doubted that the police had any new evidence.

"The only thing I can think of is the evidence they have from 1971 has been analyzed using a more sophisticated forensic science," he said. "But that is not the same as having new evidence."

Mr. Hanlon suggested that the police had long focused on the Black Panthers and other black power groups.

"I think there is a hatred of the Panthers," he said. "Police who were around then hated them, and the animosity was clear."

Mr. Torres's lawyer, Michael W. Warren, said Mr. Torres was innocent.

"He's been around in the community in New York for a number of years," Mr. Warren said. "The F.B.I., as well as the San Francisco police, have known his whereabouts for all these years. He has been an integral part of this community."

The police said Mr. Torres tried to ignite dynamite in the Ingleside stationhouse in 1971.

Outside police headquarters in Manhattan, Mr. Torres said as detectives escorted him, “It’s a frame up.”

Busted In Cop Slay (NYDN)

By Alison Gendar, Kerry Burke And Corky Siemaszko, Daily News Staff Writers

New York Daily News, January 24, 2007

The radical past of a Queens father caught up with him yesterday when he was charged with taking part in the notorious murder of a San Francisco cop 35 years ago.

Francisco Torres, 58, a former member of the Black Liberation Army, was nabbed by detectives armed with DNA technology that didn't exist when Sgt. John Young was slain Aug. 29, 1971.

Two other New Yorkers, who already are serving time for killing two NYPD officers, and six other graying radicals in California and Florida also were arrested in connection with the killing. A ninth man was still being sought.

All but one of the men were in the BLA, a violent offshoot of the Black Panthers that staged a cop-killing campaign from 1968 to 1973.

Two of the cops killed by the extremists were NYPD Officers Joseph Piagentini and Waverly Jones, who were murdered on May 21, 1971 - a slaying Torres and his brother, Gabriel, were accused of, but never convicted of planning.

"My heart is beating now," Piagentini's widow, Diane, said yesterday. "Torres walked free in my husband's case. Maybe this other charge will stick and justice will finally be done."

Portly, gray-haired and wearing a black bomber jacket, Torres was led out of Police Headquarters in lower Manhattan yesterday afternoon.

"This is a frameup," he muttered.

But police sources said Torres, of South Jamaica, was linked to the San Francisco killing by a cigarette butt found at the crime scene. He was charged with homicide, conspiracy to commit homicide and bank robbery.

Young was killed when Torres and another radical allegedly burst into a precinct stationhouse and fired a shotgun through an opening in a bulletproof glass window. Torres allegedly tried to blow up the building by lighting a stick of dynamite with the cigarette. But the dynamite was a dud, sources said.

After several failed prosecutions, a special FBI task force began looking into the Young killing again in 1999 after "advances in forensic science led to the discovery of new evidence," the San Francisco Police Department said in a statement.

Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly said Torres has been "off the radar" for three decades since serving time for a bank robbery.

In 1974, a judge ruled there wasn't enough evidence to charge him and his brother for the murders of Jones and Piagentini. Two other BLA members - Herman Bell, 59, and Anthony Bottom, 55 - were convicted of the killings. They also were charged yesterday in connection with the San Francisco murder.

Torres' lawyer, Michael Warren, said police were trying to settle old scores. "It's not as if he's been trying to hide or evade the police," he said. "This is nothing but a gross form of retaliation."

Torres' neighbors on 145th St., where he raised two sons and even coached Little League, were shocked. They said "Cisco" never talked politics or got into trouble. His wife, Carolynn Hunter-Torres, is a traffic agent for the city's Parking Violations Bureau, they said.

"He told everyone he was a disabled Vietnam veteran," said Priscilla Levine, who lives two doors down from Torres' tidy brick home. "He was as friendly as you could be in New York City."

New Arrests In A Decades-Old Slaying Of Police Officers (NYS)

By Elizabeth Solomont, Special to the Sun

New York Sun, January 24, 2007

Two men serving sentences for murdering two New York City police officers in 1971 were rearrested yesterday in connection with the killing of a San Francisco officer that same year, in what officials described as a series of attacks on police by the Black Liberation Army.

DOJ_NMG_0120801

Along with five others, Herman Bell and Anthony Bottom were implicated in the murder of Sergeant John Young of the San Francisco Police Department, officials said. Young was killed on August 29, 1971, when officials said members of the radical group shot him through the bulletproof glass window of a police station in Ingleside, Calif.

Officials also arrested five individuals they described as former members of the Black Liberation Army in connection with the murder, including Francisco Torres, 58, of Queens. Also arrested in connected with the murder were Ray Michael Boudreaux, 64, of Altadena, Calif., Richard Brown, 65, of San Francisco, Henry Watson Jones, 71, of Altadena, and Harold Taylor, 58, of Panama City, Fla. Police arrested Richard O'Neal, 57, of San Francisco, on charges of conspiracy, but did not link him to Young's death.

Officials said Young's death was the result of one of a series of attacks on police between 1968 and 1973, including the 1971 murder of two New York City police officers, Waverly Jones and Joseph Piagentini. Jones and Piagentini were shot from behind in Harlem on May 21, 1971. Bell and Bottom, the latter of whom is known as Jalil Muntaqim, as well as another accomplice, Albert Washington, were later convicted of murdering them. Although nearly 36 years have passed since the attacks, officials in 1999 reopened investigations into several murders of San Francisco police officers in the 1960s and 1970s after "advances in forensic science led to the discovery of new evidence in one of the unsolved cases," officials at the San Francisco Police Department said yesterday in a news release.

Although officials declined to elaborate on the forensic evidence in this case, Mr. Torres in July was forced to provide a court-ordered DNA sample to the authorities, the Daily News reported. He and his brother, Gabriel Torres, were suspected of planning the attack on Jones and Piagentini, but a judge ruled that there was insufficient evidence.

However, officials have now implicated Bell and Mr. Torres in Young's murder. They said the two allegedly entered the Ingleside police station while several accomplices acted as lookouts and getaway drivers. Bell allegedly fired a shotgun through bulletproof glass, killing Young. Torres tried to set off dynamite as they fled, although the device failed.

Police also said Bottom and Washington were supposed to have joined them, but were arrested after a traffic stop that night when they fired on — but did not injure — a San Francisco police sergeant. When police searched their car, they discovered the .45-caliber gun used to kill the two New York City officers.

36 Years Later, Suspect Caught (WMBB)

WMBB-TV, January 24, 2007

PANAMA CITY, Fla.--A three decade-old cold case came to an end this morning during a multi-state operation that netted eight suspects allegedly involved in the 1971 murder of San Francisco Police Sergeant John V. Young.

Today around 8 a.m., a task force comprised of the FBI, San Francisco Police Department, Bay County Sheriff's Office and Panama City Police Department, operated under an arrest warrant and booked Harold Taylor, 58, into the Bay County Jail on murder and conspiracy charges.

"Panama City Police Department was contacted by the FBI and San Francisco PD about four years ago and at that time we located Mr. Taylor," said Panama City Police Chief John Van Etten in a Tuesday's press conference.

Asked why it took the task force so long to make the Taylor's arrest, Etten answered that during that time forensic evidence was being gathered against him.

Van Etten said Taylor had been living in Panama City since 1981 and had an no remarkable criminal history.

Investigators say on August 29, 1971 Taylor acting along with seven members of the Black Liberation Army, a radical group with ties to the Black Panthers--Ray Michael Boudreaux, 64; Richard Brown, 65; Herman Bell, 59; Anthony Bottom, 55; Henry Watson Jones, 71 and Francisco Torres, 58--charged into the San Francisco Police Department's station and opened fire on the occupants through a bullet proof window, killing Young and injuring a clerk.

The group has also been linked to other officer slayings in the late 1960's and 1970's in New York and California, where more arrests were said to have been arrested today.

Taylor is being held on $3,000,000 bond in the Bay County Jail.

Tomorrow morning he will make his first appearance in front of a judge. Van Etten did not know exactly when Taylor would be extradited back to San Francisco.

Feds: Details Of ISP Snooping Haven't Been Decided (CNET)

By Anne Broache, Staff Writer, CNET News.com

CNET News, January 24, 2007

DOJ attorney says there has been no "official" decision on what data providers might be required to retain or for how long.

WASHINGTON--The Bush administration hasn't settled on what data it would like Internet service providers to retain about their subscribers or for how long, a U.S. Department of Justice attorney said Tuesday.

U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales made it clear last fall that he planned to seek national legislation requiring the controversial practice known as data retention, but "we don't have any position officially about how long records would have to be retained or what records would have to be retained," said Eric Wenger, a trial attorney with the Justice Department's computer crime unit.

During an event here hosted by the Federal Communications Bar Association, Wenger also said police already have ready access to other legal tools, such as the power to send letters to ISPs requesting "preservation" of existing data for up to 90 days while law enforcement obtains the necessary court authority to obtain that data.

But he categorized the lack of consistent data retention by ISPs as a "roadblock" to some investigations. He described, for example, a situation in which an investigator may be able to secure an IP address for a suspected phisher from Microsoft's Hotmail service. By the time the investigator took that IP address to the Internet service provider for more information about the suspect's identity, he may be told by the ISP that such information has already been purged.

"We've been talking to some of the companies to explain the needs we have for the records," he said, although he did not expressly urge adoption of new laws. Another possibility is that a data retention requirement could be extended beyond ISPs to search engines, which was discussed in private Justice Department meetings in October.

As first reported by CNET News.com in June 2005, Justice Department officials began quietly discussing the idea of data retention requirements, akin to what the European Union has already enacted.

Last week, Gonzales told members of the Senate Judiciary Committee that he planned to resume discussions with Congress about data retention legislation this year. The attorney general did not elaborate on his plans, but last year, he repeatedly said the practice was necessary to help investigators nab elusive online criminals, particularly sexual predators.

Privacy advocates have long resisted such mandates, arguing that they allow police to obtain records of e-mail chatter, Web browsing or chat room activity that normally would have been discarded after a few months--or in some cases, never kept at all.

Hearings Sought On FBI Predator Probes (MH)

By Lesley Clark

The Miami Herald, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON - A watchdog group that blew the whistle on former Rep. Mark Foley, only to see the FBI decline to investigate, is asking the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee, Rep. John Conyers, to hold a hearing on the agency's practice of investigating potential child sex predators.

The request by Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW), comes a day after an inspector general's report chided the FBI for failing to do more to alert the House about Foley's transgressions.

The former Lake Worth Republican resigned in late September after sexually explicit instant messages he had exchanged with underage House pages surfaced. In July, CREW had supplied the FBI with less graphic, but troubling e-mail messages between Foley and a teenage page. But the agency declined to take up the case, saying it didn't rise to the level of criminal activity.

The inspector general's report scolded the agency for reaching that conclusion, saying it should have alerted House leadership to the e-mails or "at least" told CREW that it was not going to investigate.

In a press release today, CREW Executive Director Melanie Sloan said the report raises ``serious questions on how the FBI conducts its investigations into potential child predators."

CREW is asking Conyers to hold a hearing on the agency's practices ``as soon as possible, in order to help prevent other children from being victimized."

Kolbe May Use Campaign Funds For Legal Defense (AP)

AP, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON - Retired U.S. Rep. Jim Kolbe, R-Ariz., may use campaign funds for legal expenses racked up while the House ethics committee and the Justice Department were investigating his connection to a scandal involving House pages, the Federal Election Commission wrote in a draft advisory opinion made public Tuesday.

Kolbe, who retired last year, told the FEC that he incurred legal expenses after he became involved in the unfolding scandal over former Republican Rep. Mark Foley's salacious communication with former House pages.

The Ethics panel last year examined what Kolbe knew about Foley's interaction with the pages after Kolbe revealed that a former page had once contacted him with concerns about Foley. Kolbe said he told the proper authorities about the incident.

Federal law enforcement officials also opened a preliminary inquiry into a 1996 Grand Canyon rafting trip Kolbe took with two former pages.

FEC officials wrote that the legal fees count as "ordinary and necessary expenses" incurred in connection with holding federal office.

The commission will consider the case during a meeting Thursday.

Feds: Idaho Suspect Admitted 3 Slayings (FINDLAW/AP)

By John Miller, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 24, 2007

(AP) - BOISE, Idaho-A man accused of kidnapping two Idaho children, killing one of them, after slaying their family has confessed to the killings of three other children a decade ago in Washington state and California, federal prosecutors said Tuesday.

The prosecutors cited the confessions to the old killings in court papers saying that intended to seek the death penalty against Joseph Edward Duncan III, who was indicted last week on charges involving the two northern Idaho children.

"The defendant has engaged in a continuing pattern of violence, attempted violence, and threatened violence," prosecutors said. Duncan "is likely to commit criminal acts of violence in the future that would constitute a continuing and serious threat to the lives and safety of others."

Roger Peven, Duncan's attorney, said he had not yet seen the filing and could not immediately comment on it.

Duncan is accused of kidnapping Dylan Groene, 9, and his sister Shasta, then 8, in May 2005, and taking them to the mountains of Montana, where prosecutors say he sexually abused them for weeks before killing Dylan. Duncan was arrested July 2, 2005, when he and Shasta were spotted at a Coeur d'Alene restaurant. The boy's body was found days later at a remote campsite.

The U.S. attorney's office said Duncan confessed that he killed Carmen Cubias, 9, and Sammiejo White, 11, in Washington state in 1996 and Anthony Martinez, 10, in California in 1997. Officials did not specify to whom Duncan made the confession.

The two girls were kidnapped from the Crest Motel in Seattle in July 1996. Their skeletal remains were found 17 months later in Bothell, a Seattle suburb. Anthony was forced into a car in Beaumont, Calif., in April 1997 as his friends looked on. Sixteen days later a forest ranger found the boy's nude, bound body about 70 miles to the east.

Last October, Duncan pleaded guilty in Idaho state court to first-degree murder and kidnapping for the May 16, 2005, hammer slayings of Dylan and Shasta's mother, Brenda Groene; her fiance, Mark McKenzie; and Groene's 13-year-old son, Slade. Prosecutors say he killed them to get the younger children.

If federal prosecutors fail to win a death sentence in the case involving the two younger children, a jury will be chosen in Idaho state court to consider whether to impose the death penalty on the murder counts that Duncan pleaded guilty to in October.

Duncan was charged Thursday in a California state court in Anthony's death. Prosecutors there said they also intend to seek the death penalty.

DOJ_NMG_0120804

Duncan is a Tacoma, Wash., native who spent most of his adult life in Washington state prisons for sexual crimes against children.

In 2004, he had been arrested for allegedly molesting a 6-year-old boy and attempting to molest another boy in Detroit Lakes, Minn. Authorities say he jumped bail on that charge.

Judge Reduces Bullock's Prison Sentence (WT)

By Jim Mcelhatton

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

A federal judge yesterday reduced the prison sentence of former Washington Teachers Union chief Barbara A. Bullock by more than two years, in exchange for her help in convicting former colleagues in a massive embezzlement scam.

Bullock, 68, dressed in a prisoner's jumpsuit and walking with a cane, pleaded for leniency. She told U.S. District Court Judge Richard J. Leon, "I am sorry for what I did, and I can't do any more than that."

Bullock previously had been sentenced to nine years in prison after pleading guilty in 2003 to taking part in a scam that embezzled more than $5 million in teachers' dues. Money that was taken in the scam was spent on personal items such as $500,000 on custom-made clothing and $100,000 on Washington Redskins and Washington Wizards season tickets.

The reduction means Bullock is likely to be released in about three years.

Prosecutors sought to reduce Bullock's original sentence because they said Bullock provided investigators with good leads. They said her testimony also helped convict former union treasurer James O. Baxter II and office manager Gwendolyn M. Hemphill.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Anthony Alexis said that without Bullock's help, investigators wouldn't have known about the "vast number" of furs purchased with union dues. The furs, he said, "basically became a currency in the conspiracy."

"Her testimony was useful, and we believe it was powerful," he said.

Bullock's attorney had sought to cut her overall sentence from nine to five years. Michelle Peterson said Bullock didn't know the extent of the fraud being committed by Baxter, Hemphill and others.

She also said Bullock has turned her life around, helping other inmates at the federal prison in Alderson, W.Va.

"As a former teacher, I do know how to teach children to read," Bullock told Judge Leon.

Bullock also mentioned that the prisoners she helps affectionately call her or know her as "grandma."

The criminal case was unusual because the person at the top of the conspiracy, Bullock, cooperated early and helped convict officials under her authority. Judge Leon said that's rare in such cases.

Bullock also will be out of prison sooner than the other major targets in the investigation.

Hemphill was sentenced to 11 years and Baxter to 10 years after they were convicted of embezzlement, conspiracy and other felony charges. Hemphill had sought leniency before her sentencing last year, claiming that Bullock was the mastermind of the conspiracy.

Attorneys for Hemphill also said the former office manager suffered from a mental disease, saying at one time she had psychotic episodes in which she thought she was being stalked by a small person with a spear.

Calling Bullock "a person who has turned a corner," the judge said he would have sentenced the former union president to about 14 years in prison if she did not cooperate.

"The smartest decision she ever made was getting on the right path," he said of Bullock's decision to work with prosecutors.

However, Judge Leon rejected the defense request to cut Bullock's sentence by an additional two years, saying she reaped more of the rewards in the embezzlement scam compared with any other defendant.

Judge Leon also rejected a request by prosecutors to sentence Bullock to a halfway house after her release. He said doing so would waste taxpayer money and that halfway-house spots tend to go to drug convicts.

Instead, the judge sentenced Bullock to six months of home detention after her release. Bullock also must complete 1,000 hours of community service and pay more than $4 million in restitution to the union.

Tax To Fight Gangs Set For Ballot (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy And Steve Hymon

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

Desperate to stem the rise of gang violence in Los Angeles, the City Council agreed Tuesday to draft a ballot measure that would impose a parcel tax to raise $50 million or more annually for intervention and prevention programs.

However, council members said it was unlikely the proposal would go onto the ballot until next year, skipping the municipal election in May.

Also Tuesday, City Atty. Rocky Delgadillo released his plan for reducing gangs, which includes a call for school uniforms to be required for all Los Angeles Unified School District students, legal action to shut down the headquarters of the 10 worst gangs, and expanding his assignment of prosecutors to every police station and to neighborhoods around gang-plagued schools.

Delgadillo also said he would seek to expand the city attorney office's truancy program to numerous of middle schools, obtain stay-away orders for those who do not live in the neighborhoods they terrorize and push for legislation to increase penalties for gang-related crime.

Councilwoman Janice Hahn, who wrote and championed the proposal for a parcel tax to fight gangs, said action was needed because of the 267 gang-related homicides last year and the 14% increase in gang crime citywide.

"We have a major crisis in the city of Los Angeles," Hahn said. "I think the time is right that we ask the voters of Los Angeles if they would be willing to partner with us for a sustainable comprehensive approach to gang violence."

After a sometimes emotional debate, the council voted 13 to 0 to direct the city attorney to draft language for a ballot measure. Another vote will be necessary to put it to voters.

Hahn reluctantly agreed to remove a commitment to the May election from the council resolution after some of her colleagues said it was likely to fail because it needs two-thirds support to pass and voter turnout is expected to be low.

Hahn represents parts of South Los Angeles, including the Harbor Gateway neighborhood that has seen two killings of African American residents by Latino gang members in as many months. One was the Dec. 15 slaying of 14-year-old Cheryl Green. A Mexican immigrant was fatally shot Dec. 5 by a youth who witnesses believe was black, although his identity was shielded by a hood and mask.

"I have felt overwhelmed by the gang violence in my council district. I have felt desperate," Hahn told her colleagues, her voice cracking with emotion. "There was a huge part of me that just did not want to wait."

Hahn said she believes voters would support a parcel tax, which she estimated would cost property owners a flat $5 per month.

The vote to draft the ballot measure was particularly striking given the council's leeriness of tax hikes following two recent failures. City voters refused, in November 2004, to go along with a countywide sales tax increase to pay for more police, and they rejected a $1-billion affordable-housing bond last fall.

Hahn would like to see the measure go to voters early next year and is hoping that the state Legislature will act to move the presidential primary election forward to February. Meanwhile, she hopes to secure additional funds for city gang prevention programs during council budget negotiations in May.

Councilman Herb Wesson raised the need for a compromise on the timing of the election, telling his colleagues that his considerable political experience told him a ballot measure wouldn't win in May.

"People in our community are depending on us to do this right," Wesson said. "Let's not just deliver a ballot measure, let's deliver a winning ballot measure."

Some council members objected that a May vote would not provide enough time to digest and act on a study released last week by the Advancement Project that recommended an overhaul of intervention and prevention efforts.

The study said the city has failed to reduce gang violence, in large part because it lacks coordination and focus for the 23 scattered anti-gang programs it currently funds to the tune of $82 million a year.

Councilman Tony Cardenas, who leads a council committee on gang programs, said the city has not determined how much money is needed to get the job done, and he worried that $50 million might not be enough.

Councilman Dennis Zine, although he voted to draft the tax measure, questioned whether voters would support it less than a year after the council increased trash fees to pay for 1,000 more police officers.

DOJ_NMG_0120806

The concern about overburdening taxpayers was raised by Veronica Perez Becker, a vice president of the Central City Assn.

"Before imposing more taxes on your constituents, we urge you to take a careful look at the collective impact of recent tax increases," Becker told the council.

In a telephone interview, Jon Coupal, president of the Howard Jarvis Taxpayers Assn., predicted the council would face a tough time selling another tax hike to voters. "They have an uphill battle," he said.

In recent years, two other California cities — Santa Rosa and San Bernardino — have won voter approval for tax increases to combat gangs. In both instances, however, the added charges also helped pay for more police.

Family Found Safe After Amber Alert (CHIT)

By Gerry Doyle, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, January 24, 2007

A mother and four children who police said were abducted from their Elkhart, Ind., home on Saturday were found safe in a motel in the same city Tuesday night, officials said.

The children's father, Jerry White, is accused of kidnapping them after shooting a man in their home Saturday morning. Police initially thought White might have fled to the Chicago area, where he once lived.

But on Tuesday night, Kimberly Walker, 31, and her children Jaylan, 9; Justin, 8; Kyara, 6; and Kayla, 16 months, were "doing well" in the Elkhart area, police said.

White, 30, is in custody, police said.

White, Walker and the children were found at the Sleepy Hollow motel on Elkhart's north side about 7 p.m., police said. Police declined to say how they found the family in the motel.

"She was sobbing hysterically and physically shaking like I've never seen anybody shake," Detective Sgt. Bill Wargo said. "I asked her if she was Kim. She very hesitantly shook her head yes. We grabbed her and pulled her out of the room and she was rushed away behind another building."

Wargo said he then began yelling for the children, but at first got no response.

"I continued to yell for the kids and the oldest boy Jaylan, I saw him poke his head out kind of as the big brother," he said. "I asked him to come out to me and as he came running out, they all came out in order like a row of ducks."

Officers caught White as he was trying escape through an air duct in the room, Wargo said.

An arrest warrant was issued charging White with attempted murder and several counts of confinement. White is the father of all four children, police said.

White, according to court records, allegedly has a history of kidnapping Walker. He pleaded guilty in 2003 to felony domestic battery for attacking Walker while she was leaving work on the South Side, according to court records. The more serious aggravated kidnapping charges were dropped.

Chicago police, the Illinois State Police and the FBI all had assisted in the investigation over the weekend.

Police said that White had been harassing Walker for several days before the shooting on Saturday, and that her sister and her sister's boyfriend had been staying in their home.

Police think White broke into Walker's house about 2 a.m. Saturday and shot her sister's boyfriend, Lathie Turnage, 30, of Chicago in the face and chest. He remains in critical but stable condition.

White then held everyone captive until leaving with Walker and the children about 11:30 a.m., police said. An Amber Alert was issued soon afterward.

Officials initially had been concerned particularly with the well-being of Jaylan Walker, who has serious asthma and needs to use a ventilator every few hours.

Judge Hears Request For New Trial From Vigil's Attorneys (AP)

AP, January 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120807

ALBUQUERQUE - A federal judge made no immediate decision Tuesday afternoon on a request for a new trial for former State Treasurer Robert Vigil.

U.S. District Judge James Browning heard arguments on the defense's effort to get a new trial for the former state official.

The hearing will resume Wednesday morning, but the judge also told both sides they should be prepared to go forth with Vigil's scheduled sentencing. That sentencing hearing is scheduled to begin at 9 a.m.

Vigil was convicted in September on one count of attempted extortion. He was acquitted on 23 other charges.

Tuesday's hearing was called after defense attorney Sam Bregman raised concerns about a potential witness. That witness, former Deputy State Treasurer Ann Marie Gallegos, claimed she had been intimidated by the FBI.

But FBI agent Marcus McCaskill testified today it was never intimated that Gallegos would be prosecuted if she testified for the defense.

COKE SECRETS TRIAL: Defense Denied 'Core' Evidence (AJC)

By Duane D. Stanford, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, January 24, 2007

Defense attorneys in the Coca-Cola trade secrets trial suffered a pair of setbacks Tuesday during a second day of testimony full of fireworks.

The federal judge in the case began by admonishing the attorney for former Coke secretary Joya Williams, who is accused of conspiring to sell confidential company documents and product samples to PepsiCo.

The judge said attorney Janice Singer attempted to skirt the court's rules to "attack" a prosecution witness.

As a result, the judge wouldn't allow Singer to introduce evidence the attorney said was at the "core" of her case.

Then jurors learned that Williams contacted another prosecution witness just days before the start of her trial to suggest how he should testify.

The tension began during Singer's cross-examination of key prosecution witness Edmund Duhaney, who has pleaded guilty to one count of conspiring to steal trade secrets. He testified against Williams.

Singer tried to introduce as evidence a spiral notebook in which Duhaney copied something called "the 48 rules of power" taken from a book by the same name.

The statements he copied included one that stated "Conceal your intentions," and another that said, "Never put too much trust in friends, learn how to use enemies."

Singer argued that the statements would help show Duhaney's state of mind in dealing with Williams.

Judge J. Owen Forrester said the notebook could be used only if Singer asked questions that would reveal whether Duhaney believed the statements or simply copied them down. Forrester said the evidence could cast Duhaney in an unfair light.

After Singer twice forgot to follow the judge's order and was warned, the judge told her to move on. Singer apologized and pressed the judge to allow her to continue her questions, saying she had made a mistake.

The judge asked the jurors and Duhaney to leave the courtroom, and the debate continued with the judge telling the red-faced Singer she had tried on several occasions to unfairly attack witnesses' character.

After a lunch break, Singer again asked for leniency.

"It is the core of my case," she said of Duhaney's notebook, arguing she had a right to introduce it because it was being used to impeach Duhaney, not tarnish his character.

"I have already given you two chances," the judge fired back.

Earlier, before Singer's questioning was halted by the judge, Duhaney told her he didn't believe the statements from the book. He said he took them down from a copy of the book he borrowed because he thought, "Wow, these are something."

Singer hammered away at Duhaney's credibility most of the morning. But Duhaney refused to say he was testifying to get a lighter sentence for his part in the crime.

Prosecutors have agreed to recommend a lesser sentence for Duhaney if they are satisfied with his testimony. He faces a maximum 10 years in prison.

"I am here only to tell the truth," Duhaney said, adding that he believes his role in the crime has been exaggerated.

DOJ_NMG_0120808

Singer, taking an aggressive tone throughout her questioning, also fired away at Duhaney for lying to federal agents about the case when he was arrested July 5.

Duhaney said he was confused and wanted to say as little as possible after his arrest because he didn't have a lawyer present.

Williams' case suffered yet another setback during the afternoon session, when prosecutors called a former boyfriend of Williams to the stand.

He testified that he helped Williams send a package via Federal Express to another co-defendant in the case, Ibrahim Dimson. Dimson also pleaded guilty in October to the conspiracy charge but has not agreed to testify.

The boyfriend, Sedrick Wilson, said he didn't know what was in the package and that Williams kept him in the dark about the alleged trade secrets plot. Prosecutors will try to show later that the nearly 5-pound package contained confidential Coke materials.

Wilson also testified that he got a text message from Williams on Jan. 7, just days before jury selection in her trial, begging him to call her. When they spoke, according to Wilson, Williams urged him to say the Federal Express package contained trucking company documents.

"I guess she wanted me to lie," Wilson told a prosecutor during questioning, prompting an objection from Williams' attorney and an order from the judge to strike the statement.

Wilson then clarified: "She said, 'Make sure you say it was for the trucking company.' "

Wilson also testified he was at Williams' apartment last spring when she met with Dimson and Duhaney to discuss stacks of Coke documents.

Testimony today will resume with Williams' former boss, Javier Sanchez Lamelas, a marketing vice president at Coke.

Former Boyfriend Tells Court Coke Theft Suspect Wanted Him To Lie About A Package (AP)

By Harry R. Weber, Associated Press

AP, January 24, 2007

ATLANTA – An ex-boyfriend of a former Coca-Cola secretary charged with conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant testified Tuesday that the defendant wanted him to lie for her about a package she had sent to another man accused in the case.

Sedrick Wilson said Joya Williams sent him a text message on Jan. 7, nine days before jury selection began in her trial, saying that it was “beyond important” that he call her.

The subject, Wilson said, was a package she sent via FedEx to Ibrahim Dimson, a co-defendant in the case, during the first half of 2006. Wilson said he was with Williams when the shipment was sent.

“She said, 'Make sure you say that it was for the trucking company,'” Wilson recalled of his recent conversation with Williams.

Wilson testified he didn't know what was in the package.

“I guess she wanted me to lie for her,” Wilson said. A defense lawyer objected, and U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester ruled the comment out of consideration by the jury.

Williams has been free on bond leading up to the trial and during it.

The government did not say during Wilson's testimony what it believed was in the package, but a prosecutor asserted during a conference outside the presence of the jury that the text message and subsequent conversation show consciousness of guilt on Williams' part. Defense lawyer Janice Singer objected to allowing the testimony, but Forrester let it in.

The government has alleged that Williams took confidential documents and samples of products that Coca-Cola was developing and gave them to Dimson and another co-defendant, Edmund Duhaney. Dimson and Duhaney have pleaded guilty to conspiracy and are awaiting sentencing.

Earlier Tuesday, Duhaney, a key witness against Williams, admitted he lied to FBI agents when he was first questioned on July 5.

“You also told them you weren't sure where Joya Williams worked. That was a lie, right?” Singer asked.

"Yeah," Duhaney responded.

Singer also questioned whether Duhaney was only testifying that Williams spearheaded the scheme in hopes of getting a lighter sentence.

"Is it your hope in this case the government will file a motion for a lower sentence and that you will receive a lower sentence?" Singer asked.

"My hope in this case is that the truth will be told and that Judge (J. Owen) Forrester will make the final decision," Duhaney responded.

"You think you were a small player, right?" Singer said.

"I wasn't a small player," Duhaney responded. "I was involved. I didn't force anybody to do anything. I didn't steal anything."

Also Tuesday, the government played a recording of a June 29, 2006, conversation between Duhaney and Dimson in which they discuss some of the products under development by Coca-Cola that they were seeking to sell information about to Pepsi.

They included Vitamin Mineral 506, Healthy Green Tea, Plus 4 Omega, Lemon Hydration and Plus 2 Green Tea Diet. Those names likely were not what the final names of the products Coca-Cola was developing would be but only how Coca-Cola referred to them internally during the development process.

Williams faces up to 10 years in prison if convicted of the single federal conspiracy charge against her. She has pleaded not guilty.

Williams, Duhaney and Dimson were indicted in July, accused of stealing new product samples and confidential documents from The Coca-Cola Co. and trying to sell them to Purchase, N.Y.-based PepsiCo Inc.

Coca-Cola had declined to say what product or products the samples relate to. But Duhaney's testimony shed some light on the products. On Monday, he testified that one product Williams had information about was Coca-Cola Blak, which Coca-Cola launched in January 2006.

The three suspects were hoping to get at least $1.5 million for the scheme, according to a taped phone call between Duhaney and Dimson that was played in court Monday. On the call, the two men discuss how to split the money.

Williams was expected to get a cut of up to $150,000, according to another recorded call between Dimson and Duhaney played in court Tuesday.

The alleged conspiracy was foiled after Pepsi warned Atlanta-based Coca-Cola and an undercover FBI investigation was launched.

Williams was fired from her job as an administrative assistant to Coca-Cola's global brand director after the allegations came to light. That executive, Javier Sanchez Lamelas, testified Tuesday that there was no reason for Williams to take confidential Coca-Cola information home with her.

During her opening statement in the trial on Monday, Singer referred to Dimson and Duhaney as "two seasoned liars, con men who took advantage of Joya Williams."

Singer said Duhaney's deal with the government is his "whole motive in this case" for testifying against Williams.

Dimson and Duhaney served prison terms at the same time at a federal penitentiary in Montgomery, Ala. Duhaney served nearly five years of a seven-year sentence on a cocaine charge before being released in 2005; Dimson served less than one year of a two-year sentence on a bank fraud charge before his release in 2004.

Williams does not have a criminal record, another attorney who previously represented her has said.

Coke Co-conspirator On The Stand (WXIA)

WXIA-TV, January 24, 2007

Secretly-recorded phone calls portray an Atlanta Coca-Cola employee as a willing participant last year in a conspiracy to try to sell Coke trade secrets to Pepsi.

But the now-former Coke employee, Joya Williams, insists that she knew nothing about any such conspiracy.

She is on trial in federal court in Atlanta, facing ten years in prison.

On Tuesday, the second day of testimony, the jury heard those taped phone calls, and saw an eyeful.

What they saw were bottles of two, secret drinks that Coca Cola was developing last year -- green tea drinks.

Coke did not want Pepsi to know about them.

Yet the government says Joya Williams, at her desk at Coke headquarters in Atlanta last year:

Slipped the two bottles into a small, red shopping bag

Put the bag into a cardboard box, along with a pile of secret Coke documents

Carried the box out of Coke's headquarters, in full view of security cameras and security personnel

And gave the box to a friend and accomplice, Edmund Duhaney, who brought it to his DeKalb County home and stuck it in his garage -- just part of a treasure chest of Coke trade secrets that Duhaney says Williams gave him to try to sell to Pepsi.

Williams insists Duhaney is the one who stole all those Coke trade secrets from her, and, on his own, offered them to Pepsi, without her knowledge.

But in court Tuesday, with Duhaney on the witness stand, Williams and the jury listened to phone calls the FBI recorded between Duhaney and his confessed partner in crime, Ibrahim Dimson, when agents secretly tapped Dimson's cell phone last year.

Both men, who were arrested along with Williams in July, ended up pleading guilty in October. Each faces up to ten years in prison..

In their taped phone calls, the men referto Williams with nicknames, "J" and "Shorty" and "Scram," and portray her as an associate, a willing and active participant, in the scheme.

They hoped to sell the Coke secrets to Pepsi for $1.5 million, never knowing until July 5th, the day they were to exchange the secrets for the cash, that the "Pepsi representative" who was going to meet them at Atlanta's airport to pay them was really an undercover FBI agent.

In their phone conversations in late June, they are laughing, excited about what they thought would be their big pay day. They discuss what they want to do with the cash.

They decide Joya Williams' share should be $150,000.

They want to give a total of $250,000 to two of Dimson's friends.

They want to spend $100,000 for a Muslim worship center and school, one of them saying, "That will be the most important thing we ever do in our life."

And they decide to keep for themselves the remaining $1 million.

In court Tuesday, Assistant U.S. Attorney B. J. Pak asked Duhaney, "Why pay Williams?"

Duhaney answered that he and Dimson credited Williams with coming up with the scheme, as opposed Williams' claim, since their arrests, that she was an unwitting victim of their scheme. "She had put everything together," Duhaney said on the stand, "getting the (Coca Cola) documents (for us) to sell."

Under cross examination, Williams' attorney, Janice Singer, attacked Duhaney's credibility, accusing him of lying for the government to try to get a lighter prison sentence.

Duhaney's plea agreement specifies that he is subject to serving the maximum penalty, ten years, although the government prosecutors will recommend to the judge a lighter sentence. Duhaney also agreed to pay $40,000 in restitution to Coca Cola, and he is subject to paying a fine to the government of up to $250,000.

Williams' ex-boyfriend, Sedrick Wilson testified against her Tuesday, describing meetings she'd had with the two men last year.

And Wilson testified that Williams contacted him just before the trial began, on January 7th, 2007, to try get him to say on the stand what she wanted him to say about a package she had air-expressed to Dimson in New York in May.

"Make sure you say [on the stand] it was for the trucking company," the company that Dimson and Duhaney were setting up, Wilson quoted Williams as telling him to testify.

The prosecution never said what Williams actually sent to Dimson, whether it was a package of trucking company materials, or additional, confidential Coke documents for Dimson and Duhaney to try to sell.

But just prior to Wilson's testimony, and outside the presence of the jury, Williams' attorney asked Judge J. Owen Forrester to order the prosecution not to ask Wilson about Williams trying to influence Wilson's testimony.

Forrester concluded Wilson's testimony against Williams would be an inference of guilt, and "prejudicial, but not unfairly prejudicial," and he ruled the jurors could hear it and decide for theselves.

Testimony continues Wednesday.

The case is expected to go to the jury next week.

Former Indianapolis Patrolman Gets 57 Months For Fraud (AP)

AP, January 24, 2007

INDIANAPOLIS - A former patrolman who moonlighted as a home appraiser has been sentenced to 57 months in federal prison for his role in a mortgage-fraud scheme that illegally inflated home loans.

Michael C. Smith, 45, who had been an Indianapolis Police Department officer for 19 years, was also ordered Thursday to pay $1.1 million in restitution. Smith resigned from the force as the department was starting procedures to fire him after charges were filed, said police spokesman Lt. Douglas Scheffel.

Smith was convicted of money laundering and wire fraud in two separate deals in 2001 and 2003 designed to illegally inflate mortgage loans in Indianapolis, Marion and Fairmount.

Smith is the 58th person convicted of fraud since a federal task force convened to look into real estate fraud in central Indiana, U.S. Attorney Susan Brooks' office reported.

Those schemes have depressed property values for nearby homeowners, cost lenders more than $40 million and riddled neighborhoods with abandoned houses, aggravating problems in older, deteriorating neighborhoods.

Indianapolis alone spent $21.2 million in federal money between 2000 and 2005 to repair 2,300 houses, even as abandoned houses have nearly doubled since the late 1980s. A 2003 survey counted 8,136 vacant city houses.

"There are so many of these foreclosures. But they're in small quantities. No one is watching," said Indianapolis real estate agent Margaret Huddleson, a member of an industry group monitoring fraud cases.

Since October, a federal grand jury has looked into a failed mortgage deal connected to Fishers real estate salesman Robert Penn that involved 112 houses.

A pending fraud lawsuit, filed last summer by mortgage giant Countrywide Home Loans, contends Penn was at the center of a conspiracy to borrow more money than the houses were worth.

Sentenced Thursday along with Smith in the conspiracy were Mark Speckman, 48, McCordville, and Joseph Britton, 47, both of Fishers. They each received 33-month sentences in a conspiracy that involved American Savings Mortgage.

The company's president, Kenneth McKinney, last year was ordered to serve seven years in prison.

Despite a flurry of convictions that have included 15 local mortgage brokers, nine loan officers and six appraisers, fraudulent home loan deals continue to fuel Indianapolis' high foreclosure rate.

Last year, industry watcher RealtyTrac ranked Indianapolis first among U.S. metro areas with one of every 69 houses in foreclosure, or 1.45 percent of the houses in the nine-county region.

Most of the fraudulent deals involve an array of lenders, title agents, brokers and others who help doctor documents to arrange bigger mortgage loans that the property is worth and pocket the difference.

Bribery Case Alarms Governor (OREG)

By EDWARD WALSH And ASHBEL GREEN

The Oregonian, January 24, 2007

Prisons - Ted Kulongoski orders a policy review and pledges to fix any failings found from an inquiry into a corrections food official

SALEM -- Gov. Ted Kulongoski on Tuesday called for an internal review of state procurement policies in the wake of a federal probe into allegations that a food service administrator for the prison system took bribes from companies in return for buying their food.

"The governor takes the investigation and accusations very seriously," said Kulongoski spokeswoman Anna Richter Taylor. "Once the (federal) investigation is complete, we will be re-evaluating whether or not the procurement and management policies that we have in place are sufficient and identify what changes need to be made to strengthen oversight."

Farhad "Fred" Monem was placed on leave after IRS and FBI agents searched his Salem home and office earlier this month. A federal judge has unsealed court documents that describe a four-year kickback scheme that alleges Monem took hundreds of thousands of dollars from companies that sell food to the state for inmate meals.

According to state officials, the Corrections Department operates its own procurement system that is different from that of most other state agencies. Corrections Department Director Max Williams appeared before the Joint Ways and Means Public Safety Subcommittee for a review of the department's operations.

In a prepared statement before his regular testimony, Williams said that when the federal investigation is complete, he will attempt to determine whether the agency was financially harmed by the alleged kickback scheme.

"You have my commitment that if the facts determine the state was in fact harmed, we will vigorously seek recovery of those funds," Williams told the subcommittee.

In a brief interview, Williams said he learned of the investigation from federal authorities less than a month ago. He said that he does not know whether the alleged scheme cost his department money and that he has had no indication the case involves anyone else in the agency.

Federal investigators declined to discuss details of the case Tuesday. It was unclear whether the alleged bribery scam in Oregon could occur in other states.

Oregon has a centralized purchasing system. And instead of simply seeking bids, Monem would scour the commodities markets for deals, sometimes reselling items if prices later went up.

Washington contracts with companies to provide food for a fixed price. Although the state does some purchasing centrally, prisons also buy from local distributors. Levin & Lawrence, the California-based food distributor that investigators singled out in the alleged kickbacks scheme in Oregon, did not show up on a list of companies that sell food to Washington prisons, according to a spokeswoman.

Florida doesn't directly purchase food for inmates. Instead, it contracts with a private company, Aramark, to provide the meals, according to a corrections spokeswoman.

Neither Monem nor any executive in the food companies has been charged. Monem's attorney declined to comment.

Food Service Manager Investigated For Alleged Kickbacks (AP)

By WILLIAM McCALL

AP, January 24, 2007

Gov. Ted Kulongoski said Tuesday a federal investigation into alleged kickbacks to the state prison food service administrator totaling at least $650,000 may lead to tougher oversight of the purchasing program.

"Certainly the governor takes this investigation very seriously," said Anna Richter Taylor, the governor's spokeswoman.

Farhad "Fred" Monem has been placed on administrative leave from the Oregon Department of Corrections after federal agents accused him and his wife, Karen, of receiving kickbacks or bribes.

No charges have been filed against Monem or others accused of involvement.

David Angeli, the attorney for Fred Monem, declined comment.

A spokeswoman for U.S. Attorney Karin Immergut also declined comment on the joint FBI and Internal Revenue Service investigation.

The allegations are part of an affidavit filed in U.S. District Court in Eugene to support a search warrant for the Monems' home, Fred Monem's business office in Salem, and a safe deposit box the couple kept at a Salem bank.

The affidavit portrayed the couple living a lavish lifestyle from 2003 to 2006, including at least 15 trips to the Mandalay Bay Hotel and Casino in Las Vegas and the purchase of a $77,000 BMW — roughly what Fred Monem earns per year at his state job.

The search turned up more than $12,000 in cash in a briefcase in a closet at the couple's house, along with four packages of marijuana and a package of hashish, according to court documents.

"Without the bribery/kickback payments made to Fred and Karen Monem ... it is my opinion that the purchase and acquisition of assets and lifestyle expenditures made by the Monems ... would not have been possible," IRS Special Agent Robert Salisbury wrote in the affidavit.

DOJ_NMG_0120813

Fred Monem, 48, had built a reputation as a "whiz kid" who had saved the state Department of Corrections millions of dollars in inmate food costs by purchasing food nearing its expiration date and also through buying in bulk.

The scheme allegedly involves food distributors and brokers in California, New York and Maryland but centered on a distributor in Santa Clarita, Calif., named Levin & Lawrence Inc.

Monem purchased bulk food from Levin & Lawrence that was labeled "distressed" because it is close to the expiration date and kicked back a profit to Fred Monem, according to the affidavit.

A man who answered the phone at Levin & Lawrence on Tuesday, but did not identify himself, declined comment on behalf of the company.

The Department of Corrections issued a statement Tuesday saying the investigation does not appear to involve any inmates or state prisons and no arrests have been made.

"We are of course disappointed that allegations have surfaced regarding a department employee," Max Williams, director of the Oregon Department of Corrections, said in the statement. "We hold ourselves and all employees to the highest ethical standards and we take very seriously any suggestion that those standards have been violated."

Contributor To Gossip Column Won't Be Charged (NYT)

By James Barron

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

Federal prosecutors have decided not to file charges against a former freelance contributor to The New York Post's Page Six gossip column after an investigation into whether he had demanded payments for favorable coverage, a lawyer for the contributor said yesterday.

The contributor, Jared Paul Stern, was suspended last April after The Post reported that the California supermarket billionaire Ronald W. Burkle had complained to the authorities.

At the time, people involved in the investigation said that Mr. Burkle had secretly videotaped Mr. Stern demanding a $100,000 payment and a $10,000 monthly stipend. Mr. Stern was heard saying that in return, he would keep unfavorable mentions of Mr. Burkle out of Page Six.

Yesterday, a person with knowledge of the decision confirmed that federal prosecutors in Manhattan had decided not to prosecute Mr. Stern. The decision was reported on The New York Observer's Web site yesterday afternoon.

"I'm relieved, obviously," Mr. Stern said. "I was not expecting to be charged, but it's always good to have them come out and say it."

A spokeswoman for the United States attorney's office in Manhattan declined to comment. But Mr. Stern's lawyer, Joseph Tacopina, said he had been told of the decision.

"We've always been confident that there was no evidence of any crime," Mr. Tacopina said. "What we've said from Day 1 is, this is a campaign to spread lies fueled by Burkle's personal vendetta against The New York Post. There was never any evidence of wrongdoing on Mr. Stern's part."

After the investigation became public, associates of Mr. Burkle said that he had been upset about items he considered inaccurate. He set up a meeting with Mr. Stern, who suggested that he become a source. Mr. Burkle said no, the associates said, but said he would buy five dozen shirts from Mr. Stern's clothing line.

Later, a Burkle associate said when the investigation became public, Mr. Stern sent an e-mail message saying that Mr. Burkle had "the means" to do something about the way Page Six covered him. Mr. Stern and Mr. Burkle met twice more, and Mr. Burkle's security detail videotaped the conversations.

A spokesman for Mr. Burkle issued a statement yesterday that repeated that Mr. Stern had sought money in return for "Mr. Stern's 'efforts' to stop the publication of false reports about Mr. Burkle."

"Mr. Burkle followed the government's instructions from the onset," the statement said.

"Mr. Burkle didn't question their decisions previously," the statement said, "and he isn't going to start doing so now."

A spokesman for The Post, Howard J. Rubenstein, said, "The Post is pleased that there is no crime involved."

The Post suspended Mr. Stern when it reported the allegations.

Mr. Stern said yesterday that if The Post offered to reinstate him, “I’d consider it.” Mr. Rubenstein said The Post would not comment on “a personnel matter.”

After the articles about Mr. Burkle’s recordings appeared, several law enforcement officials suggested that the news accounts had precluded federal prosecutors and F.B.I. agents from making additional recordings and possibly collecting enough evidence to make a case.

Lawyers Question Lab's DNA Results (BOS)

By Jonathan Saltzman, Globe Staff

The Boston Globe, January 24, 2007

Might affect Entwistle, others

Showing the widening fallout from the mishandling of DNA test results at the State Police lab, the lawyers in three high-profile murder cases challenged the reliability of such test results and suggested the problems could help their clients.

A lawyer for Neil Entwistle, whose DNA was allegedly found on the gun used to kill his wife and infant daughter, said the suspension of Robert E. Pino, the civilian administrator of the DNA database at the State Police forensic laboratory, "calls into question the reliability, trustworthiness, and integrity" of the lab and should be investigated by an independent forensic scientist.

The FBI began an audit of the laboratory last week because Pino allegedly failed to report 11 matches in old unsolved rape cases until the statute of limitations had expired and reported four test results incorrectly.

But Entwistle's lawyer, Elliot M. Weinstein, said in an interview that the bureau has had its own deficiencies with DNA analysis in recent years and lacks credibility.

Weinstein, who unsuccessfully asked a judge last fall to toss out DNA evidence against Entwistle, declined to say whether he intends to submit a new motion on the basis of Pino's suspension. But his comments indicate that defense lawyers will probably cite the lab's problems as reasons that judges should block DNA results from being introduced as evidence, that juries should discount such evidence, or that convictions should be overturned.

Also yesterday, lawyer Robert A. George said he expects that Pino's actions will form the basis of challenges in two other high-profile murder cases: Christopher M. McCowen's conviction in November of the murder of Christa Worthington, and Edward S. O'Brien's 1997 conviction in the slaying of his best friend's mother. George represented both defendants.

McCowen, a Hyannis trash collector, was sentenced to life in prison for raping and killing Worthington, a fashion writer, after prosecutors presented evidence that his DNA was recovered at her Truro house. O'Brien is serving a life sentence for killing Janet Downing when he was 15; DNA tests indicated that blood found in her Somerville home matched O'Brien's. Pino testified in the O'Brien case.

"Every lawyer who cares about whether justice was done in their cases will pursue whether Pino's involvement has destroyed the conviction," George said in an interview. "To assume that we're being told the truth about the depth of Pino's involvement in compromised cases is the equivalent of having the wool pulled over our eyes. I don't believe it, and no one else should either."

Kelly A. Nantel -- spokeswoman for the Executive Office of Public Safety, which oversees the State Police lab -- said Pino's alleged lapses had nothing to do with the reliability of DNA test results.

"We're talking about administrative problems," she said. "We're not talking about problems with the science."

A spokesman for Middlesex District Attorney Gerard T. Leone Jr., whose office is prosecuting Entwistle in a trial scheduled to start Oct. 1, said prosecutors are confident that the DNA evidence will pass muster.

Beyond saying that he remains an employee and that the allegations are under investigation, Pino has declined comment.

Pino, who was suspended with pay Jan. 11, oversaw the state's Combined DNA Indexing System, a computerized databank that matches DNA profiles of convicted felons with samples collected at crime scenes and analyzed by civilian scientists at the Sudbury facility or at private labs.

Weinstein said Pino's alleged actions cast doubts on the credibility of all DNA evidence handled by the lab. "The public is entitled to know that its crime laboratory is generating scientifically reliable test results," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0120815

He also said the FBI is not suited to review the lab's practices because it has had problems of its own. In 2003, for example, the Justice Department's inspector general investigated an FBI lab unit after a technician failed to follow required procedure in analyzing DNA evidence and went undetected for two years.

GOP Urges Berger Lie Test (WT)

By Jerry Seper, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

Eighteen House Republicans have urged the Justice Department to proceed with a polygraph test for Samuel R. Berger, the former national security adviser who agreed to take the test as part of a plea of guilty of stealing documents from the National Archives.

"This may be the only way for anyone to know whether Mr. Berger denied the 9/11 commission and the public the complete account of the Clinton administration's actions or inactions during the lead-up to the terrorist attacks on the United States," the congressmen said in their letter to Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales.

The congressmen -- led by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III of Virginia -- said a prompt lie-detector test is needed to determine the extent of Mr. Berger's thievery, especially because the former Clinton administration adviser reviewed original documents for which there were no copies or inventory.

Other signers of the letter are Reps. Duncan Hunter, Darrell Issa and Brian Bilbray of California, John L. Mica of Florida, F. James Sensenbrenner Jr. of Wisconsin, Dan Burton and Mark Souder of Indiana, Christopher Shays of Connecticut, John M. McHugh of New York, Chris Cannon of Utah, John J. "Jimmy" Duncan Jr. of Tennessee, Michael R. Turner of Ohio, Kenny Marchant of Texas, Lynn Westmoreland of Georgia, Patrick T. McHenry and Virginia Foxx of North Carolina and Bill Sali of Idaho.

Mr. Davis, former chairman and now ranking Republican on the House Government Reform Committee, released a report by his staff on Jan. 9, saying a Justice Department investigation of Mr. Berger's admitted document theft was "remarkably incurious."

The report said the theft compromised national security "much more than originally disclosed" and resulted in "incomplete and misleading" information to the September 11 commission. It said Mr. Berger was willing to go to "extraordinary lengths to compromise national security, apparently for his own convenience."

In October, Mr. Davis led an effort to hold hearings to determine whether any documents were "destroyed, removed or were missing" after visits by Mr. Berger to the Archives. He said the full extent of Mr. Berger's document removal "can never be known" and the Justice Department could not assure the September 11 commission that it received all the documents to which Mr. Berger had access.

Mr. Davis said that during sentencing, Mr. Berger agreed to a polygraph examination as part of a plea deal, but Justice never administered the test, according to two Justice officials closely connected to the case -- John Dion, chief of the counterespionage section, and Bruce Swartz, deputy assistant attorney general for the Criminal Division.

He said Mr. Berger assured the commission that it received all the documents it sought but that some of the papers Mr. Berger examined were originals for which there were no copies or inventory. He said there is no way to know whether Mr. Berger returned all of those documents.

Lanny Breuer, Mr. Berger's attorney, has said the matter was thoroughly investigated by the Justice Department for more than two years and effectively closed for more than a year. He said the report's conclusions were based on "pure conjecture."

"Sandy Berger made a mistake. But he has admitted that mistake, fully cooperated with the government's investigation, paid his debt to society, and moved on. It's time for the new congressional minority to do the same."

Justice Department spokes-man Bryan Sierra has said the department "has no evidence that Sandy Berger's actions deprived the 9/11 commission of documents, and we stand by our investigation of this matter."

Mr. Berger pleaded guilty in April 2005 to a misdemeanor charge of unauthorized removal and retention of classified material, including documents outlining the government's knowledge of terrorist threats to the United States. Fined $50,000 and barred from access to classified material for three years, he faced a year in prison and a $100,000 fine, but his plea deal reduced the fine and kept him out of prison.

Schools Act To Short-Circuit Spread Of 'Cyberbullying' (WSJ)

By Anne Marie Chaker

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

New Laws, Policies Attempt To Address Harassment That Originates Off Campus

Kylie Kenney heard a crescendo of whispers and jeers as she moved through an otherwise unremarkable eighth-grade school day. The reason: Word had spread of a Web site posted by some of her peers, titled "Kill Kylie Incorporated."

The site featured a list of crude insults, beneath the heading: "She's queer because... ." It seemed everyone in school had read it. Distressed, she reported the site to the school but says that the impact of the bullying was so severe that she eventually changed schools. "I still have emotional damage," says Kylie, now a 10th-grader.

Kylie's story underscores a growing problem for school administrators and local officials: how to handle so-called cyberbullying. As long as there have been kids, there have been bullies. Now, emboldened by the anonymity available online, a bully can be nastier -- and with the click of a mouse, have a far broader audience -- than in the past. What may once have been snickers in the hallway can now be an excruciatingly public humiliation spread via email, text messaging and online teen forums.

Schools and local officials have been hearing increasing calls from parents to step in. But educators are torn between the desire to stop bad behavior and the limits on their ability to intervene. Much of the badmouthing takes place on home computers and off school grounds, where schools have little or no authority. An official at Kylie's former school, Frederick H. Tuttle Middle School in South Burlington, Vt., declined to discuss specifics of her case, though an attorney says, "The school acted appropriately in all respects."

Now, school officials, states and even Web sites are taking action. Educators and state legislatures in Florida, South Carolina, Utah, Oregon and elsewhere are creating new policies that deal with cyberbullying, either incorporating electronic harassment into existing bullying policies, or spelling it out as an entirely new threat. In doing so, they are often crafting language that allows educators to intervene even in off-campus incidents if the activity affects the school environment.

MySpace.com, the popular networking site, last fall released a guide for school administrators, advising them to contact the site about false or offensive user profiles or to report threats or cyberbullying. It also created a hotline and email address for the exclusive use of school officials to contact MySpace.

The challenge is that students, like everyone else, have First Amendment rights that school officials can't cross. In 1969, the Supreme Court ruled that to suppress student speech on campus, a public school must show it aims to prevent "substantial disruption" in the classroom rather than "a mere desire to avoid the discomfort and unpleasantness that always accompany an unpopular viewpoint."

Later this year, the justices will consider whether public school officials can suppress student speech off campus, in a case where a Juneau, Alaska, high-school principal suspended a student for unfurling a banner reading "Bong Hits 4 Jesus" on a sidewalk where students had gathered. The case could have implications for other forms of off-campus speech, such as online postings.

Some schools aren't waiting. In Florida, the Pasco County school board added language about cyberbullying to its code of conduct for the current school year. Its language states that "the school board has no duty to regulate or review off-campus Internet messages, statements postings, or acts" but adds that when those acts "threaten violence against another student or otherwise disrupts the learning environment or orderly conduct of the school," the school can take action, from conferencing in parents and students, to expulsion.

Linda Crosthwait, assistant principal at Leawood Middle School in Leawood, Kan., has her own rule of thumb for mean-spirited rumors online: "If it's carried into the classroom in some way -- a fight in school or something said in school -- then [the posting] becomes a piece of what we can deal with," she says.

These positions reflect the growing view of many school officials that electronic harassment that happens off campus can affect a student's education -- and therefore be a punishable offense. In Oregon last year, the state association of school boards consulted with the state Justice Department to draft policy language specific to cyberbullying. While state law already requires school districts to have a bullying policy in place, local districts wanted additional clarification.

The guidance provided from the state association says that "any form of harassment using electronic devices...is prohibited and will not be tolerated in the district." It leaves open the possibility that the school's reach could extend off campus.

"There's always the legal discussion of 'if it doesn't happen at school, can a district take action?'" says Joe Wehrli, policy-services director for the Oregon School Boards Association. "If a student is harassed for three hours at night on the Web and they come to school and have to sit in the same classroom with the student that's the bully, there is an effect on education, and in that way, there is a direct link to schools," he argues.

The decisions aren't easy. The National School Boards Association hosted an online discussion two months ago titled "Postings, Protection and Policies: What School Leaders Need to Know About Teen Hangouts" -- specifically online forums. Lawyer Kimberly Jessie Cunningham advised school leaders to warn parents that "the district is limited in its ability to discipline" bad behavior online. She characterized "substantial disruption" under the law as including such things as shutting down the school computer system for multiple days because too many students attempted to access bullying comments online.

"School administrators need to understand that their authority stops at the schoolhouse door," says Witold J. Walczak, legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union of Pennsylvania.

Jill Eckel, principal at Sussex County Charter School for Technology, a middle school in Sparta, N.J., recently got wind of a student's MySpace page laced with discussion of an upcoming fight involving students at her school. But the brawl was to take place away from campus.

"I sat for a long time, thinking, 'Is it my responsibility to call the parents?'" Ms. Eckel recalls. "I've had parents tell me it's not my business" to patrol online activity. In the end, she says, she alerted a parent she trusted, who in turn got in touch with the parents involved.

At Pope John XXIII High School in Sparta, N.J., principal Msgr. Kieran McHugh aims to keep it simple. He outright banned the use of MySpace last school year after hearing about students posting content he considered inappropriate. Now, "we monitor it," says Father McHugh, who has contacted parents when students have been found posting on the site. That, he says, has eliminated any further instances. As a private organization, a Catholic school has more leeway over student conduct than does a public school, since it isn't bound by the same First Amendment rules that limit government suppression of speech. (By the same token, a private religious school can mandate prayer or religious lessons, which public schools may not.)

Several states passed laws or other measures in 2006 that addressed bullying that can happen in cyberspace. Idaho's law that seeks to prohibit student bullying and harassment allows that such acts can be "committed through the use of a land line, car phone or wireless telephone or through the use of data or computer software that is accessed through a computer, computer system or computer network."

South Carolina's Safe School Climate Act to prevent school bullying includes "electronic communication" in its definition of harassment.

In a new rule that went into effect earlier this month, Utah's State Board of Education amended its existing discipline guidelines for districts to include policies specific to bullying. The changes also included a definition of cyberbullying, requiring districts to offer students and teachers training that would broadly address "electronic means for aggression inside or outside of school."

CIVIL LAW:

'Bankruptcy Boot Camps' Gird Attorneys For Battle (WSJ)

By Kristina Doss

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

Creditors beware: O. Max Gardner III is planning to train an army of consumer bankruptcy attorneys at his Bankruptcy Boot Camps this year.

DOJ_NMG_0120818

His mission isn't to beef up attorneys' muscles with a regimen of sit-ups or push-ups. Rather, Mr. Gardner's goal is to teach them the fine art of overcoming the hurdles put in place by bankruptcy legislation that creditors helped to pass in 2005.

Mr. Gardner, who started the boot camps last August, believes the new law is punitive toward debtor attorneys and makes it harder for consumers to file for bankruptcy-court protection.

"I felt like if the creditors really wanted reform, I would give it to them, but my style," Mr. Gardner said, "I'm training an army of consumer advocates that will actively and aggressively look beyond just the bankruptcy in consumer bankruptcy cases, [at] all other remedies that may be available."

The Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act, which took effect in October 2005, ushered in sweeping changes to the federal bankruptcy code that affected both consumers and businesses in financial trouble.

Critics contend that the new law made it harder for consumers to file for bankruptcy protection and that it was essentially drafted by lobbyists for banks and credit-card companies.

Some judges have expressed that view, too. In a court opinion last year, Judge Frank R. Monroe of the U.S. Bankruptcy Court in Austin, Texas, said that "the parties pushing the passage of the Act" appeared to have "an agenda to make more money off the backs of the consumers in this country."

Mr. Gardner, who has been a consumer-bankruptcy attorney for nearly three decades, said he plans to help boot-camp attendees fight back by putting them through a four-day seminar to "de-program" and "re-engineer" their practices.

Consumer-bankruptcy attorneys tend to focus on filing a bankruptcy petition for their clients and getting their debts discharged, he said.

At Mr. Gardner's boot camps, which are held on his sprawling North Carolina farm, attorneys will learn that there is a whole lot more they can do for their clients. Boot-camp attendees will be trained to find bogus fees that creditors are charging their clients, violations of the automatic stay and laws meant to protect consumers' pocketbooks.

When those things are found, Mr. Gardner teaches boot-camp attendees how to go after the creditors by filing lawsuits.

One hot topic that campers are eager to learn about involves the mortgage industry, attendees said. For example, after a client buys a home, their mortgage is often sold to a mortgage servicer.

"Gardner has discovered and revealed that these mortgage servicers are engaged in a practice that costs additional expense to borrowers," said Bradford Botes, who will assist Mr. Gardner at the camp and is a principal of Bond & Botes P.C.

Mr. Gardner teaches attorneys to question why a mortgage servicer is, for example, charging a client a property-inspection fee of $9.17 a month or a broker-opinion fee of $200 a month, according to consumer bankruptcy attorney Andrew Miofsky, who has attended a boot camp.

"Is a mortgage servicer really sending people out to your client's home each month to inspect the property and do an appraisal?" Mr. Miofsky asked mockingly.

Besides learning how to identify and fight dubious fees and violations, boot-camp attendees will learn how to set up more efficient law practices by using electronic technology instead of paper and outsourcing most legal services.

Of course, the effort isn't purely altruistic. Consumer-bankruptcy attorneys also stand to make more money by knowing the ins and outs of the system. Suing creditors could lead to huge settlements or winning a lawsuit could lead to the creditors having to pay attorneys' fees.

"You don't need to handle thousands of cases a year in order to make a lot of money," said Kevin Chern, a former boot-camp attendee, and president of Total Bankruptcy Inc. and Start Fresh Today Inc. "You can make five times as much [by just knowing how to] look at these claims."

The four-day sessions involve classes led by Mr. Gardner that last for 12 hours each day, and the subject matter is complex.

It also isn't cheap: The price of attendance is $7,775, although many of those who have attended the boot camp said they considered the money well spent. Each camper gets a compact disk that he or she can take home, containing forms, letters, pleadings and articles to implement all of the lessons learned. Each graduate also is added to a Listserv, gains access to all current and future documents via a Web site and can contact fellow attendees or Mr. Gardner for advice.

Party Primary System Wins Federal Approval (BRADV)

By Marsha Shuler, Advocate Capitol News Bureau

Baton Rouge Advocate, January 24, 2007

The U.S. Justice Department has cleared the way for Louisiana to return to a party primary system for congressional elections starting in 2008.

Justice Department Voting Rights Chief John Tanner's office advised state officials of the sign-off on legislation the Legislature approved in June.

The state Attorney General's Office released the letter Tuesday.

Sen. Cleo Fields, D-Baton Rouge, pushed the law to end the practice of Louisiana electing its congressmen after other states across the nation.

"The issue should be squarely behind us and we can elect members of Congress at the same time as everybody else does," Fields said Tuesday.

Under the plan, Democrats and Republicans would hold party primary elections with winners facing each other in a general election along with nonparty candidates who want to make the race.

The election schedule would allow winners of the party primaries and other party candidates to face each other on federal Election Day — the first Tuesday after the first Monday of November.

That's a move away from the open primary system, where all candidates regardless of party have vied against one another on the November ballot.

If nobody won outright, the two top vote-getters would face off in a December election.

U.S. District Judge Frank Polozola set the schedule in 1998 to prevent Louisiana from electing its U.S. senators and representatives before Election Day.

Polozola set the schedule as part of a 1995 lawsuit that sought to get the state to return to the party primary system for federal elections. Instead, Polozola allowed the open primary to continue and changed the dates.

Polozola's schedule led to Louisiana electing some of its members of congress after everyone else in the nation.

Fields and others complained that the December election put some freshmen congressmen at a disadvantage when it came to jockeying for committee assignments and office space.

The new law does not affect elections for state and local offices such as governor and town council members, which would remain "open primary."

No Court Consensus On Voter ID Laws (USAT)

By Joan Biskupic

USA Today, January 24, 2007

Voter identification laws, adopted by states in recent years amid concerns about fraud, are getting mixed reviews as courts weigh whether they unconstitutionally keep some people from the polls.

State courts in Georgia and Missouri last fall invalidated laws that required voters to show photo ID each time they cast ballots. Georgia and Missouri are among 11 states that have passed such laws since 2003, inspired partly by allegations of voter fraud raised in Florida and elsewhere during the 2000 elections.

The Georgia law, blocked by federal and state judges, required people to show one of six government-issued forms of photo identification, such as a driver's license or passport. In the most recent challenge to the law, brought by voters who said they couldn't cast ballots because they did not have photo IDs, a judge ruled in September that Georgia's requirement put an unconstitutional condition on voting. Previously, state polling places had long accepted utility bills, bank statements and other types of non-photo ID as proof of residency.

In October, Missouri's Supreme Court struck down the state's requirement that registered voters show a state or federal photo ID to cast a ballot. The judges said the law was an illegal hurdle for poor, elderly and disabled residents.

DOJ_NMG_0120820

Elsewhere, however, federal appeals courts have not been as willing to reject voter ID laws.

On Jan. 4, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 7th Circuit upheld Indiana's law requiring voters show photo ID in each election. Voting 2-1, the panel rejected claims by the state Democratic Party and others that the law violates the voting rights of those without easy access to such IDs.

Even as they upheld Indiana's law, Judge Richard Posner, joined by Judge Diane Sykes, cited the politics surrounding voter ID laws. "Most people who don't have photo ID are low on the economic ladder and … are more likely to vote for Democratic than Republican candidates," Posner wrote. He noted, however, that it's difficult to maneuver today without a photo ID and that "the vast majority of adults" have one.

Dissenting Judge Terence Evans sharply criticized the law: "Let's not beat around the bush: The Indiana voter photo ID law is a not-too-thinly-veiled attempt to discourage Election Day turnout by certain folks believed to skew Democratic."

Meanwhile, a three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 9th Circuit has expressed skepticism about arguments that Arizona's voter ID law should be thrown out. The Arizona law is widely viewed as the nation's strictest because it requires voters to prove they are not just state residents, but also U.S. citizens.

Thomas Hudson, attorney for a group of challengers, told the appeals panel Jan. 8 that the law is like a poll tax because of the cost to Native Americans and others who may have difficulty obtaining birth certificates, passports or other documents to prove citizenship. The judges, who have not issued an opinion in the case, asked for evidence of the law's impact — including whether there was any record of how many Native Americans did not have IDs that would prove citizenship.

Hudson said he believed "thousands" of Native Americans could be affected but acknowledged that specific evidence had not been gathered. The 9th Circuit judges suggested by their questions that they would return the case to a trial court to get such answers.

"Much of the future litigation will be about finding real people who are adversely affected" by ID policies, says Richard Hasen, a professor at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles who specializes in election law. He adds, however, "There is not yet very good empirical evidence" to support either side: that many voters are being disenfranchised by ID requirements or that voter fraud is rampant.

Media Outlets Battle It Out Over Free-speech Rights (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, January 24, 2007

LOS ANGELES — In a dispute between the "new media" of the Internet and the "old media" of broadcasting, liberal bloggers and conservative talk-radio hosts are accusing each other of trampling the First Amendment's guarantees of free speech.

Hundreds of blogs are exhorting national advertisers not to buy commercial time on Disney-owned KSFO-AM in San Francisco because some on-air hosts have made comments that the bloggers allege are racist or encourage violence.

KSFO personalities say the bloggers are trying to muzzle their political views. The bloggers say they're rallying behind the free-speech rights of a colleague whose website was briefly shut down after Disney's ABC network threatened to sue over alleged copyright violations.

Some advertisers, including Bank of America and MasterCard, have deserted KSFO since an anonymous media critic identifying himself online as Spocko began posting recordings of the station's "Hot Talk" hosts. Spocko and some of his readers have been e-mailing the audio to KSFO advertisers since 2005, asking the companies whether they want to be associated with the controversial rhetoric.

The First Amendment flap was debated Sunday on CNN's Reliable Sources. Dan Riehl, a blogger critical of Spocko, said some of the radio hosts' comments "were blown out of proportion or misrepresented" in the complaints to sponsors. Mike Stark, another blogger and a Spocko ally, said: "The way to fight free speech that you disagree with is to engage in more free speech. And that's exactly what Spocko did."

Examples of commentary that riles the bloggers:

DOJ_NMG_0120821

•In November, morning co-host Melanie Morgan said of then-incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, a San Francisco Democrat: "We've got a bull's-eye painted on her big, wide, laughing eyes."

•Evening host Brian Sussman in December referred to Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., who has a Kenyan father and a white American mother, as a "halfrican." In October 2005, Sussman asked a caller to prove he wasn't a Muslim by saying "Allah is a whore."

•In October, host Lee Rodgers warned "enemy" Muslim nations: "You keep screwing around with stuff like this, we're going to kill a bunch of you — millions of you."

Spocko says on his blog that he won't identify himself because he fears retaliation from powerful conservative commentators.

KSFO parent ABC did retaliate. A network lawyer on Dec. 21 sent a "cease and desist" letter to Spocko's Internet service provider, saying the blogger was using copyrighted KSFO content "without authorization." The service provider, 1&1 Internet, shut down the blog on Jan. 2. Neil Simpkins, a 1&1 spokesman, says, "The decision was made to remove the copyrighted material from our servers until the matter is resolved." He says the notice posed a "credible risk" of being sued.

Spocko then e-mailed the KSFO audio to Stark, who posted it to the popular liberal blog Daily Kos. Stark urged other bloggers to install the sound bites in a "blogswarm" to defy ABC. At last count, more than 500 blogs posted the audio clips and asked viewers to forward them to advertisers, Stark says.

Spocko's website (spockosbrain.com) returned to cyberspace Jan. 6 through another Web host. The blog has free legal representation from the San Francisco-based Electronic Frontier Foundation (EFF), which advocates free speech on the Internet.

Matt Zimmerman, an EFF lawyer, says the first Web host surrendered too quickly to ABC's "saber-rattling." Spocko's use of the KSFO content comes "squarely" under federal law that protects "fair use" of copyrighted material for criticism and commentary, Zimmerman says.

MasterCard and the state-run Michigan Economic Development Corp. say they advertised on KSFO talk shows last year but won't place new ads. "It's hard to listen to those clips and not be offended," says Mike Shore, spokesman for the Michigan agency.

Bank of America says it withdrew ads last spring. The California chapter of the American Automobile Association says it pulled an insurance ad from Sussman's show in September.

KSFO claimed on its website that it is the victim of "an anonymous Internet smear campaign." The station canceled three hours of regular programs Jan. 12 and put the talk hosts on the air to explain their remarks.

During that broadcast, Morgan said ABC had reissued guidelines about "violent" commentary. "We don't believe we have crossed a single line," she said. "If you're waiting for an apology, you'll be waiting a long time," Rodgers said. When Stark called in, Rodgers called him a creep.

Sussman repeated an apology for his Obama remark and said he sometimes went over the line in talking 20 hours a week. Rodgers and other hosts complained that liberals are ganging up to threaten their jobs. "I will not be silenced by the left," Rodgers said.

"Yes, this is a freedom of speech issue, and this individual is entitled to say what he wants to," Morgan told the San Francisco Chronicle. "But he's trying to take away my livelihood, and I'm not trying to take away his."

Zimmerman says Spocko's rights are in more peril than the station's. "ABC/Disney tried to use the legal process to silence a critic who was actually amplifying their speech," he says. "Spocko was doing exactly what the First Amendment is designed to do — promote this marketplace of ideas."

Zimmerman says he'll defend Spocko if ABC sues, "which we don't think they will, at this point."

ABC, Disney and KSFO declined to comment.

"I think Disney learned a lesson," Stark says. "Strong-arm tactics on the blogosphere just don't work."

Antitrust Issues 'key Barrier' To Delta Merger (FT)

By Doug Cameron In Chicago

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

Antitrust concerns have re-emerged as the key barrier in US Airways' hostile pursuit of Delta Air Lines, according to aviation financiers surveyed by the Financial Times.

The airlines' chief executives will face off on Wednesday before a Senate hearing on airline consolidation, which both sides view as a key test of political sentiment for deals involving the largest US carriers.

Doug Parker, US Airways' chairman and chief executive, is adamant that a deal which would create the world's largest airline would be cleared by the Justice department.

He is expected to provide assurances to the Senate commerce, science and transportation committee that the merger with its larger rival would not lead to higher fares or reduced service to smaller communities.

Jerry Grinstein, his opposite number at Delta, argues the airlines' overlap on the US east coast would see it blocked on competition grounds, though has entertained discussions with Northwest about a potential combination when both emerge from bankruptcy protection.

Delta is reviewing final bids from banks to provide exit financing for its planned exit from bankruptcy as a standalone carrier, which could include private equity investment.

US Airways has already lined up more than $8bn in funding from Citigroup and Morgan Stanley to back its offer, and has set a February 1 deadline for Delta creditors to force airline management to the negotiating table and trigger an antitrust review.

While creditors, advised by former Continental Airlines chief executive Gordon Bethune, are reviewing the competing financial benefits of US Airways' raised bid and Delta's plan, financiers said the antitrust issue is assuming greater importance.

"Finance is not the issue," said one banker, noting there are funds available to back any of the potential combinations which could emerge if lawmakers and regulators signal a change in the industry climate. Six of the seven largest carriers have held talks on potential combinations.

The justice department effectively scuppered deals between United and US Airways and American and Northwest at the start of the decade. However, Mr Parker and other executives said the expanding role of low-cost rivals such as Southwest has intensified competition.

Another financier bidding on the Delta funding believes that the chances of regulatory approval have dropped to 50/50.

Big Bank Stops Effort To Change Law Limiting Growth (NYT)

By Eric Dash

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

Bank of America's chairman and chief executive, Kenneth D. Lewis, said yesterday that the company was backing away from a quiet lobbying effort to change a federal law that could prevent it from making major acquisitions.

Just weeks after agreeing to initiate discussions with lawmakers to raise the possibility of lifting the 10 percent federal deposit cap, Kenneth D. Lewis said that he had told bank representatives to "back off" from those plans.

"I thought we had gotten out there a little too far in terms of our level of aggressiveness, and it sent the wrong signals," Mr. Lewis said in an interview yesterday. About two weeks ago, he made the decision to halt the political effort, he said.

Bank of America, which has about $693.5 billion, or just over 9 percent of the nation's deposits, had argued in a position paper that the law restricting a bank to no more than 10 percent of the nation's deposits is "antiquated, conceptually flawed" and anticompetitive.

While American banks are prevented from increasing their deposit base through acquisitions that might push them over the federal threshold, foreign banks face no similar restrictions. The bank also argues that the law is unnecessary because of antitrust laws, state regulations and market forces.

But as the only bank near the 10 percent limit, Bank of America has found itself with virtually no allies. JPMorgan Chase, the next largest deposit holder, could acquire all but the five biggest banks and still remain under the federal cap. Wachovia, Wells Fargo and Citigroup, the next banks in line, have potentially even more room and time.

Smaller community banks, meanwhile, have vowed to fight any move to lift the cap.

A Wells Fargo spokesman said the bank also opposed lifting the cap, preferring to stick to its internal growth strategy that does not come close to hitting the limit. JPMorgan declined to comment, while Wachovia and Citigroup said they had no position on the subject.

On Capitol Hill, the proposed change has met with a lukewarm reception. Representative Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrat who heads the House Financial Services Committee, has suggested that lifting the cap may be part of some sort of "grand compromise" between Wall Street and Main Street interests. There does not appear to be much enthusiasm, but other lawmakers have not dismissed the idea out of hand.

Bank of America's backpedaling is either the recognition of a rare misstep or a shrewd calculation for Mr. Lewis, who is known for his deliberate approach to corporate strategy.

On the one hand, reports of the plans were a reminder of the bank's bigger ambitions, leading to speculation that it was setting the stage to engage in a major deal. On the other, it may be a way of taking the temperature of a new Democratic-controlled Congress while planting the idea in people's minds. Typically, it takes years to pass legislation to repeal banking laws like those governing interstate banking.

"They are testing the waters and seeing what is out there," said Brian Gardner, a policy analyst with Keefe, Bruyette & Woods. With several Democratic lawmakers representing areas like New York that have strong banking ties, the perception that Democrats are less open to the idea of raising the cap may be wrong, he said. "It makes a lot of sense to probe and see how far the Democrats are willing to go."

Bank of America's plans may also underscore the challenge it faces in sustaining its robust growth.

Yesterday, Bank of America said fourth-quarter earnings rose 47 percent.

Much of that growth, however, was from the recognition of unusually large gains on its equity investments as well as new profits from the recently acquired MBNA.

Many of the biggest costs have been flushed out. And without the investment gains, internal growth appears to have stopped or slowed.

Over all, the bank earned $5.26 billion, or $1.16 a share, from a restated $3.57 billion, or 88 cents, in the quarter a year ago. Fourth-quarter profits for its global consumer and small- business operations rose 44 percent, to $2.53 billion, with the additional boost from MBNA. Its corporate and investment banking earnings rose 23 percent, to $1.57 billion, at a time when much bigger Wall Street investment bankers — with more commodities and international exposure — posted huge gains in the quarter. Profits at Bank of America's wealth management and investment businesses declined 1 percent.

The American economy, meanwhile, may be slowing. A downturn in the credit cycle is on the horizon if not already here.

"You know the headwinds will mute earnings growth; you also know that our businesses will perform quite well," said Joe Price, Bank of America's chief financial officer, in his first conference call with analysts and investors since succeeding Alvaro de Molina at the start of this year. "The biggest question for us is the health of the American economy, and we think we are in pretty good shape."

Some Wall Street analysts suggest Bank of America is at a strategic crossroads, balancing internal growth with bigger ambitions. One path that is unlikely to be taken, at least for now, is a major acquisition.

The federal deposit cap severely limits Bank of America's ability to buy a big bank in the United States. And on the conference call, Mr. Lewis seemed to rule out making a major European deal.

"I think a European acquisition will cause us to pause; that's not what we are thinking about," Mr. Lewis said.

Stolt-Nielsen Sues To See Other Justice Antitrust Amnesty Agreements (LAW)

By Sue Reisinger, Corporate Counsel

Corporate Counsel, January 24, 2007

Company wants to know if it's being singled out

The Stolt-Nielsen Transportation Group wants to know why it's been singled out for special treatment by the government. The Norwegian shipping giant has sued the U.S. Department of Justice under the Freedom of Information Act, demanding that antitrust officials release scores of confidential deals that they've reached with other companies. Of the roughly 100 businesses that have signed amnesty agreements with Justice's antitrust division, Stolt-Nielsen is the only one to have subsequently been indicted.

Why does Stolt-Nielsen want to pore through these deals? For one thing, it wants to know whether any of these other agreements specified a date by which companies had to cease their alleged wrongdoing. Antitrust officials indicted Stolt-Nielsen's U.S. subsidiary in September, claiming that it continued to engage in price-fixing even after it said it had stopped. Stolt-Nielsen responds that the subsidiary halted the misconduct by the time that it signed its amnesty agreement in January 2003 and that the deal didn't set a deadline for when it had to clean up its act.

Stolt-Nielsen's attorneys declined to comment for this story, but lawyers close to the case say that the company hopes to compare the text of its deal with those that the antitrust division struck with other businesses, as well as with the division's model amnesty agreement. These attorneys say that Stolt-Nielsen wants to show that other agreements usually included a date by which illegal conduct had to be halted.

Justice spokeswoman Gina Talamona says that the antitrust division considers amnesty applicants to be "confidential sources," and will disclose their agreements "only if required to do so by a court in connection with litigation."

While about 20 of the amnesty deals that the antitrust division has reached since 1993 have become public through court cases or company regulatory filings, the other 80 remain shrouded in secrecy. The amnesty agreements are distinct from the 55 deferred and nonprosecution agreements that the Justice Department's criminal division has struck with corporate defendants since 1992. All but four of those DPAs and NPAs have been made public.

The case against Stolt-Nielsen began in 2002, when the antitrust division started looking into claims that the company's Greenwich, Conn.-based subsidiary engaged in a price-fixing scheme with its competitors. When it signed its deal with Justice in January 2003, Stolt-Nielsen was granted amnesty in exchange for its cooperation in prosecuting the other shippers. But six months later, antitrust officials announced that the agreement was invalid. They said that Stolt-Nielsen had lied during settlement negotiations, claiming that the price-fixing had ended sooner than it really had. So the government filed a criminal complaint against the company in federal district court in Philadelphia, alleging antitrust violations.

Stolt-Nielsen fought the complaint all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court, first trying to block and then kill its eventual indictment. But this past October the high court ruled that the district court handling the case should determine whether the company's amnesty agreement is still valid. If the district court decides that it is, it could dismiss the indictment.

Even as they were trying to head off the looming indictment, Stolt-Nielsen's attorneys filed a dozen FOIA requests, starting in June 2005. Among other things, the company asked for copies of all of the amnesty agreements that still remain confidential. While the antitrust division has handed over a dozen or so pages here and there in response to Stolt-Nielsen's requests, it has withheld hundreds more, according to court filings by both parties over the past year. Justice lawyers have cited exemptions in FOIA that allow the department to protect confidential sources and to avoid "interference with enforcement proceedings." (Corporate Counsel has also submitted an FOIA request for copies of the amnesty deals.)

In response to the denial of its FOIA applications, Stolt-Nielsen sued the Justice Department in federal district court in Washington, D.C., in November 2005. In its most recent request for summary judgment, filed this past October, Stolt-Nielsen accused Justice of stonewalling. "When the government itself embarks on a public campaign to tarnish a company's reputation, that company is entitled to each and every communication [relevant to] that campaign," the company argues. A ruling could come down on Stolt-Nielsen's request as early as February.

One former Justice Department official thinks that Stolt-Nielsen has a strong argument. Alison Smith, now a partner with Haynes and Boone, was a deputy assistant attorney general in the antitrust division during the George H.W. Bush administration. Justice's own stated policy, she says, is to treat as confidential only the identity of amnesty applicants and the information obtained from that applicant. In Smith's view, the department should be able to release agreements that have been redacted to protect confidential sources. (Smith is not involved with Stolt-Nielsen's case.)

In its briefs, Stolt-Nielsen specifically says that it will accept the release of amnesty agreements in which the names of the companies have been edited out, but that Justice still refuses to release them. If a judge grants the company's request, however, antitrust lawyers across the country may have a field day with blind items, trying to figure out who did what.

Judge Dismisses Online Phone Suit (AP)

By Alex Veiga, The Associated Press

AP, January 24, 2007

LOS ANGELES (AP) — A federal judge has thrown out an antitrust lawsuit filed by the distributor of Morpheus file-sharing software against Internet phone service provider Skype Technologies SA, eBay Inc. and other defendants.

StreamCast Networks Inc. had sought more than $4.1 billion in unspecified damages and a court order blocking eBay from selling Skype services. StreamCast claimed the founders of Skype broke an agreement to give StreamCast the right of first refusal for the technology behind Skype's Voice over Internet Protocol, or VoIP, service.

In her ruling Thursday on a motion for dismissal, U.S. District Court Judge Florence-Marie Cooper concluded that StreamCast failed to make its case for relief under federal antitrust laws and dismissed all claims against Skype, eBay and more than a dozen other defendants.

Cooper declined to exercise discretionary jurisdiction to consider state law claims such as unfair competition and fraudulent transfer.

Matthew A. Neco, StreamCast's general counsel, said the company will either appeal the ruling or seek to pursue claims in state court.

"This case is far from over," Neco said.

A call to eBay was not immediately returned.

In the lawsuit, StreamCast alleged that Skype's founders — who also developed the Kazaa online file-swapping software — took the phone technology with them after they sold Kazaa to another company and went on to wrongfully profit from its use.

Luxembourg-based Skype was acquired in 2005 by San Jose-based eBay for $2.6 billion.

MAN Withdraws €10.3bn Bid For Scania (FT)

By Richard Milne In Frankfurt And David Ibison In Stockholm

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

German truckmaker MAN on Tuesday withdrew its €10.3bn hostile bid for Scania, handing Sweden's powerful Wallenberg family victory in one of Europe's bitterest recent takeover battles.

All parties to the bid saga said they now hoped to conduct friendly discussions to see if a tie-up would be possible between the two truckmakers, as well as the truck assets of carmaker Volkswagen, the biggest shareholder of both MAN and Scania.

The withdrawal of the offer just eight days before it was due to expire puts VW and particularly Investor in a position to stamp their mark over any future discussions.

Several people on the German side said they now expected a new company to be established into which all the groups would be merged.

Both VW and Investor would hold large stakes in such a group, according to people briefed on the plans. But advisers on all sides said first there would be a cooling off period and that any eventual tie-up would "take months, not days or weeks." One adviser said: "The grass needs to grow on the battlefield."

Withdrawal of the offer will raise questions about the strategy and future of Hakan Samuelsson, MAN's chief executive and a former Scania manager.

Few industry executives or investment bankers understood his decision in September to proceed with an unsolicited bid without the support of two shareholders which, together, controlled two-thirds of Scania's shares.

Going hostile against the Wallenbergs, Sweden's most powerful industrial dynasty, in their home territory was seen as particularly daring.

But Mr Samuelsson was given the full support of his supervisory board as recently as Monday as speculation mounted that VW wanted to force him out.

The entanglement of shareholdings – MAN is Scania's third-largest shareholder while VW owns 34 per cent of Scania's voting rights and 20 per cent of MAN's – suggests the likelihood of a future deal.

DOJ_NMG_0120826

Investor and Scania would be happy to see the Swedish truckmaker remain independent, but the chances of that happening are slim since both have agreed that an alliance with MAN has “industrial merit”.

Investor can now ensure it retains a stake in any merged entity and that Scania participates meaningfully in the operations of any new company.

The chairmen of MAN, Investor and VW held talks last week aimed at creating a friendly atmosphere for discussions after Scania’s two largest shareholders reiterated their lack of support for a bid.

Advisers say a new company could be based in such locations as the Netherlands or Switzerland, but that any such decision remained some way off. “One company buying the other is now off the table. It wasn’t the terms of the offer that were wrong but the very concept of it,” one MAN adviser said.

Ruling Blocks Bid For Dofasco (BSUN)

By Allison Connolly, Sun Reporter

The Baltimore Sun, January 24, 2007

Dutch court denies ThyssenKrupp effort

A Dutch court yesterday tossed out a bid by ThyssenKrupp AG to force Arcelor Mittal to honor a pledge to sell Canadian steelmaker Dofasco, but it's not clear whether Mittal will sell either its steel plant in Sparrows Point or Weirton, W.Va.

The Justice Department gave Mittal until Jan. 28 to sell Dofasco Inc. to ensure it would not have a monopoly on tin production in the United States after its $33 billion merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA.

If Mittal is unable to sell Dofasco, a manufacturer of high-grade sheet metal for the North American auto industry, the Justice Department has said Mittal must sell either its Sparrows Point or Weirton facility.

Arcelor placed the profitable Dofasco in a Dutch trust early last year in an effort to fend off Mittal's hostile takeover bid. While Arcelor finally agreed to merge with Mittal, creating the world's largest steelmaker with annual production topping 110 million tons, it has no control over the trust.

The three trustees have already rejected a proposal by Mittal to sell Dofasco to Germany's ThyssenKrupp for $4.6 billion, less than the $4.86 billion that Arcelor paid for it.

Mittal said this month that it would not sue the trust to release Dofasco.

Rotterdam Court Judge F. van den Emster said yesterday that Mittal couldn't be "asked to do more than it has done so far" to complete the sale of Dofasco.

Shortly after yesterday's decision, ThyssenKrupp said in a statement that its chances of getting Dofasco were "very remote," and that it would "swiftly pursue" plans to build a steel mill in the United States. The company said previously that if it is unable to buy Dofasco, it would build a plant in Alabama, Arkansas or Louisiana at a cost of nearly $3 billion.

In response to yesterday's ruling, Mittal said that it "cannot be expected to do more than it has already done in order to seek dissolution of the [trust]."

It appears Mittal has given up trying to sell Dofasco. Last week, Mittal confirmed it was in negotiations with a Chicago-based steel distributor, Esmark Inc., to sell all or parts of Weirton, a large producer of tin plate. The two parties have signed a nonbinding memorandum of understanding, but any sale hinges on approval from the Justice Department. Late last year, Esmark gained control over nearby Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. and promised cash for Weirton if Mittal put it up for sale.

However, Justice has the final say about which plant is sold and to whom.

Gina Talamona, a spokeswoman for the Justice Department, said yesterday in an e-mail response that "the matter is still pending."

Mittal stock closed up $1.48 yesterday at $43.59 a share.

Bush Seeks Vast, Mandatory Increase In Alternative Fuels And Greater Vehicle Efficiency (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews And Felicity Barringer

New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 — President Bush, vowing to reduce the nation's thirst for foreign oil, called on Tuesday for a huge government-mandated increase in renewable fuels — mainly ethanol — and tougher mileage standards for cars and light trucks.

It was the second year in a row that Mr. Bush made "energy independence" a focal point of his State of the Union address, but his proposals on Tuesday were more ambitious, and perhaps less achievable, than those he made a year ago when he said the nation was "addicted to oil."

The centerpiece of Mr. Bush's proposal, which he said would cut the projected use of gasoline by 20 percent over the next decade, was a nearly fivefold mandatory increase in the production of ethanol and other alternative fuels for cars and trucks. The most obvious beneficiaries would be makers of ethanol and other biofuels, but it could also promote the production of liquefied coal.

Mr. Bush called for a mandatory requirement that makers of fuel produce 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels a year by 2017, replacing about 15 percent of the projected gasoline use in that year.

A second major plank of Mr. Bush's energy proposal calls for increasing fuel-efficiency standards of cars and trucks by 4 percent a year — about one mile per gallon — starting in 2010 for cars and 2012 for trucks.

That was a significant change from Mr. Bush's approach last year, when he called for "reform" of the corporate average fuel economy, or CAFE, rules, but avoided suggesting specific mileage requirements.

In a third proposal, Mr. Bush called for doubling the amount of oil in the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to about 1.5 billion barrels of oil. The doubling would take place at a snail's pace over the next 20 years. Even so, advance word of the idea helped push up oil prices by $2.46 a barrel on Tuesday to $55.04.

"It's a big change that the president has endorsed these new fuel-efficiency standards," said Frederick W. Smith, the chief executive of the FedEx Corporation and a co-chairman of the Energy Security Leadership Council, a group of executive and retired military officers. These standards, he said, match their recommendations, "which are achievable."

But the proposals face a slew of obstacles, both practical and political. On a practical level, skeptics noted that Mr. Bush's goal for ethanol would require big advances in "cellulosic ethanol," a form of ethanol made from plants like switchgrass that has yet to be produced at anything close to competitive prices. It could also require up to 40 million additional acres devoted to growing the plant material involved as well as a sprawling new infrastructure for transforming the feedstock into fuel.

On a political level, Mr. Bush faces a Congress that is now controlled by Democrats, some of whom criticized him on Tuesday for proposing little to reduce the production of greenhouse gases implicated in global warming.

"I am disappointed," said Senator Jeff Bingaman, Democrat of New Mexico and chairman of the Senate Energy Committee. He said Mr. Bush was "completely silent" on energy efficiency and reduction of carbon dioxide from electric power plants, which contribute 40 percent of these emissions.

Cars and trucks account for about one-third of greenhouse gases that result from burning fossil fuels. Electric utilities and other "smokestack" sources were not addressed.

"If this was a real effort to solve the climate problem, it would include large stationary sources and utilities," said Eileen Claussen, president of the Pew Center on Global Climate Change, a nonpartisan policy research group.

Ms. Claussen and other environmental leaders also criticized the absence of any proposal for a mandatory cap on greenhouse gas emissions.

Many supporters of ethanol and other renewable fuels praised Mr. Bush proposals. The Union of Concerned Scientists estimated that the mileage requirement could save 550,000 barrels of oil per day in 2017, and reduce emissions equivalent to "taking 14 million of today's cars and trucks off the road."

But many cautioned that the goals would be difficult to attain, might do little to reduce greenhouse gases and could lead to higher food prices as farmers cater to energy demand rather than food production.

DOJ_NMG_0120828

Philip Clapp, president of the National Environmental Trust, said, “The big numbers may sound impressive, but this is nothing more than stay-the-course on global warming.” The proposal, he said, represents a 1.5 percent cut in carbon emissions a decade hence. “They will still go up by 14 percent over the next decade.”

And if liquefied coal, which produces double the greenhouse gases of regular gasoline, is part of the alternative-fuel mix — as both coal-industry lobbyists and environmental groups say is the case — the emissions reductions would decrease significantly.

Mr. Bush called for increasing the requirement for annual production of alternative fuels to 35 billion gallons a year. That would almost quintuple the current mandate of producing 7.5 billion gallons of ethanol by 2012. Spurred by tax breaks and soaring oil prices, ethanol production has climbed rapidly and is expected to hit 6 billion gallons this year.

But energy analysts say that corn-based ethanol, which accounts for virtually all of today’s production, will not be able to produce more than about half as much alternative fuel as Mr. Bush envisions by 2017.

“There is really no plan here except to take the ethanol industry through the roof,” said Kenneth Cook, president of the Environmental Working Group.

But Mr. Bush also laced his proposals with numerous “safety valves” that could postpone the attainment of his goals.

Energy Plan Seeks Better Gas Mileage (USAT)

By James R. Healey

USA Today, January 24, 2007

The energy portion of President Bush's State of the Union speech Tuesday included some eye-popping numbers that would amount to a boon for the ethanol industry and could begin boosting the fuel economy of cars and trucks as soon as 2009.

The fuel economy increase isn't set at a specific number. It would result from a plan to cut U.S. gasoline use 20% in the next 10 years through better mileage and the increased use of gasoline substitutes such as ethanol.

The White House says that to meet the goal, mileage would have to improve 4% a year, beginning with 2010-model cars and 2012-model pickups, vans and SUVs.

The Union of Concerned Scientists says that translates to an average of 34 miles per gallon in 2017. "This could be the breakthrough we have been waiting for on fuel economy," says David Friedman, UCS research director.

UCS says that if Congress and the president can agree and thwart loopholes, the USA would use 550,000 fewer barrels of oil a day in 2017. That would cut the amount of carbon dioxide, a greenhouse gas blamed for global warming, as much as taking 14 million vehicles off the road, UCS says.

Combined with Bush's call for dramatically expanding the use of gasoline alternatives, the program "is a welcome, visionary proposal," says John DeCicco, auto expert at Environmental Defense — a group often opposed to Bush's policies.

DeCicco says a better way to protect the environment would be to limit the use of fuels with high carbon content, but the Bush plan would hit the same goal.

Joan Claybrook, president of Public Citizen, criticizes the Bush plan, saying it would set lower mileage targets for larger vehicles, encouraging automakers to build more of them.

The most stunning number in Bush's plan is 35 billion gallons — the amount of renewable and alternative fuels that the petroleum industry would have to blend with gasoline by 2017. That would displace one-fourth of the gasoline Americans use.

It's a huge jump from the current mandate of 7.5 billion gallons in 2012. Most renewable fuel is ethanol, grain alcohol usually made from corn.

"It's great to have the president of the United States out there saying we need this," says Bob Dinneen, president of the Renewable Fuels Association. RFA represents operators of 111 ethanol plants and another 78 under construction. The industry currently can produce 5.5 billion gallons of grain alcohol a year. The plants being built will double that — still far short of the 35 billion gallons that Bush wants.

To hit the mark will require development of a still-experimental process called cellulosic processing. It can convert an array of plants, not just corn, into ethanol and do it in greater quantities. But a plant costs several times as much as building a still to process corn kernels into ethanol.

DOJ_NMG_0120829

The White House hopes the high mandate creates an assured market that draws money and attention.

"We're going to need to see some technological breakthroughs. And that's why the president is setting this goal, so that investors, venture capitalists, researchers, scientists are all focused on that goal and can expedite and accelerate that technology," Joel Kaplan, deputy chief of staff, told reporters Tuesday afternoon.

Bush also called for doubling the emergency fuel supply, the Strategic Petroleum Reserve, to 1.5 billion barrels of oil by 2027. That would require expanding at least two of the current SPR sites and opening a new one, the Energy Department says.

Bush: Expand Alternative Energy Use (CHIT)

By William Neikirk

Chicago Tribune, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush sought Tuesday night to counter criticism that he has failed to do enough to tackle global warming and energy security as he unveiled a 10-year plan to slash U.S. gasoline consumption by 20 percent.

The president used his State of the Union address to propose a dramatic expansion in the use of alternative fuels like ethanol to offset the cut in gasoline use and he asked for wider power to toughen fuel-economy standards for cars.

If initial assessments of his new proposal are any guide, the president has more persuading to do. Critics said that while his plan had many good elements, it either does not go far enough or might not be practical in some cases.

As a result, the global-warming issue in Congress and the country seems destined to grow even hotter as a Democratic-controlled Congress considers whether to slap an overall cap on carbon dioxide emissions said to contribute to warming of the planet. On Monday, several corporate executives from blue-chip companies backed such an idea.

Even so, Bush presented an ambitious proposal that goes far beyond anything else he has previously offered to address what he called America's addiction to oil. The White House said the plan would halt the projected growth of carbon dioxide emissions from cars, light trucks and sport utility vehicles within 10 years.

"America is on the verge of technological breakthroughs that will enable us to live our lives less dependent on foreign oil," Bush said. "These technologies will help us become better stewards of the environment—and they will help us to confront the serious challenge of global climate change."

His proposal signaled that climate change has joined energy security as a monster political issue, and that political leaders now may be prepared to take more extensive action.

"As the global warming issue heats up across America, the president's position on global warming is beginning to thaw," said Larry Schweiger, president and chief executive of the National Wildlife Federation.

But he and other supporters of a plan to cap greenhouse-gas emissions said Bush needs to go further. Richard Rosenzweig, chief operating officer of Natsource, a firm that manages buying and selling of clean-energy credits, said he expected to see such a mandatory program "in a couple of years."

Bush proposed that the amount of ethanol and other alternative fuels used in gasoline blends be set at 35 billion gallons in 2017, up from the 7.5 billion gallons required in 2012. This would be enough to displace 15 percent of projected annual gasoline consumption by 2017, the White House said.

Many members of Congress, including Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), have offered similar plans to require that America put more emphasis on cleaner-burning alternative fuels such as ethanol.

But energy experts said that while the goal is laudable, it would require that automobile manufacturers build many more cars that are equipped to handle gasoline blends that have a higher alternative-fuel content. For example, only a small number of autos in the country can burn fuel containing 85 percent ethanol.

"The real questions are going to be whether we are going to have the infrastructure to move the fuels or have the vehicles to use the fuels," said KateriCallahan, president of the Alliance to Save Energy.

"Producing 35 billion gallons of ethanol a year would require putting an additional 129,000 square miles of farmland—an area the size of Kansas and Iowa—into corn production, which is not very likely," said Philip Clapp, president of the National Environmental Trust.

DOJ_NMG_0120830

The secretaries of energy and agriculture and the director of the Environmental Protection Agency could waive the 35 billion gallon standard if there are disruptions in the alternative-fuel market.

In another energy initiative, the president asked Congress for authority to "reform" fuel-economy standards for cars, even though congressional critics said Bush now has all the power he needs.

The plan would enable the government to set fuel-efficiency standards for cars based on their size, in the same way that it can set such standards for light trucks, the White House said.

The administration said these tougher so-called CAFE (for corporate average fuel economy) standards would reduce gasoline consumption by 5 percent, or 8.5 million gallons annually, by 2017.

Gas-reduction Proposals Raise Questions (LAT)

By Richard Simon, Elizabeth Douglass And John O'Dell

Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's proposals to reduce U.S. gasoline consumption by 20 percent in 10 years include more specific and ambitious new goals than in previous White House statements, but they also appear to rely on assumptions about energy markets, politics and technology that some experts say are debatable, and include some apparent contradictions.

In general, Bush's proposal to boost alternative fuels such as ethanol was greeted with conditional enthusiasm by many scientists, environmentalists and members of Congress. His plan would require suppliers to include 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels in the nation's vehicle fuel supply by 2017, up from the current 5 billion gallons.

"It is in our vital interest to diversify America's energy supply -- and the way forward is through technology," Bush said. " ... We need to press on with battery research for plug-in and hybrid vehicles, and expand the use of clean diesel vehicles and bio-diesel fuel. We must continue investing in new methods of producing ethanol -- using everything from wood chips, to grasses, to agricultural wastes."

Bush also called for Congress to give him new authority to set vehicle fuel-economy rules. His plan would overhaul the 31-year-old vehicle fuel-economy program established after the Arab oil embargo, contending that technology can be deployed to "significantly improve fuel economy" without compromising vehicle safety.

But he rejected bipartisan calls for Congress to set new fuel economy rules, preferring to have the Department of Transportation set the standard. Under current law, the DOT can only set mileage standards for trucks; raising the standard for passenger cars requires an act by Congress. Bush's plan asks Congress to allow DOT to set car standards using a vehicle size method rather than an overall fleet average.

Given the negative reaction Bush received from some Democrats on Capitol Hill Tuesday, that possibility appears remote.

Environmentalists were skeptical that Bush's proposal would lead to any significant increase in fuel economy rules.

Indeed, some aspects of the overall plan seemed to contradict each other. For one, Bush's proposal to save gasoline by increasing vehicle fuel economy standards could be undermined by his call for greater use of alternative fuels. Ethanol, for example, gets less mileage than gasoline and, without a major technological breakthrough, requiring more of it could make it harder to increase fuel efficiency.

Philip Clapp, president of the National Environmental Trust, said that the president's request for new legislation "letting him set standards basically model-by-model is something Detroit has pushed for years -- as a way to poke more loopholes in the current weak standards."

Currently, auto makers are required to have their fleets meet an average standard of 27.5 miles per gallon for passenger cars, unchanged since 1985, and 21.6 miles per gallon for light trucks, which is due to increase to 24 mpg by 2011. Bush said mileage standards should be increased enough to reduce gasoline consumption by 5 percent, or 8.5 billion gallons, by 2017. Achieving that would require an average fuel economy improvement of 4 percent a year starting in the 2010 model year for cars, he said.

Bill Prindle, acting executive director of the American Council for an Energy Efficient Economy, a Washington think tank, called Bush's fuel-economy proposal "pretty weak, plus it is totally noncommittal on substance and timing. It says, Congress, don't send us a standard, give us the power and we'll issue a rule.

"The 4 percent per year improvement is a nice hypothetical, but the last rule this administration issued, for light trucks in March 2006, achieved barely a 2 percent annual improvement. So I am not optimistic that DOT will come out with a stronger rule for cars, and especially not within two years."

On Capitol Hill, Democrats and their environmental allies assailed Bush for failing to endorse mandatory limits on emissions blamed for global warming, commit to stricter vehicle miles-per-gallon rules or reconsider his past opposition to requiring a percentage of the nation's electricity to be generated from alternative energy sources such as solar and wind power.

Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif., called the energy proposals "the latest in a string of disappointments from this administration."

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., who is among a bipartisan group of lawmakers who has pushed for stricter miles per gallon rules, said the president's proposal "doesn't go nearly far enough."

"The president has had the ability to make real changes to fuel efficiency with regard to light trucks for six years -- and he hasn't made substantial increases. Why should we trust him now?" she said, contending the only secure substantial increases in fuel economy is through legislation.

But any effort to go beyond what Bush is proposing could be politically difficult. Previous efforts to pass much stricter fuel-economy standards have run into resistance not only from Bush and Republicans wary of government regulation but also Democrats from auto-producing states who have warned that congressional mandated rules could lead to lighter, less-safe vehicles, cost the U.S. auto industry jobs and harm the economy.

Bush's call for ramping up production of ethanol and other alternative fuels generated more enthusiasm, especially on Capitol Hill among farm-state Democrats and Republicans.

Bush's plan does not single out ethanol, even though it is in the best position to deliver the desired results. The goal can also be met with the use of biodiesel, butanol, methanol, hydrogen and other forms of alternative fuels.

Corn-based ethanol is not without its drawbacks, and would be a short-term solution at best. Corn-based ethanol consumes a valuable U.S. food crop and has driven the price up. What's more, the process of growing corn and transforming it into ethanol consumes large amounts of fossil fuels such as oil, coal and natural gas. And with current technology, U.S. farms could provide only enough corn to yield 15 billion gallons of fuel ethanol a year -- well below the president's new goal of 35 billion, according to some estimates.

While today's ethanol production involves trade-offs, its advocates believe new technology will soon erase many of the downsides. The most important breakthrough would be a switch to making ethanol from agricultural waste, switch grass, wood chips and other kinds of biomass that get broken down by enzymes or bacteria to yield what's known as cellulosic ethanol.

To get to Bush's new target, "it will take cellulosic-based ethanol, and it will take improvements in the efficiency of grain-ethanol production, and those things are improving on a daily basis," said Matt Hartwig, spokesman for the Renewable Fuels Assn., a Washington-based trade group. "It's the technology advancements today and down the road that will allow us to achieve the 35 billion gallons of fuel and beyond."

Hartwig and others said the president's new fuels plan, even if it comes without additional government research funding, would encourage investors to put money into ethanol and other biofuel projects. Cellulosic ethanol, for example, is already a proven technology, but more funding is needed to find ways to cut the cost of making it, according to Hartwig and others.

Mark Emalfarb, chief executive of the biotechnology firm Dyadic International Inc., is one of a handful of companies trying to make fiber-based ethanol commercially feasible. Bush's pronouncement Tuesday night, he said, would help companies like his to speed up advancements in ethanol production.

"For 14 years, we were working on this behind-the-scenes, and nobody cared," Emalfarb said. "But from the minute the president got on the air (last year) and said `America is addicted to oil' and mentioned cellulosic ethanol, the phone's been ringing off the hook. ... Now he's tripled the size of the market."

Volatile Markets May Crimp Energy Plan (WSJ)

By Jeffrey Ball And Lauren Etter

Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120832

President Bush's call for the U.S. to reduce projected gasoline demand by 20% over the next decade faces a hurdle: a volatile energy market.

Mr. Bush called for in his State of the Union Address last night a massive increase in U.S. ethanol use by 2017 and a toughening of federal auto-fuel-economy standards -- actions that, together, will curb U.S. gasoline consumption 20% below projected levels in 2017, the administration said. But the economics both of alternative fuels and of more-efficient vehicles depend largely on the price of oil as well as other commodities, leaving them vulnerable to market shifts.

The volatility ethanol producers have encountered underscores the uncertainty faced by companies and investors trying to develop alternate sources of energy. Lower prices can hurt the economic argument underpinning their development, and added supplies can bring prices down. Increased supplies of ethanol world-wide are cited as one reason for the recent drop in oil prices, for example.

To be sure, Mr. Bush's policy does mandate increased renewable-fuel use. But the policy contains "safety valves" under which federal officials could waive or weaken the mandate if the economics of alternative fuels eroded. That is because "a bold policy move such as this could have an adverse effect on commodity prices, whether it be in corn, or cellulose, or oil," said Craig Stevens, a Department of Energy spokesman. Ethanol in the U.S. today is made from corn. But hopes are pinned on making the fuel from "cellulosic" material, such as switch grass and wood chips, which are more plentiful than corn.

After hitting $77 a barrel last summer, oil fell steadily in recent months, dipping briefly below $50 a barrel last week in intraday trading. It jumped yesterday 4.7% to settle at $55.04 in New York Mercantile Exchange trading. But oil remains below the levels that, for much of past year, sent the stocks of ethanol producers soaring and consumers flocking to more-efficient cars and trucks.

The economic disincentive of falling oil prices marks only the latest squeeze for ethanol producers. Production has surged over the past year. That has pushed up the price of corn, ethanol's main ingredient. In response, the profitability of ethanol plants is down.

The net profit of a 50-million-gallon ethanol plant today is about 7.2 cents a gallon of ethanol produced, down from 50 cents a gallon on Jan. 1, said Rick Kment, an ethanol analyst at DTN, an agricultural-commodities research firm.

That partly explains why shares of many ethanol producers have swooned. Shares of VeraSun Energy Corp., an ethanol producer that went public at the height of market interest last year, have fallen steadily since last November. Yesterday they finished at $17.96 in New York Stock Exchange composite trading, down almost 42% from its 52-week high of $30.75 in June.

Meanwhile, one of ethanol's big selling points, that it would significantly curb global-warming emissions, has come under debate amid concern over the amount of energy needed to process the ethanol itself.

Wally Tyner, an agricultural-energy analyst at Purdue University, worries Americans'" boom mentality" regarding ethanol will sputter out. "I don't think this growth rate can be sustained," he says. "If we have enough plants built, they will bid up corn prices to where it's no longer profitable" to produce ethanol.

Ethanol producers are somewhat insulated from the volatility of the market, since some of the corn used in current production was purchased earlier at lower prices. Dan Basse, president of Chicago research firm AgResource Co., says that corn would have to reach $4.80 a bushel while ethanol prices would have to drop to $1.60 a gallon for it to be unprofitable. Ethanol now is at about $2.16 a gallon. The average cash price of corn nationwide yesterday was $3.76 a bushel.

The U.S. uses about 5.2 billion gallons of ethanol a year. According to the Energy Department, the U.S. uses about 140 billion gallons of gasoline a year. It takes more than one gallon of ethanol to equal the energy in a gallon of gasoline.

Ethanol giant Archer-Daniels-Midland Co. is experimenting with ways to turn corn hulls into ethanol. By doing this ADM says it will be able to increase the production of ethanol by 15% without using any additional kernels of corn.

The American Petroleum Institute, the oil industry's Washington-based trade group, said ethanol and other alternative fuels "have an important role in our nation's present and future energy mix," but it said: "Attaining the full volumes included in the administration's proposal will require additional technological breakthroughs."

The Big Three auto companies have announced plans to significantly increase their production of versions of their conventional vehicles that have been modified so they can run on either gasoline or ethanol. Gloria Bergquist, a spokeswoman for the Alliance of Automobile Manufacturers, an industry group, said her group supports the president's efforts to increase alternative-fuel usage. But she said the government needs to boost research into technologies such as batteries for the next generation of hybrid vehicles, and oil companies need to do more to roll out alternative fuels.

Bush Vows To Cut US Petrol Demand (FT)

By Doug Cameron

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

The US has called for a 20 per cent cut in domestic gasoline consumption over the next 10 years and a five-fold increase in alternative and renewable fuel production as part of the much-vaunted push by the White House for "energy independence".

The targets outlined ahead of Tuesday's State of the Union address are expected to inflame the food-versus-fuel debate over the competing use of corn-based ethanol, while environmentalists have also expressed concern over plans to increase domestic oil production.

The president will also call on Congress to introduce tougher fuel-consumption standards for passenger cars, and for the size of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to be doubled.

The White House plans to build on the push into ethanol from the current energy bill by mandating the use of 35bn gallons of renewable and alternative fuel by 2017 in the form of ethanol produced from corn and other biomass, as well as soybean-derived biodiesel.

This compares with the 7.5bn gallons which the energy bill currently requires by 2012, though the industry expects to surpass this as early as next year, with dozens of ethanol plants being developed across the country. About 5bn gallons was produced in 2006.

Industry experts said corn-based ethanol would have to account for about two-thirds of the 2017 target, at the top end of current estimates for potential production. The expansion will require the planting of more corn acres and advancement in crop science to improve yields.

The president is expected to commit more funds to renewable fuel research – a call matched by the Democratic leaders – in a bid to meet the targets and make other feedstocks such as sawgrass more commercially viable. However, the target could also renew calls for the existing tariff on ethanol imports to be lifted – notably from low-cost, sugar-based producers in Brazil.

The White House claimed the new targets would displace 15 per cent of current natural gas consumption.

Corn, ethanol and soybean futures all ended higher at the Chicago Board of Trade. Shares in Archer Daniel Midland, the largest US ethanol producer, climbed 2.7 per cent.

Critics See Little Meaningful Change (WP)

Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Practicality, Effectiveness Questioned

The energy proposals President Bush outlined last night break new ground for his administration.

He combined a call to lower gasoline consumption with new mandates for oil companies and new standards for automakers. And he couched these in the context of enhancing U.S. energy security and addressing climate change.

Each proposal, though, immediately prompted questions about its ultimate effectiveness.

Â· Twenty in 10: Bush said he has a "goal of reducing U.S. gasoline usage by 20 percent in the next 10 years."

The fine print: Administration officials said that the goal is 20 percent below projected annual gasoline usage, not off today's levels.

That's very significant for oil markets, where analysts look at the balance of rising supplies and rising demand.

"If you made this type of reduction . . . U.S. petroleum consumption wouldn't be flat, but it would not grow meaningfully," said Frederick W. Smith, chairman of FedEx Corp., who said he applauds Bush's "balanced" approach.

But people worried about climate change were disappointed. Using projections means that carbon dioxide emissions from transportation fuels will drop only slightly from today's levels; other parts of the economy produce the other two-thirds of greenhouse gases.

"This is not nearly enough to really put us on the path of reducing emissions down to 60 percent or 80 percent of current levels, which is what we really need," said Eileen Claussen, president of the Pew Center on Global Climate Change.

Â· Raising fuel-economy standards: Bush said that he would raise fuel-efficiency standards by about 4 percent a year, starting in model year 2010 for cars and model year 2012 for trucks. He also wants to change the way the standards are applied.

Currently the fuel standards apply to the average of all the cars each carmaker sells in a year. Bush would make new standards for cars "attribute-based" -- creating many different standards based on, for example, size. And he would give carmakers some flexibility in how they meet targets. (These standards are scheduled to go into effect for light trucks starting in 2008.)

The fine print: The new system promotes efficiency advances for every kind of vehicle, not just for one model. The president did not want Congress to set a new miles-per-gallon standard, but the Union of Concerned Scientists estimated that Bush's proposal could raise the fleet average to 34 miles a gallon by 2017.

UCS warned, though, that if attribute-based standards are not combined with fleet averages, they "could actually encourage automakers to sell heavier or larger vehicles that guzzle more gas." That would mean more efficient gas-guzzlers, but still more gas-guzzlers.

Â· New renewable-fuel target: Bush said he would ask Congress to require oil companies to use 35 billion gallons of renewable and alternative fuels by 2017. The administration said this would replace 15 percent of projected annual gasoline consumption.

The questions: How will that target be met? The ethanol industry will produce more than 7.5 billion gallons this year, almost all of it corn-based. But it would take more than last year's entire U.S. corn harvest to make enough ethanol to meet the target. Most industry experts say that there is not enough evidence that producing biofuels from other sources can be done on anything close to that scale.

The fine print: Bush changed the language on the mandate to say that "alternative," not just "renewable," fuels could be part of that volume. The only difference that makes by federal definitions is to add so-called coal-to-liquids fuels. One company has a proposal before the Energy Department for a $2 billion plant.

"You get the same amount of mileage and twice the pollution," said Anna Aurilio, legislative director of Public Interest Research Group. "That would be a huge step backwards." But an administration official said that the coal-to-liquids project could be used by the military.

Â· Doubling the Strategic Petroleum Reserve by 2027: The president's proposal calls for resuming the purchase of 100,000 barrels a day for the reserve, a practice suspended after Hurricane Katrina. The reserve has 691 million barrels; it has room for 727 million barrels.

The fine print: The plan calls for spending $10 billion to add additional storage facilities, including the expansion of sites in Louisiana and Texas, and addition of a new site at a salt cavern in Mississippi. Another $55 billion would be spent buying the fuel over 20 years -- a price of just under $69 a barrel, a hefty premium over the current price of $54.77 a barrel.

Bush Oil Reserve Plan Sparks Price Surge (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, January 24, 2007

President George W. Bush triggered the biggest one-day jump in oil prices in 16 months on Tuesday when he set out plans in his State of the Union address to double US strategic oil reserves.

Oil prices rose 4.7 per cent to $55 a barrel after Mr Bush pledged to double the size of the reserves by 1.5bn barrels by 2027. Sam Bodman, energy secretary, said his department would start “purchasing crude oil in the spring at a rate of about 100,000 barrels per day”.

The speech marked Mr Bush’s strongest effort yet to slow the growth of greenhouse gases with a plan to cut US demand for petrol by 20 per cent over the next 10 years by raising fuel-economy standards and setting targets for a shift to alternative fuels.

“The plan will confront climate change by stopping the projected growth of carbon dioxide emissions from cars, light trucks and SUVs within 10 years,” a White House document said.

DOJ_NMG_0120835

In an echo of last year's speech, when the president memorably warned that America was "addicted to oil", Mr Bush said: "For too long, our nation has been dependent on foreign oil. And this dependence leaves us more vulnerable to hostile regimes, and to terrorists – who could cause huge disruptions of oil shipments."

The policy shift – coming on the day that Al Gore, former vice-president, received two Oscar nominations for An Inconvenient Truth, his documentary film about the dangers of global warming – was outlined to a newly assertive Congress and a sceptical public.

Mr Bush's approval ratings this week were the lowest for any president ahead of a State of the Union address since Richard Nixon in 1974.

Dan Bartlett, White House counsellor, said that the speech reflected the fact that officials were "under no illusions about the atmosphere we are operating in."

However, the White House energy policy fell short of hopes that it would engage in international discussions about a post-Kyoto accord after 2012 to control greenhouse gases or support tougher economy wide mandatory caps on carbon dioxide.

Faced with opposition from Democrats and rising Republican dissent about his plans for a surge of 21,500 troops in Iraq, Mr Bush defended his strategy. "Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq – because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far-reaching."

Officials said he would also "explain why it is time for the Iraqi government to act" and would not intensify the administration's anti-Iran rhetoric.

The goal to cut gasoline consumption by up to 20 per cent by 2017 marks a significant shift for the White House, recognising both pressure from international leaders for the US to act on climate change, and the new influence of the Democrats, who have shifted the focus of energy policy towards efficiency.

Mr Bush's first five State of the Union speeches did not directly address climate change, and in 2001 he summed up his energy policy as: "We can't conserve our way to energy independence".

The higher oil prices – crude oil yesterday made its biggest one-day jump since September 19 2005 – pushed energy stocks up sharply.

The S&P's energy sector rose 2.4 per cent with shares in Exxon Mobil up 2.2 per cent at $74.49, ConocoPhillips up 2.5 per cent to $64.97, and Chevron up 1.9 per cent to $72.56.

Blindness On Biofuels (WP)

By Robert J. Samuelson

Washington Post, January 24, 2007

President Bush joined the biofuels enthusiasm in his State of the Union address, and no one can doubt the powerful allure. Farmers, scientists and venture capitalists will liberate us from insecure foreign oil by converting corn, prairie grass and much more into gasoline substitutes. Biofuels will even curb greenhouse gases. Already, production of ethanol from corn has surged from 1.6 billion gallons in 2000 to 5 billion in 2006. Bush set an interim target of 35 billion gallons in 2017 on the way to the administration's ultimate goal of 60 billion in 2030. Sounds great, but be wary. It may be a mirage.

The great danger of the biofuels craze is that it will divert us from stronger steps to limit dependence on foreign oil: higher fuel taxes to prod Americans to buy more gasoline-efficient vehicles and tougher federal fuel economy standards to force auto companies to produce them. True, Bush supports tougher -- but unspecified -- fuel economy standards. But the implied increase above today's 27.5 miles per gallon for cars is modest, because the administration expects gasoline savings from biofuels to be triple those from higher fuel economy standards.

The politics are simple enough. Americans dislike high fuel prices; auto companies dislike tougher fuel economy standards. By contrast, everyone seems to win with biofuels: farmers, consumers, capitalists. American technology triumphs. Biofuels create rural jobs and drain money from foreign oil producers. What's not to like? Unfortunately, this enticing vision is dramatically overdrawn.

Let's do some basic math. In 2006, Americans used about 7.5 billion barrels of oil. By 2030, that could increase about 30 percent to 9.8 billion barrels, projects the Energy Information Administration. Much of that rise would reflect higher gasoline demand. In 2030, there will be more people (an estimated 365 million vs. 300 million in 2006) and more vehicles (316 million vs. 225 million). At most, biofuels would address part of the increase in oil demand; it wouldn't reduce our oil use or import dependence from current levels.

Suppose we reach the administration's ultimate target of 60 billion gallons in 2030. That would offset less than half of the projected increase in annual oil use. Here's why. First, it's necessary to convert the 60 billion gallons into barrels. Because there are 42 gallons in a barrel, that means dividing by 42. Further: Ethanol has only about two-thirds of the energy value of an equal volume of gasoline. When you do all the arithmetic, 60 billion gallons of ethanol displace just under 1 billion barrels of gasoline. If that merely offsets increases in oil use, it won't cut existing import dependence or greenhouse gases.

The 60 billion-gallon goal -- and the 35 billion-gallon interim target -- are also probably unrealistic. When we rhapsodize about biofuels, we're talking mainly about old-fashioned alcohol (aka ethanol). Until now, most ethanol has been made from corn. If small amounts of toxic gasoline were not added, it could become corn whiskey. Ethanol receives heavy federal subsidies. Oil refiners that blend it with gasoline get a 51-cents-a-gallon tax credit. The subsidy causes them to buy more ethanol, increasing corn demand.

Naturally, corn farmers love this. They've been the program's main beneficiaries. Although ethanol displaces only tiny amounts of oil (slightly more than 1 percent), it's had a big effect on corn prices. They're about $3 a bushel, up from $2 last year and the highest in a decade. They could go higher. In 2000, ethanol used 6 percent of the U.S. corn crop. In 2006, that was 20 percent, and the ethanol plants under construction would double capacity by 2010. Higher prices for corn (which is fed to poultry, hogs and cattle) raise retail meat prices. Ironically, fuel subsidies may boost food costs.

But corn harvests won't be large enough to meet either the 35 billion- or 60 billion-gallon targets. Large amounts of "cellulosic" ethanol would also be needed -- the term referring to the cellulose in other plants to be converted to ethanol. Prime candidates are farm wastes, including wheat straw and cornstalks. Unfortunately, the chemistry for doing this is far more costly than it is for corn kernels. Without technological advances, cellulosic ethanol won't be economically viable. It could be supported only with massive federal subsidies or direct requirements forcing refiners to use the fuel, regardless of cost. Then the high costs would be passed on to consumers. Congress started down that path in 2005 by enacting a modest mandate for biofuel use.

Biofuels are certainly worth pursuing. Up to some point, they're even worth subsidizing. Government can nurture new technologies, and breakthroughs for cellulosic ethanol -- hardly inconceivable -- would make a meaningful difference in the U.S. fuel balance. But there's also a real threat that the infatuation with biofuels is a political expediency that will turn into a classic government boondoggle, benefiting selected constituencies and providing few genuine public benefits. That has already happened with corn.

Our primary need is to curb reliance on foreign oil. If imports were dependable, they would not be dangerous, but they come from unstable or hostile suppliers. Although our dependence can't be eliminated, it can be reduced. The most obvious way is to improve the efficiency of vehicles by 30 to 50 percent over the next few decades. Americans need more hybrids and more small vehicles. Biofuels might be a complement, but if they blind us to this larger reality, they will be a step backward.

Decoding Climate Politics

January 24, 2007; Page A12

Pundits tell us the mood shift, with Democrats now in control, favors action on climate change. Don't bet on it.

It's still going to be hard for the legislative process to get past the fact that nothing on the table or capable of commanding majority support would make the slightest difference to climate change. Even a complete ban on burning fossil fuels in the U.S. wouldn't halt progress to the next milestone, a doubling of atmospheric carbon dioxide since the advent of industrial civilization. No joke to say the only live question for congresspersons and their voters back home is: How much are we going to spend to have no impact on global warming, and why?

Politics is a business of symbolism, but not without its pull toward the rational. The game in Washington today is how to turn global warming policy toward some other purpose that serves somebody's idea of self-interest or the national good. Let's rank these in order of the narrowness of the interests involved.

General Electric, DuPont, Alcoa, Caterpillar and other industrial pigpens this week endorsed cap-and-trade limits on carbon dioxide, which would turn their established habit of using the atmosphere as a free waste disposal into a property right, worth billions. Talk about a low-hanging fruit. They are accustomed to treating carbon dumping as a gimme. Now they'd at least be in a position to get paid for dumping less.

Their hero is retiring BP chief John Browne, who turned his little oil company into a big oil company, engaged in cost cutting (which he called "emissions cuts") and set about using public policy to get his shareholders compensated twice for these cuts (net, of course, of any deductions for oil spills, plant explosions, etc.).

Next up on the enlightenment scale, with straightened vertebrae and the first inkling of a "larger good," are Nancy Pelosi, George Bush and others who want to use climate change to advance a goal of "energy independence."

They may be praying to a false god, but their devotion is possibly sincere. And some public good might come from policies designed to encourage a "cellulosic" ethanol industry, which has the potential to be carbon-neutral as well as to improve the nation's "energy security" (a non-false god) by spurring a global market in biofuels to compete with OPEC.

However, to the extent that global warming becomes an excuse to shovel more subsidies and protectionist favors at the corn ethanol industry, neither energy security nor carbon reduction would be served.

Finally, walking upright, with knuckles no longer in proximity to the ground, are advocates -- mostly economists -- of a carbon tax.

A carbon tax would be the efficient way of encouraging businesses and consumers to make less carbon-intensive energy choices. Government would not have to exercise an improbable clairvoyance about which technologies will pay off in the future. There'd be less scope for Congress to favor some industries over others purely on the basis of lobbying clout.

The most enlightened of the enlightened (love note to Kevin Hassett) are those who see how a carbon tax might be used to overhaul the tax system and make it more pro-growth in its treatment of savings and investment.

There's your scorecard. Unfortunately, because a carbon tax would lead to a direct (rather than surreptitious) increase in the cost of gasoline, the path of enlightenment will not be the path of politics. Of one other thing you can also be sure -- the impact on climate change of any policy issuing from Washington will be nil.

By common (if fudgy) estimate, the biosphere can take up less than three billion tons of atmospheric carbon a year. Human industry produces 7.5 billion tons, a volume that continues to grow rapidly as China, India, Brazil and Indonesia (not covered by Kyoto) develop their economies, and as European countries and Japan (covered by Kyoto) blow past their limits. Consider too that carbon is hardly the sole, and perhaps not even the dominant, force behind the ostensible warming of the past century.

The only thing that will save us now is the likelihood (very high) that the most dire forecasts of climate change are wrong; the chance (not improbable) that the biosphere will evolve to make use of a slightly more carbon-rich atmosphere; and the prospect (nearly certain) that mankind will seek to adapt to whatever climate it finds itself confronted with.

Our private bet, of no relevance for the politics, is that real knowledge being so skimpy, today's "consensus" on climate change will turn out to be a perishable fruit. And those like Rep. John Dingell who are still willing to profess public doubts about whether any of us know what we're talking about when we talk about climate change will end up looking pretty good in retrospect.

Polls say the public has heard Al Gore and believes a climate disaster is just around the corner, with rising sea levels and killer hurricanes. Yet Manhattan real-estate values increased 17% last year and the stock market is at all-time high. The same cognitive dissonance is guaranteed to be reflected in policy, which will consist of symbolism on global warming but nothing so costly and radical as to require true climate worrywarts to brighten up.

Rest assured, the great planetary chemistry experiment will continue. If you're curious about how the Earth might react to a myriad of human activities whose net effects are still far from reliably assessed, you only need to stick around. At least until science figures out how to harvest the gazillions of watts of free energy the sun sheds on the planet everyday, which will fix old problems but surely introduce new ones.

Push To Replace New US Mercury Plan (CSM)

By Peter N. Spotts

The Christian Science Monitor, January 24, 2007

The nation's new program to regulate mercury may be short-lived.

Several draft bills in Congress – as well as a suit in federal court – are challenging the Bush administration's mercury pollution program, which took effect last year. A key reason, they charge, is that the plan's emissions-trading scheme – which has worked to curb other pollutants that spread far and wide – doesn't work for mercury, which accumulates locally as well as spreading over long distances.

That's why lawmakers on Capitol Hill are preparing bills that would tackle the toxic pollutant in a more direct manner. They aim to reduce mercury emissions from coal-fired power plants by 90 percent, rather than the Environmental Protection Agency's (EPA's) target of 70 percent. The bills also would set up a nationwide monitoring network to track airborne mercury and its effects on the environment.

Democrats and Republicans have offered similar bills before. But three major scientific studies published during the past several months have added urgency to their efforts, they say. The upshot of the research: Unlike pollutants such as sulfur dioxide, airborne mercury is far more likely to drop back to earth close to its source, generating "hot spots" of contamination and accumulating in the food chain.

The research also is cited in a lawsuit 16 states and a handful of environmental groups have filed with the US Court of Appeals in Washington. The suit, initiated two years ago, challenges the EPA's regulatory tack on mercury pollution. Within the past two weeks, the plaintiffs filed opening briefs charging that the EPA is misusing the emissions-trading approach. They also argue that to set up the program, the agency illegally dropped power plants from a list of pollution sources that must face the most stringent controls under the Clean Air Act.

Emissions trading has helped the country dramatically reduce sulfur-dioxide pollution from power plants by establishing a market-based approach. Companies can balance out their big polluting plants either by running much cleaner plants elsewhere or buying pollution credits from other, cleaner utilities. As emission limits tighten, the cost of such credits goes up, encouraging companies to close or retrofit their biggest polluters.

But the recent studies provide new data that show why such a scheme should not be allowed for mercury, argues Rep. Tom Allen (D) of Maine, author of a bill to establish a national mercury monitoring network.

The first study, published last September in Environmental Science and Technology, found that over a two-year period, 70 percent of the mercury that rain or snow washed out of the skies over Steubenville, Ohio, came from local or regional sources. This is far higher than previous EPA studies indicated. The team picked Steubenville because 17 coal-fired power-plant boilers operate within 62 miles of the city, and another study had documented adverse health effects to people in the area from air pollution.

Two studies published this month in the journal BioScience discovered five biological hot spots in the northeastern US and southeastern Canada, and uncovered another nine that may be hot spots as well. The intensity of these hot spots varies with the type of coal burned in a boiler at the source and with other factors such as the landscape's chemistry or water levels in reservoirs. As with Steubenville, the researchers also established that at least two hot spots that cover southeastern New Hampshire and northeastern Massachusetts could be traced to local and regional sources and that the mercury was showing up in fish and birds.

One of the two studies carried some good news, notes Charles Driscoll, a Syracuse University scientist who took part in both studies. Between 1997 and 2002, mercury emissions fell by 45 percent in southern New Hampshire, thanks to emissions controls on incinerators. Concentrations found in wild loons in one of the hot spots fell by an average of 30 percent over that period. Mercury levels in yellow perch and in plankton also fell.

The results have led both groups to call for a more effective national system for monitoring the sources and effects of airborne mercury. The sulfur-dioxide program worked, Dr. Driscoll says, because the EPA had comprehensive monitoring network. "Those measurements are not in place for mercury."

Cruise Line Fined For Striking, Killing Whale (ADN)

By Don Hunter, Anchorage Daily News

Anchorage (AK) Daily News, January 24, 2007

Princess Cruise Lines has agreed to pay $755,000 in fines and restitution to resolve accusations that one of its ships struck and killed a humpback whale near Glacier Bay more than five years ago.

A court date to finalize a plea agreement is set for Monday in U.S. District Court in Anchorage. According to documents filed last week, Princess is expected to plead guilty to a single misdemeanor of “failing to operate at a slow, safe speed while near humpback whales.” Under a plea agreement yet to be filed, the company would pay a $200,000 fine to the government and $550,000 in “community service restitution” to the National Park Service Foundation, court papers say. That money would go to an account for Glacier Bay National Park.

A Princess spokeswoman, Julie Benson, confirmed that the company plans to enter the plea agreement, but said she could add little now. “There are things we would like to address later when we have more time and information,” Benson said.

John Quinley, an Alaska spokesman for the National Park Service, said Justice department attorneys have told Park Service officials not to discuss the case at least until next week. The body of a 45-foot humpback was found floating near the mouth of Glacier Bay in mid-July 2001. A necropsy conducted at the time showed the animal died of massive skull fractures. A Princess vessel, the Dawn Princess, had been operating near two humpback whales a few days before, according to the court papers and news reports at the time.

Mexican Attorney General Cites 'alarming' Increase In Drug Consumption (AP)

AP, January 24, 2007

MEXICO CITY: Mexico's Attorney General said an alarming increase in drug use in Mexico is leading cartels to fight primarily for markets and territory rather than shipping routes, as cocaine finds an easier market here than in the United States.

Attorney General Eduardo Medina Mora also said Tuesday that a group of alleged drug traffickers extradited to the U.S. over the weekend could be returned to Mexican prisons once they are tried abroad, noting "that possibility has not been discarded."

His comments to congressional members that some of the 15 extradited late Friday might wind up back in Mexico to serve unfinished sentences or face new trials seemed at odds with the expectations of U.S. officials, who apparently plan to keep them for life.

On Monday, Karen Tandy, chief of the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration, said that "on behalf of the DEA, I have one last thing to say to these 15 criminals: Welcome to the first day of the rest of your lives." Those extradited to the U.S. include alleged drug lords like Osiel Cardenas and Hector Palma Salazar.

A so-called "temporary extradition" arrangement between the two countries allows suspects serving prison sentences in Mexico to be sent north for trial, but they must then return to Mexico to finish out their sentences here.

However, a top Mexican law enforcement official who wasn't authorized to give his name said Calderon had decided that Friday's extraditions didn't fall under that accord.

Despite Mexico's massive anti-drug raids, Medina Mora said that drug cartels still threaten "government sovereignty and control" in some regions, in part because they do more business locally now, rather than just shipping most drugs north as in the past.

"The consumption of hard drugs is increasing at truly alarming rates ... at rates of as much as 20 percent annually," Medina Mora said during testimony before lawmakers.

"Changing international (drug) market conditions have not only caused an increase in violence as they fight for markets, but have also focused organized criminal groups more toward the domestic market."

That has forced Mexico to shift its anti-drug efforts toward "a new paradigm," Medina Mora said.

In the past, authorities focused on arresting top drug lords, a move that often served to temporarily disrupt the chain of command on shipment routes they controlled.

But now that money and drugs follow a somewhat more diffuse network of local and international sales, the government has decided to use an approach oriented toward the drug economy.

The new campaign, which includes sending thousands of federal police and soldiers into several key strongholds, is aimed at "breaking up the areas of power, moneymaking and privilege."

Medina Mora said that in Mexico, lawyers for drug traffickers carry messages from their clients to their henchmen on the outside. Breaking up such contacts, he said, was part of a "new trend" in international law enforcement, and one of the reasons for the extraditions.

4 Extradited Drug Cartel Leaders Appear In Houston Court (SDUT)

By Onell R. Soto, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, January 24, 2007

Four drug cartel leaders extradited this weekend from Mexico and facing charges in San Diego federal court appeared in a Houston courtroom yesterday under high security.

They were among 15 people turned over by Mexican officials late Friday and early Saturday in a move that authorities said signals unprecedented cooperation in the fight against drug traffickers.

“Now, did we get all of Mexico's major drug traffickers? No, not yet. But this past weekend, the U.S. and Mexico have taken a tremendous leap forward,” said Karen Tandy, head of the Drug Enforcement Administration.

The four are expected to appear in San Diego federal court within weeks. Officials refused to give details about their transfer here for security reasons.

Two are brothers accused of leading day-to-day operations for the Arellano Félix cartel. Authorities said the other two are an “enforcer” for the criminal organization who was a link to Southern California street gangs and a former member who then led a rival cartel.

Tandy said the greatest coup was the extradition of Osiel Cárdenas, a former police officer accused of running the Gulf Cartel, and of having corrupted specially trained Mexican federal officers.

“For the past eight years, Osiel Cárdenas Guillen commanded one of the most brutal and powerful drug cartels in the world,” she said. “For the last four of those years, he did it from within a Mexican prison outside of Mexico City.”

She lauded the extradition of Ismael and Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, indicted in 2003 in San Diego federal court. “Ismael was the Arellano Félix organization, or the Tijuana cartel's, chief of operations. Gilberto supervised operations in neighboring Mexicali.”

As important, drug trafficking experts said, is Hector Palma Salazar, indicted in San Diego in 1995 and accused of conspiring to distribute more than a ton of cocaine.

A former member of the Arellano organization, he joined with Joaquín Guzmán Loera and ran the rival Sinaloa cartel.

DOJ_NMG_0120841

Eduardo Medina Mora, Mexico's attorney general, has said the cartel leaders – Cárdenas, Palma and the Higuera brothers – were extradited to stop their communications from behind bars and to reduce risks of violence and escape, not because of U.S. pressure. The aim was to break "physical and geographical" contact with their gangs while they were in Mexican prisons.

Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty said he was confident the U.S. prison system would be able to better control such communication.

"We have a long record of not having those kinds of problems occur within the Federal Bureau of Prisons," he said, including monitoring telephone calls, letters and visits.

One of those extradited, José Albert Márquez, is accused of being a leader in the Mexican Mafia prison gang, acting as a link to the Arellano Félix cartel.

The prison gang is accused of masterminding killings from inside prison and controlling drug distribution through threats and extortion using street gangs.

Also yesterday, the federal judge overseeing the possible death-penalty trial of accused kingpin Francisco Javier Arellano Félix sharply disagreed with prosecutors and defense lawyers over when a jury would hear the case. Arellano is accused of racketeering and conspiracy.

The lawyers told U.S. District Judge Larry Alan Burns they could be ready to take the case to trial in June 2008. Burns insists it can begin this year.

Although Arellano may face the death penalty since he was captured by U.S. officials, the group's top lieutenants won't because of terms of their extraditions from Mexico, where there is no death penalty.

Mexican President Felipe Calderón pledged yesterday to wage a permanent war on organized crime.

In addition to stepped-up extraditions, Calderón sent federal troops to patrol cities where police corruption is suspected, including Tijuana, where municipal officers were stripped of their weapons Jan. 4.

Man On Lam Flown Back To U.S. (MON)

Monitor, January 23, 2007

McALLEN — One of the 15 fugitives Mexico extradited to the United States Friday was a former officer in the Donna and Weslaco police departments whose confession nine years ago helped bring down a powerful Mexican cartel.

Gilberto Salinas-Doria's arrival at Ellington Field Friday outside Houston capped 16 years on the run from a federal indictment in Brownsville. But his most serious drug charges, the ones that prompted extradition, come from an indictment in New York, and stem from his time as a fugitive in Quintana Roo, the Mexican seaside state that is home to Cancun.

The extraditions Friday included the head of the Matamoros-based Gulf cartel and were done with only hours' notice to U.S. authorities. The extradition was aimed at removing top-level cartel leaders from Mexico, where they wield power even inside prison.

Salinas-Doria rose from lowly street dealer to making as much as $22 million a year, The Associated Press reported in 1999. He guaranteed cocaine and marijuana made it from Quintana Roo to Reynosa and then into the United States, according to the Mexican Attorney General's Office.

It is unclear whether prosecutors will reopen the 1990 Brownsville case that prompted Salinas-Doria to go on the lam.

Salinas-Doria entered the Donna police force in 1979, and took a job with Weslaco police the following year, according to The Monitor's archives. He was fired in 1982 after being investigated for selling drugs out of his police cruiser and other offenses, the AP has reported. He was never prosecuted.

His earliest convictions happened in 1983 when he pleaded guilty to possession of marijuana and in 1988 when he was convicted of conspiracy to sell marijuana and received 10 years' probation.

Salinas-Doria skipped bail on a 1990 charge in Brownsville that he tried to buy thousands of pounds of marijuana. Drug cases were later opened against him in Georgia and Houston.

Salinas-Doria's name also has been tied to the investigation into the murder of Francisco Jusino, a McAllen obstetrician who was killed in 1996. Salinas-Doria was living in Reynosa when his wife lost a baby Jusino delivered at a McAllen hospital. Police sought to question Salinas-Doria but never identified him as a suspect, according to Monitor archives

He was finally arrested in 1998 in Mexico. His confession led to the opening of 40 cases against members of Amado Carillo Fuente's cartel in Southeast Mexico and implicated the governor of Quintana Roo in drug trafficking, according to the Drug Enforcement Administration.

Salinas-Doria escaped from Mexican police later that year and was recaptured months later trying to enter Venezuela.

Mexico Praised Over Extraditions (SAE)

San Antonio Express, January 23, 2007

LAREDO — Alleged Mexican drug kingpin Osiel Cárdenas Guillén was arrested in 2003, but his reputed control over the Matamoros-based Gulf Cartel likely didn't end until this weekend, when Mexico took the surprising step of extraditing him to the United States for prosecution.

Before Friday night, when Cárdenas was taken to the United States with other accused drug traffickers, he was suspected of running the cartel's operations — and its bloody border feud with other traffickers — from his jail cell in Mexico City.

Cárdenas and 14 other extradited Mexican prisoners wanted by the United States went before a federal judge in Houston on Monday. Top U.S. officials praised the Mexican action as unprecedented.

Since taking office in December, Mexican President Felipe Calderón has taken several steps to combat the drug cartel violence that has spread across the country — including sending troops to trafficking hot spots and now the high-profile extraditions.

"We cannot overstate the significance of these steps," Deputy U.S. Attorney General Paul McNulty told reporters during a teleconference Monday. "The Calderón administration has staked out its position in favor of law-abiding citizens everywhere by choosing to stand up to these vicious criminals."

Mexico didn't give U.S. officials much time to prepare to accept the prisoners, McNulty said. They were taken to Ellington Field in Houston on three flights that landed beginning at 7 p.m. Friday. The last flight, carrying 10 prisoners, landed just past midnight, McNulty said.

Among the prisoners were Ismael Higuera Guerrero and his brother Gilberto Higuera Guerrero, both reputed top lieutenants for the Tijuana Cartel.

Also now in U.S. custody is Hector Palma Salazar, who with fugitive Joaquin "El Chapo" Guzman allegedly headed the Sinaloa Cartel.

But the prize catch was Cárdenas, who during his reign as reputed head of the Gulf Cartel founded the Zetas, an enforcement arm made up of military defectors who have grown into a feared group behind much of the violence along the border with Texas.

"This is the first time in the history of Mexico that they have extradited to the United States what amounts to a clean sweep geographically of the cartel leadership," Drug Enforcement Administration head Karen Tandy said during the news conference.

The removal of Cárdenas from communication with his organization raised questions about whether a power vacuum would usher in a wave of violence in Gulf Cartel territory, which reaches from Matamoros, across from Brownsville, to west of Nuevo Laredo.

"This is going to add to the ongoing war between these groups," said Bruce Bagley, an expert on drug trafficking at the University of Miami. "It happens every time you behead one of these organizations."

Violence in the short term is almost assured as the Gulf Cartel restructures itself and as the rival Sinaloa Cartel may perceive the group as vulnerable, Bagley said.

The Monitor's View (CSM)

The Christian Science Monitor, January 24, 2007

A new Mexican president, Felipe Calderón, has taken extraordinary steps to give fresh hope to a country that needs it. He's extradited drug kingpins to the US and sent troops into violent drug zones. This just may be a Mexican leader the US can get behind.

DOJ_NMG_0120843

In 2005, Mexico surpassed Colombia as Latin America's main producer and distributor of narcotics. And like "Plan Colombia," the multi-billion-dollar aid and law- enforcement effort supported by the US since the 1990s to suppress drug growing in that country, Mexico could now use a "Plan Mexico" to curb its own drug-gang scourge.

Mr. Calderón realizes he must first tackle the drug lords if he wants to improve the rule of law, human rights, and governance. Only then can he draw enough foreign investment to create jobs for the 40 percent of Mexicans who live in poverty and see El Norte as the promised land. (See a three-part Monitor series on Mexico that ends today.)

His boldest move since taking office Dec. 1 has been to deploy federal troops into places like Tijuana and Michoacán to confront both drug chieftains and corrupt local officials. (Tijuana police were disarmed during the operation.) Last year, Mexico saw more than 2,000 drug-related killings.

In recent days, Calderón has also sent more than a dozen captured drug bosses to the US for prosecution – a clear acknowledgment that Mexico's prisons and courts are too graft-ridden to safely contain them.

A US-educated technocrat who has shown the backbone of a live action figure, Calderón also launched a program to help Mexico's 100 poorest communities and another one to give cash incentives for companies to hire young workers. And he's proposed health insurance for infants.

Those compassionate moves indicate this leader of the conservative PAN party knows he barely won July's election against the leftist populist, Andrés Manuel López Obrador.

But they may also signal that the country's entrenched political establishment knows it must fix the country's fundamental problems or else it will see the election of a Hugo Chávez-style firebrand in 2012 by the "other Mexico."

Calderón is up against a deep culture of corruption and a concentration of wealth and power that only began to erode with the ouster of the long-ruling PRI party in 2000. His next steps, after cracking down on organized crime, must be to clean up the police and courts, while curbing public unions and breaking up monopolies. Last week's surge in the price of tortillas – a staple dominated by one company – shows the task he faces.

He has begun to open government actions to scrutiny and set up a uniform system for public spending. His severest test, however, may be in forming coalitions in the legislature, something his predecessor, Vicente Fox, failed to do. The PRI, which lost badly in the last election, may be open to assisting him.

The US should back Calderón's bold moves. For starters, it can reduce its consumption of illegal drugs and make it more difficult for Mexicans to cross the border and abandon their country. But now may be the time for the US to ask what more it can do to finally help fix its neighbor's seemingly intractable social and economic problems.

Gang Task Force Nabs 11 In Sweep (RMA)

By Stephanie Barry, Sbarry@repub.com

The Republican (MA), January 24, 2007

SPRINGFIELD - A local gang task force arrested 11 suspected gang associates early yesterday morning, billing the effort as a coordinated attempt to beat back rising street crime.

FBI supervisor Michael G. O'Reilly said 175 federal, state and city law enforcement officials joined in an orchestrated sweep at dawn. Eleven suspects were arrested on warrants and were in custody before noon, Springfield police records showed.

The police log did not specify the charges, but O'Reilly said the suspects were targeted for alleged narcotics dealing around the city's Mason Square neighborhood.

"We've been trying to get these guys off the street. The timing in the city was right," O'Reilly said yesterday, referring to an unsettling spike in violent crime including a shoot-out at a Main Street restaurant on New Year's Day.

In addition to the FBI and Springfield police, agents with the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives joined in the sweep, plus U.S. Marshals, Massachusetts State Police and members of the Hampden County Sheriff's Department.

Members of each agency contribute to the Hampden County Joint Gang Task Force. The task force last rounded up dozens of local Latin King affiliates in 2005.

DOJ_NMG_0120844

Yesterday, O'Reilly said law enforcement officials recovered a half-dozen handguns and small amounts of cash and drugs. Of the guns, he said ballistics tests will be performed to determine whether they can be linked to any local crimes.

"You never know what these guns are tied to," he said.

Springfield police spokeswoman Jennifer Flagg said joint law enforcement efforts are a key strategy in fighting local street crime.

"Partnerships with multiple law enforcement agencies allows us to pool our resources, share information on criminals and work towards putting them away for long prison terms," she said.

O'Reilly said the sweep was ongoing yesterday evening, and he expects to announce more arrests today.

Prosecutors: Car Dealers Were In Drug Business (CHIST)

Chicago Sun-Times, January 23, 2007

Two West Side auto dealer owners lined their pockets by selling luxury SUVs for cash to drug dealers, who used them to smuggle cocaine or heroin, prosecutors alleged Monday.

In one case, hundreds of thousands of dollars in cocaine was later found welded into the frame of an SUV seized by agents, prosecutors contend.

Luxury cars seized The accusations came as the trial for Amir Hosseini and Hossein Obaei began in federal court. The men's dealerships -- Amer Leasing Sales, American Car Exchange and SHO Auto Credit -- were shuttered by authorities in 2005 and more than 100 vehicles, including Jaguars, BMWs, Cadillacs and tricked-out SUVs, were seized.

Hosseini, of Winnetka, and Obaei, of Northbrook, are accused of using their businesses as a haven for drug runners and gang-bangers, laundering millions of dollars. They allegedly helped drug dealers conceal their large cash payments for vehicles and also put liens on paid-off cars.

The liens meant that if the feds seized the vehicles, they would have to turn them back over to the car dealers. The dealers then allowed the gang-bangers to recover the vehicle -- or any drugs still stashed inside, the government alleges.

But defense lawyers say their clients were legitimate businessmen who weren't about to question how their clientele were able to pay in cash.

"Mr. Obaei is a used car dealer. He is not a drug dealer," said his lawyer, Andrew Staes.

Staes said if some of Obaei's clients were drug dealers, there's no evidence he knew about it.

But Assistant U.S. Attorney Daniel Rubinstein said the two "took street money and drug money and converted it back into luxury cars."

Drugs welded into frame In opening statements, Hosseini's lawyer, Pat Tuite, said many of the witnesses expected to testify were doing so to save their own skin. He suggested sales people who worked for the men were tied to drugs and gangs -- not the owners.

While seizing SUVs at the U.S.-Mexico border, the Drug Enforcement Administration and FBI discovered many were purchased at the West Side dealerships.

In one case, a drug-sniffing canine hit on an SUV but authorities couldn't find the "trap," a hidden compartment used by drug dealers to stash drugs. They soon learned from witnesses that the cocaine was packaged and actually welded into the car's frame, Rubinstein said.

Taxpayers Footing Bill For Illegal Immigrant's Defense (KNOXNS)

By Jamie Satterfield

Knoxville News Sentinel (TN), January 24, 2007

Taxpayers, check those wallets.

If they seem a little light, consider the legal bills for a Mexican citizen's fight to get out of jail pending a Knoxville drug charge to which he pleaded guilty Tuesday.

Juan Lino-Gomez, 28, pleaded guilty before U.S. District Judge Tom Varlan to charges that he conspired with three other men to sell marijuana in East Tennessee over a two-year period.

DOJ_NMG_0120845

Assistant U.S. Attorney Mike Winck said Lino-Gomez in a single transaction last July sold 100 pounds of marijuana. Unlucky for him, though, his customer turned out to be an undercover agent, and he and his alleged cohorts were arrested, Winck said.

But Lino-Gomez's case offers up more than a garden-variety pot-pushing conspiracy. It is a primer on the price tag that prosecutions involving illegal immigrants can carry.

Start with the salaries of lead investigators, U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration Agent Todd Lee and Knoxville Police Department Investigator Bruce Conkey.

Next, add in cash taxpayers fork out to cover Winck's salary. As a veteran federal prosecutor, he doesn't come cheap.

Then, figure in the cost of defense attorney Stephen Ross Johnson, who was appointed to the case because Lino-Gomez said he could not afford to hire counsel.

Appointed attorneys earn $92 per hour up to a maximum of $7,000. A court-appointed attorney can earn another $5,000 to handle an appeal.

Because Lino-Gomez has not yet been sentenced, the cost of his defense has not yet been calculated. But Johnson certainly has racked up dozens of hours of work in the case, if not more. After all, the zealous defense attorney pitched an appeal for Lino-Gomez's freedom to two local judges and an appellate court panel.

According to court records, Lino-Gomez first entered the United States on a student visa. He returned on a work visa, but it had long run out when he was nabbed last July peddling marijuana in Knoxville.

Winck asked U.S. District Magistrate Judge Bruce Guyton to keep Lino-Gomez behind bars. He argued it was a no-brainer.

"Defendant is a citizen of and has ties to Mexico," Winck wrote. "(He) is facing a lengthy sentence if convicted. (He) has no ties to this district."

Not so fast, Johnson countered.

"A determination may be made that he is not deportable on the basis of his direct familial relationship with United States citizens, such as his two biological children," Johnson wrote in rebuttal.

Guyton sided with Winck. Johnson appealed to Varlan, who also sided with Winck. Johnson then took his argument to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. A three-judge panel shot him down in an order filed last month.

"The defendant is not a United States citizen," the court order stated.

Bloomberg, Other Big-city Mayors Hold Gun Summit In D.C. (AP)

By Devlin Barrett, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Dozens of mayors from around the country gathered Tuesday to urge the new Democratic Congress to fight crime by allowing wider tracking of illegal guns.

New York Mayor Michael Bloomberg and Boston Mayor Thomas Menino were joined by 50 other mayors, who argue more access to gun sales data would reduce crime in the streets of their cities.

Minneapolis, Miami, Newark, N.J., and Omaha, Neb., were among the cities represented.

Bloomberg, a moderate Republican, said it was time to "begin showing Congress that it is possible to find common ground on common sense issues."

"We refuse to fall into the same old trap that it is an either-or: either respect the rights of gun owners or keep illegal guns out of the hands of criminals," Bloomberg said. "That's ideological nonsense, and we've just got to move past it."

To buttress their case, several of the mayors cited the recent rises in violent crime across the country.

FBI data show that violent crime rose 3.7 percent nationwide in the first six months of 2006 compared to the previous year.

In New York, the murder rate rose almost 10 percent in 2006, though the overall crime rate continued to decline.

New York's police commissioner, Ray Kelly, said: "After a significant downturn across the nation, violent crime is once again on the rise. Many cities are experiencing a substantial increase in shootings and homicides."

The mayors, most of whom were in town for separate meetings later this week of the U.S. Conference of Mayors, faulted the federal government for not doing more to crack down on the illegal movement of guns across city and state lines.

DOJ_NMG_0120846

The White House has said violent crime has been reduced significantly in recent years, especially in many large cities, and a lot of the credit for that goes to mayors and law enforcement personnel and cooperation at the local, state and federal levels. It has said President Bush and Attorney General Alberto Gonzales are committed to making sure that existing laws are enforced.

For years, Bloomberg and others have complained about the National Rifle Association's powerful opposition to allowing the government to release gun sales records, also known as trace data, to show which tiny percentage of gun dealers are providing the bulk of guns used in crimes.

The NRA and other groups have derided the mayor's agenda as an elitist attempt to fix local crime problems by curtailing the national right to bear arms under the Second Amendment of the Bill of Rights.

Wayne LaPierre, the CEO of the NRA, called Bloomberg's argument "a wolf in sheep's clothing for the average gun owner in the United States."

LaPierre argued past gun trace data was misused in a way that weakened criminal prosecutions of criminals.

"The rest of the country doesn't really want New York City-style gun laws imposed on them ... where (gun) permits are given out to the elite and the famous while the average guy is flat out of luck," LaPierre said.

The mayors contend lax enforcement of national laws has brought more guns and armed criminals to their doorsteps.

"Illegal guns are a national problem that require a national response," Menino said.

Menino and Bloomberg formed Mayors Against Illegal Guns last year to press the government to share federal trace data with local law enforcement.

That trace data could also be used in lawsuits against dealers and gun manufacturers.

The mayors argue that if the trace data were shared, dealers would not be able to skirt or break the law when selling to so-called straw purchasers _ those who technically buy the weapons but quickly give them to someone else.

During the gathering, Bloomberg also offered another declaration of confidence in his police commissioner.

"I guarantee you he will be our commissioner for the next three (years). After that, Ray, you're on your own," Bloomberg joked.

Mayors Unite On Gun-tracking Effort (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

More than 120 of the nation's mayors urged Congress yesterday to allow federal and local law enforcement to share gun database tracking information in an effort to curtail the illegal sale of firearms.

City executives said they have run out of options to keep guns off their streets. Gun-buyback programs and stings on vendors who violate laws haven't solved the problem, they said.

Mayors Michael R. Bloomberg of New York and Thomas M. Merino of Boston, who in April formed a coalition called Mayors Against Illegal Guns, have crafted a policy agenda for Congress.

They are attempting to avoid serious conflicts with pro-gun groups, sportsmen and advocates of the Second Amendment, which protects Americans' right to bear arms.

"Gun owners support common-sense policies to keep illegal guns off our streets. This is not a Second Amendment issue; this is a crime issue," Mr. Bloomberg said yesterday during a coalition meeting in Washington. "The fact is, respecting the rights of gun owners while cracking down on illegal guns are completely compatible goals."

The mayors are asking lawmakers to allow the federal Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco Firearms and Explosives (ATF) to share gun registry information with city and state police forces. Conservative Republicans who oppose additional laws restricting gun purchases and ownership call the idea an undue intrusion on privacy rights.

An appropriations bill that passed in 2003 included an earmark amendment submitted by Rep. Todd Tiahrt, Kansas Republican, that limited the type of gun-tracing information that the ATF could share with police.

Some Republicans now are joining Democrats to support removal of that policy.

The mayors yesterday also announced the creation of a congressional task force that will study gun violence and recommend solutions to curb illegal gun sales.

DOJ_NMG_0120847

The committee will include Reps. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat; John Conyers Jr., Michigan Democrat; Peter T. King, New York Republican; and Mark Steven Kirk, Illinois Republican.

"Death by illegal guns doesn't show any racial, partisan, political or religious grounds. It is a national problem that has to be addressed," Mr. King said.

Former Federal Agents Suing City, Charge Police Corruption (BVND)

By Mike Robinson

AP, January 24, 2007

CHICAGO - Chicago police retaliated with harsh reprisals against two government agents who blew the whistle on one of the city's most corrupt police officers ever, a federal court jury was told Tuesday.

Diane V. Klipfel and Michael V. Casali, a married couple who were agents with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, found their lives in ruins after they leveled corruption charges in 1992 at decorated narcotics investigator Joseph Miedzianowski, attorney Sally H. Saltzberg said.

"They went to enormous lengths to retaliate against Diane and Mike for their allegations," Saltzberg said during opening statements in the couple's civil lawsuit against the city.

Klipfel and Casali are seeking almost $10 million apiece in damages from the city, saying they were not only the targets of retaliation but the victims of a "blue wall of silence" designed to cover up corruption.

City of Chicago attorney Stephen Baker scoffed at the notion that the city had any responsibility for the problems that beset the couple.

He told jurors that police officials all but begged ATF for information about wrongdoing on the part of Miedzianowski. But it was the Chicago police who were met with silence, Baker said.

He noted that Klipfel had not only become involved in a controversy over Miedzianowski but allegations against superiors in her office.

Eventually, the "60 Minutes" television show produced a documentary about problems in the Chicago ATF office and an investigation was launched by the inspector general's office.

Klipfel and Casali have not been ATF agents since the late 1990s.

Saltzberg promised to shine a light on corruption and indifference at the police department. Among planned witnesses for the couple is Chicago Police Superintendent Phil Cline, who once supervised Miedzianowski.

Miedzianowski, who is also a defendant in the suit, was convicted in April 2001 of racketeering, narcotics conspiracy and firearms violations. He is serving a life sentence at a federal prison in California.

Witnesses at his trial testified that Miedzianowski supplied street gang members with drugs, guns and ammunition when he was supposed to be investigating them.

Attorneys for Klipfel and Casali plan to show jurors a televised deposition given by the wayward former officer from his federal prison.

Saltzberg said that "Phil Cline knew Miedzianowski was a crook - it was hard to miss." She said that Cline filed several reports suggesting that Miedzianowski might have been involved in corruption.

But she said that he didn't follow up on them.

Meanwhile, police hit Klipfel with 129 allegations of corruption on her part and additional allegations against her husband, Saltzberg said.

Miedzianowski also threatened the couple with violence, bringing a gunman into their home and telling him to "kill them all," she said.

The gunman didn't follow Miedzianowski's order. But the fear of what might happen prompted the couple to send their children away repeatedly. They also made the children sleep in a closet in the center of the home and kept them away from the walls and windows at other times, Saltzberg said.

IMMIGRATION:

DOJ_NMG_0120848

President Renews Push For Bill On Immigration (WT)

By Stephen Dinan

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

President Bush last night said his administration has made huge strides clamping down on illegal border crossings, and called on Congress to finish the job this year by passing a guest-worker bill and extending citizenship rights to illegal aliens.

In a State of the Union address designed to highlight areas where he could work with the new majority Democrats, Mr. Bush put immigration front and center, along with education, health care and energy policy -- all domestic issues where he thinks he can find common ground.

"Convictions run deep in this Capitol when it comes to immigration. Let us have a serious, civil and conclusive debate -- so that you can pass and I can sign comprehensive immigration reform," Mr. Bush said.

But the president's push will isolate many conservative Republicans who oppose his immigration and education plans, and shows the precarious balancing act Mr. Bush will have to do with his own party as he works with Democrats to try to achieve legacy accomplishments.

"These last two years will be the years that the president's trying to establish a legacy. Oh, how I wish there was a magnificent legacy already in place," said Rep. Steve King, Iowa Republican, who said the president is tearing their party apart over his immigration policy, which Mr. King called amnesty.

"You can hear the hammer drive the wedge right into the Republican Party," said Mr. King, a supporter of Mr. Bush's war on terror.

House Republicans last year blocked Mr. Bush from winning a guest-worker bill, instead sending him an enforcement bill that he signed.

Mr. Bush did not tread new ground on policy last night, instead repeating his demand for an immigration bill that tackles five issues: border security, interior enforcement, a new program for future foreign workers, a path to citizenship for current illegal aliens and a push to assimilate immigrants into society.

But his emphasis on border security was new, compared with his past three State of the Union addresses.

Mr. Bush promised to fulfill his pledge of doubling the size of the U.S. Border Patrol, and said, "We will enforce our immigration laws at the work site and give employers the tools to verify the legal status of their workers so there is no excuse left for violating the law."

Rep. Jeff Flake, Arizona Republican and a supporter of Mr. Bush's immigration stance, said it helps to have Mr. Bush continue to push the issue.

Tamar Jacoby, a senior fellow at the Manhattan Institute who acts as an informal adviser to the White House on the issue, said Mr. Bush knows he must convince Republicans who say they cannot work on a broad bill without first tackling border security.

"How does he do that? He speaks to the issue that's holding them up. That's the right thing to do," she said. "He has the belief that if he pushes too far, they're just going to push back. The main thing he can do is address some of their concerns and motivate them."

Some of Mr. Bush's supporters then want the president to get into policy details, calling lawmakers to the White House and hammering out a compromise himself. Others say he should stay above the fray and instead focus on pressuring his own party.

"If he would do either, I would be thrilled," said Angela Kelley, deputy director of the National Immigration Forum. "So far he has made some terrific speeches about this issue, but yet, calling meetings, having press conferences, making phone calls, dispatching deputies to the Hill -- any of those steps are absolutely critical."

She said Mr. Bush has made a solid start, "but we're far from it being into the end zone."

For now, Mr. Bush's focus appears to be on convincing his own party he is serious about enforcement.

Southwest border apprehensions were down 26 percent from October through December 2006, compared with the same period in 2005. U.S. Border Patrol officials said that was a result of the president's decision last year to boost Border Patrol resources and deploy National Guard troops to help. Apprehensions of non-Mexican illegal aliens fell 58 percent.

DOJ_NMG_0120849

Immigration authorities say fewer apprehensions means fewer individuals are trying to cross, though critics say it could mean illegal aliens are shifting to cross in less-well-patrolled places.

Mr. Bush also pointed to stepped-up work-site enforcement, saying the number of arrests last year was seven times the level in 2002.

But Mr. King said 1,000 illegal aliens still cross the border each day and more needs to be done. He said Mr. Bush should start by following through on building 700 miles of border fence and producing the report on operational control of the border that he agreed to in signing the fence bill.

Immigration Proposals Reverse Party Loyalties (WSJ)

By June Kronholz And Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- President Bush's call for an overhaul of immigration law is largely a reprise of earlier plans, but with a twist: With his party out of power on Capitol Hill, it could pass.

Mr. Bush elevated immigration to one of four domestic-policy priorities in his State of the Union address, even while offering an agenda similar to last year's plan. He proposed a temporary-worker plan, a path to legalization for some of the estimated 12 million illegal immigrants, tougher border enforcement and measures to ensure employers hire only legal workers.

TERMS OF ENTRY

• The Issue: President Bush again is making immigration reform a top priority in his domestic agenda.

• Behind the Debate: Whether to provide temporary immigrant workers a path to citizenship is a key difference between Mr. Bush and congressional Democrats.

• What's Next: Democrats are likely to press for their own "comprehensive" legislation and rely on Mr. Bush to help round up enough Republican votes.

Democratic control of Congress clears one big obstacle: a Republican House leadership focused on a crackdown, in part by building a fence along 700 miles of the U.S.-Mexico border. Both houses are expected to take up bills that resemble Mr. Bush's plan.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) said his chamber could pass a bill by August. The House, which hasn't held hearings on the most contentious issues, will take longer, although Rep, Zoe Lofgren (D., Calif.), who heads the House immigration subcommittee, said "we can get somewhere."

Even so, immigration is such a volatile issue that passing a bill "is going to be a mountain to climb," said Frank Sharry of the National Immigration Forum, a coalition of pro-immigration business, labor and advocacy groups.

Mr. Bush and congressional Democrats agree on the outlines of a bill, but they are far apart on details. Both agree on helping employers fill jobs with temporary workers. Without that, they say, the U.S. economy will remain a magnet for illegals. But the president insists those workers must eventually leave, a key demand of conservatives who fear the growing Hispanic population is undermining American culture. Generally, Democrats want to let them stay and eventually become citizens.

The issue cuts across party lines, which will make compromise difficult. Business groups, which generally are friendlier to Republicans, say making workers go home would be disruptive to employers and create a permanent underclass with no loyalty to the U.S. Mr. Bush's insistence that workers go home "would be the death knell for bipartisan agreement," Mr. Sharry said.

Labor unions, which are generally supportive of Democrats and wield more clout after Democratic wins in the November elections, fear that temporary workers will drive down wages for U.S. workers.

Mr. Bush and congressional Democrats favor legalizing many of the illegals now in the U.S. A Senate bill last year proposed treating them differently depending on how long they have been in the U.S. That's seen as unworkable, even by House Democrats.

Coming up with an alternative will be contentious. The president and pro-immigration Democrats fear that a plan that allows too many illegal immigrants to stay will be branded an amnesty by wary voters, while a plan that allows too few to stay won't work.

DOJ_NMG_0120850

The White House wants illegal immigrants to pay a fine and back taxes, learn English and hold jobs for a number of years (as yet unspecified) before they could legalize. The approach is popular with Democrats.

Passage of a bill in either house will depend on the support of Republicans, however, many of whom complain those measures are a slap on the wrist.

The November elections have given a boost to supporters of immigration overhaul, which could help ease passage. Hispanic voters peeled away from Republicans, largely because of the party's hard-line stand on immigration, and both parties are eager to claim that growing voter bloc.

Employers want a bill that sets worker-verification guidelines and protects them from immigration raids. The administration stepped up enforcement last year, making thousands of arrests. That created a furor among employers who say they have no way to know if a worker is legal.

The issue cuts both ways. Democrats fear handing Mr. Bush a big legislative victory, but they hope he can deliver Republican votes. Still, lawmakers are hopeful. "This is one issue where there's a lot of overlap between the president's position and our position," said Rep. Howard Berman (D., Calif.). "What the president hasn't ever been willing to do is spend credits on it. I hope he has some left."

Southern California Immigration Raid Nets 761 Arrests (FINDLAW/AP)

By Gillian Flaccus, Associated Press Writer

AP, January 24, 2007

(AP) - SANTA ANA, California-Federal immigration officials said Tuesday they arrested more than 750 illegal immigrant fugitives from 14 countries in what they described as one of the biggest such sweeps in U.S. history.

The weeklong series of raids in the five-county Los Angeles region targeted illegal immigrants who had previously been deported for crimes or had ignored final deportation orders.

The raids netted 338 illegal immigrants who were arrested at their homes and apartments and 423 who were identified in area jails since Jan. 17. Those already jailed will be transferred to federal custody when they finish serving their state sentences, said Virginia Kice, spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

The sweep netted illegal immigrants from Mexico, Honduras, Ukraine, India, Japan, Poland and Trinidad, among others. Of the 761 people arrested, more than 450 have already been deported, Kice said.

The raids were a major push within "Operation Return to Sender," a crackdown that has resulted in 13,192 arrests nationwide since late May. Immigration officials have also identified 3,000 inmates in state and local jails who will be deported.

The operation targets those illegal immigrants who hide after skipping their voluntary deportation proceedings and criminals who have re-entered the United States after being previously deported for crimes in the U.S.

Despite ongoing efforts, officials estimate that about 600,000 illegal immigrants who have ignored deportation orders are still at large, Kice said.

The Associated Press rode along for the first day of sweeps in Orange County last week.

Immigration officers gathered at 4 a.m. (1200 GMT) in a chilly parking lot for a pep talk, then fanned out to houses in Anaheim and Santa Ana.

At the first stop, an apartment complex, a half-dozen agents arrested a 29-year-old illegal immigrant wanted for a DUI conviction. Kice said that man is now helping them find his brother, who is a registered sex offender and immigration fugitive.

At the second stop, the agents were looking for a convicted rapist and immigration fugitive. Instead, they arrested six men who could not provide legal papers - and later learned that all six were illegal and four had criminal records.

The rapist they sought had moved out the week before, Kice said. Officials are still searching for him.

Back Taxes Sought From Closed Center (BUFFNEWS)

Buffalo News, January 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120851

In an attempt to recoup back taxes from the closed St. Augustine Center, the Tax Division of the U.S. Justice Department has filed a federal suit seeking to block state court action in the case.

The Tax Division served papers Friday on State Supreme Court Justice John A. Michalek, who shut down the center last February, and Adam W. Perry, the attorney he assigned to close the books on the center and pay off unpaid workers.

U.S. District Judge John T. Elfvin has scheduled a hearing on the suit for Wednesday.

Perry noted this is the third time in recent months that the Justice Department has sought to intervene in the state court action, in which he is seeking to partially compensate 85 employees, each now entitled to about $1,500, for their work during the final months.

The Justice Department lawsuit describes the court action as an effort to block Perry from distributing any funds collected for St. Augustine employees and "enjoin the New York State Supreme Court, Erie County, from proceeding further in the receivership action."

The federal government hopes to secure at least partial funding of the $699,553 in unpaid federal employment taxes, federal income tax liabilities and interest that continue to accumulate against the center.

Three weeks ago, Elfvin quashed an Internal Revenue Service effort to have the entire tax dispute handled in federal court. And last week, Michalek refused to permit the IRS to intervene in the state case.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Unveils Health Plan Tied To Tax Deduction (USAT)

By Julie Appleby

USA Today, January 24, 2007

President's Bush's State of the Union health care proposal couples an old idea, capping tax-free benefits for health care, with a new one: a standard deduction for all who buy health insurance.

If approved, and the plan faces a chilly reception in the Democrat-controlled Congress, the administration says it would give people who buy their own health insurance equal tax breaks with those who get coverage through their jobs. The tax savings could help 3 million to 5 million of the nearly 47 million now-uninsured people buy coverage, the administration says.

For the rest, the president proposes moving some money that currently goes to hospitals and nursing homes into subsidies to help lower-income people buy health insurance through state-sponsored insurance programs.

Opponents, such as liberal advocacy group Families USA, says the proposal mainly benefits wealthier Americans. Others say it could lead some employers to drop insurance, forcing workers onto the individual market, where some may not be able to afford coverage.

A similar plan to cap tax-free health benefits offered by employers was proposed by President Reagan in 1986 but failed to pass Congress.

Rep. Pete Stark, D-Calif., chairman of a key health subcommittee in the House, said he would not even consider hearings on the proposal. He says it would give wealthier Americans with health insurance a far larger tax break than the lower-income uninsured that the plan purportedly aims to help.

The White House outlined some elements of the plan:

•Health insurance offered through jobs would become taxable income. But insured workers' taxable income would be reduced by a deduction of $15,000 for a family plan or $7,500 for an individual. Currently, the average family health plan offered by employers costs $11,500 for families and $4,300 for singles, a Kaiser Family Foundation survey says. Only people with insurance worth more than the deduction would pay more tax.

•People who buy their own insurance would get the same deductions: $15,000 for families, $7,500 for singles, lowering their taxable income by that amount — even if their health plans did not cost that much. Currently, only the self-employed who buy their own insurance get a tax deduction.

•The administration says more than 100 million workers — out of about 175 million — who now get their insurance through their jobs would see their tax bills go down.

"For a lot of people, it would be a bonanza," says Joe Antos of American Enterprise Institute. He and other supporters of the plan say it would encourage employers to offer less-generous insurance plans. They say generous plans drive up the cost of health care.

Paul Fronstin of the Employee Benefit Research Institute says the proposal might lead more employers to drop coverage. Some employers might also find that younger, healthier workers would opt out of company plans to buy their own insurance, leaving sicker, more expensive workers behind, he says.

Bush's Insurance Plan Looks DOA (RC)

By John Stanton

Roll Call, January 24, 2007

President Bush's call for a major overhaul of the employer-based health insurance system is unlikely to see much, if any, action in the Senate this year in the face of near-universal opposition from Democrats and a GOP base still stinging from the Social Security debacle in the 109th Congress.

Bush was expected to make the proposal a central aspect of the domestic policy section of his State of the Union address. The plan would create a new tax on individuals who have insurance through their work if the value of their coverage exceeded $15,000 a year. Those taxes would be used to help subsidize coverage for low-income citizens.

Senate Democrats have largely dismissed the proposal, charging it will cause a significant tax burden on middle-class families.

Senate Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Chairman Edward Kennedy (D-Mass.) said that while he is pleased the Bush administration is considering some sort of insurance overhaul, the president's plan is inadequate.

"The President's proposals are an opportunity missed. They will not improve access to good coverage, and won't help working families afford the spiraling cost of health care," Kennedy said in a statement.

Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.), a longtime proponent of reforming the tax code's health insurance provisions, said he opposes Bush's plan. "I'm especially troubled by the example of a couple who makes $50-$55,000 a year, with a youngster who has big medical bills," Wyden said. "They'll pay hundreds of dollars in new taxes."

Presidential hopeful Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) said he would not support the plan. "It's not going to be adequate," Obama said, arguing it does not do enough to cover a number of problems with the current insurance system.

A Democratic leadership aide argued that with Democrats strongly opposed to the proposal it is unlikely GOP leaders will have the muscle necessary to force Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) to take up the issue.

Republicans could attempt to attach it to stem-cell research — the only major health care bill scheduled for consideration in the near future — but the Democratic aide said Republicans would have difficulty drumming up the 60 votes needed to do so.

"They don't have the votes. It's not going to come up," the aide said.

A senior GOP leadership aide acknowledged that the insurance reforms would likely not get a serious look in the Senate.

However, the aide said Minority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) could take a page from last year's Democratic playbook and use the issue to try to paint Democrats as protecting upper-middle-class citizens at the expense of the poor. "It gives us something to talk about," the aide said.

Democrats warned that should the GOP make a political push over the issue, they have begun laying the groundwork to use arguments similar to those Reid employed in 2005 to block Bush's Social Security plan.

For instance, one leadership aide pointed out that since word of the proposal began to leak late last week, Democrats have been successful in portraying the plan as a tax increase on the middle class and that by framing the debate in such a way, Republicans would be forced into the position of having to defend the proposal.

Similarly, a second Democratic aide said the plan's roots in the world of conservative think tanks and the seemingly arbitrary use of the $15,000 threshold will make it easy to paint as "this year's Social Security privatization. Drop it in the dumb file."

Bush Revives Some Past Proposals And Offers A New Initiative On Health Insurance (NYT)

By Robin Toner And Robert Pear

DOJ_NMG_0120853

New York Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 — President Bush delivered a domestic agenda to Congressional Democrats on Tuesday that was, in large part, modest and a reiteration of past proposals. Where he did break ground — on health care — his initiative was quickly dismissed by leading Democrats and seemed unlikely to form the basis of bipartisan action.

There were some notable omissions in Mr. Bush's speech. He did not offer a new proposal for dealing with the long-term financial problems in Medicare and Social Security, although he again identified those entitlement programs as a challenge that must be confronted. Nor did he make the grand gesture that might have spurred Congressional Democrats into the bipartisan talks on entitlements that administration officials insist they want.

Mr. Bush renewed his call for an overhaul of immigration laws, considered one of his best chances to accomplish something big in the current Congress. But in general, his domestic agenda reflected the political constraints of a conservative second-term president facing a newly empowered Democratic-led Congress.

Aside from energy, the major focus of Mr. Bush's domestic proposals was an effort to expand access to affordable health insurance, by creating a new tax benefit for those buying insurance on their own rather than through their employer. The new benefit would be part of a sweeping change in the tax code under which employer-provided health insurance, which is how more than half of Americans get their coverage, would be treated as taxable income. For decades, those benefits have been exempt from income and payroll taxes.

In effect, the president is proposing a new standard deduction for health insurance — $15,000 for families and $7,500 for individuals. That would mean lower taxes for more than 100 million Americans with employer-provided coverage worth less than the standard deduction, Mr. Bush said. But it would raise taxes for about 30 million people with more expensive plans, unless they switched to less costly alternatives, White House officials said.

Mr. Bush said the tax proposal was an effort to "level the playing field" between Americans buying insurance on their own and those who get it through their employers. "For the millions of other Americans who have no health insurance at all, this deduction would help put a basic private health insurance plan within their reach," he said. "Changing the tax code is a vital and necessary step to making health care affordable for more Americans."

Democrats, labor unions and some consumer advocates said the proposal would shake the foundations of the nation's health insurance system, still largely built around the workplace.

Congressional Democrats described the plan as a middle-class tax increase that would penalize people with good health benefits. They praised the new focus on health care, but said the Bush proposal was more likely to yield partisan debate than a search for consensus.

"It's difficult to imagine a proposal like this making it through the House or the Senate," said a spokesman for Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the Democratic leader.

Representative Charles B. Rangel, Democrat of New York and chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, said, "I cannot conceive of this as an olive branch, as an attempt to get something done."

Representative Pete Stark, Democrat of California and chairman of the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Health, said his panel would not consider Mr. Bush's proposal.

Prospects were less grim for immigration legislation. Mr. Bush renewed his push for a law that would toughen border security, grant legal status to the nation's illegal immigrants and create a temporary worker program to ensure a steady flow of foreign workers to businesses.

The proposal, which would also toughen criminal and financial penalties for employers who hire illegal immigrants, has a much stronger chance of passage in a Democratic-led Congress this year than it did when Republicans were in control, lawmakers of both parties say.

Leading Democrats in the Senate, who have consulted with Mr. Bush in recent weeks, expect to introduce legislation next month. House Democrats expect to follow.

But passage is far from assured. The A.F.L-C.I.O, which is expected to have more leverage in this Congress, is determined to scuttle the temporary worker program, saying it threatens to replace American workers with foreigners. Administration officials emphasized on Tuesday that the program would have to be “truly temporary,” which left some advocates for immigrants concerned that Mr. Bush might oppose a path to permanent residency or citizenship for temporary workers.

And some moderate Democrats, along with conservative Republicans, strongly oppose proposals that would legalize illegal immigrants, saying they amount to an amnesty for lawbreakers.

Still, critics and proponents of the legislation alike agree that this year offers Mr. Bush his best opportunity to build a bipartisan consensus on the issue. His focus on the need for immigrants to assimilate — by learning English and integrating more deeply into American society — may be intended to help ease concerns among some of his Republican supporters and some moderate Democrats.

Mr. Bush also returned to the signature bipartisan accomplishment of his first term, the No Child Left Behind legislation that requires schools to demonstrate yearly progress in students’ achievements. He urged Congress to renew the law.

'We Must Not Fail In Iraq' (WT)

By Joseph Curl,

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

President Bush pleaded with Congress last night to give his new strategy for victory in the struggle in Iraq a chance because "America must not fail in Iraq."

Defeat in Iraq, he said, would be "grievous and far-reaching" because the fighting in Iraq is part of a broader struggle against Islamic extremists across the Middle East and stretching to the farther reaches of the globe.

He proposed wide-ranging domestic goals in his 50-minute State of the Union address, proposing to balance the budget with no new taxes over the next five years, slash gasoline consumption by 20 percent over the next 10 years, double the Strategic Petroleum Reserve to 1.5 billion barrels of oil over the next 20 years, offer tax benefits for Americans who buy their own health insurance, create a "temporary worker program" as the first step in comprehensive immigration reform and "remain a clear voice for freedom" in Cuba, Belarus and Burma.

The domestic goals were relatively modest, but the president was at his most impassioned in arguing that the war in Iraq must not be abandoned.

America faces "a generational struggle that will continue long after you and I have turned our duties over to others," he said. "That is why it is important to work together so our nation can see this great effort through.

"For all of us in this room, there is no higher responsibility than to protect the people of this country from danger. ... To win the war on terror, we must take the fight to the enemy. Both parties and both branches should work in close consultation."

Democrats, who now control both the House and the Senate, sat quietly as Republicans stood in a raucous ovation when the president declared "nothing is more important at this moment in our history than for America ... to succeed in Iraq." Vice President Dick Cheney often stood to applaud as House Speaker Nancy Pelosi remained seated, unsmiling.

Mr. Bush avoided a focus on major initiatives on contentious matters that divide the two parties, as he did in 2005, for example, when he made major Social Security reform a central theme of his speech, only to see it fail.

He focused instead on Democrat-friendly issues, calling on Congress to enact immigration reform this year, set up new health care tax breaks by 2009, increase the military by nearly 100,000 members in the next five years, double the Strategic Petroleum Reserve by 2027 and cut congressional earmarks in half in the next fiscal year.

As he did two weeks ago, the president said the only way to secure the war-torn country is to send in thousands of additional troops.

"Our military commanders and I have carefully weighed the options. We discussed every possible approach. In the end, I chose this course of action because it provides the best chance of success. Many in this chamber understand that America must not fail in Iraq -- because you understand that the consequences of failure would be grievous and far-reaching," he said.

Democrats, many of whom support resolutions of opposition to the president's plan, quickly repeated their opposition in the wake of the speech.

"The president took us into this war recklessly," said Sen. James H. Webb of Virginia, who has been in office less than a month, who delivered the Democratic response. "The majority of the nation no longer supports the way this war is being fought; nor does the majority of our military. We need a new direction," including "strong regionally based diplomacy" and "a formula that will in short order allow our combat forces to leave Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0120855

The president urged Congress to unite in the struggle against international terrorism as Americans did in the days after the September 11 terrorist attacks.

"We went into this largely united -- in our assumptions and in our convictions. And whatever you voted for, you did not vote for failure. Our country is pursuing a new strategy in Iraq, and I ask you to give it a chance to work," Mr. Bush said. "And I ask you to support our troops in the field, and those on their way."

Mr. Bush acknowledged that terrorists have made inroads across the Middle East and said sectarian violence and insurgents have outstripped American forces in Iraq.

"This is not the fight we entered in Iraq, but it is the fight we are in. Every one of us wishes this war were over and won, yet it would not be like us to leave our promises unkept, our friends abandoned, and our own security at risk."

He said the United States cannot withdraw.

"If American forces step back before Baghdad is secure, the Iraqi government would be overrun by extremists on all sides. ... For America, this is a nightmare scenario. On this day, at this hour, it is still within our power to shape the outcome of this battle. So let us find our resolve, and turn events toward victory."

Mr. Bush sought at several points to soothe harsh partisan feelings, opening his address by noting the ascendancy of House Speaker Nancy Pelosi, the first woman to head either chamber of Congress.

It was "high privilege and distinct honor," he said, echoing Mrs. Pelosi's words introducing him, to be the first president ever to start the address by thanking "Madame Speaker." As the gathered lawmakers and officials gave a standing ovation, Mr. Bush turned from his lectern and shook Mrs. Pelosi's hand.

At that moment, Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones, Ohio Democrat, flexed her arms in the boxer's stance, as Mrs. Pelosi did at her swearing-in week.

After a rare round of bipartisan applause, Mr. Bush reached out to Democrats, challenging the new majority to work with Republicans to get things done.

"Congress has changed, but our responsibilities have not," the president said. "We are not the first to come here with government divided and uncertainty in the air. Like many before us, we can work through our differences and achieve big things for the American people."

Despite growing rancor between the two parties -- Mrs. Pelosi last week accused the president of swiftly enacting his "surge" plan to prevent opponents on Capitol Hill from blocking the strategy, words the White House labeled "poisonous" -- Mr. Bush said that "both parties and both branches should work in close consultation."

"Our citizens don't much care which side of the aisle we sit on -- as long as we are willing to cross that aisle when there is work to be done," he said.

Mr. Bush urged the congressmen to increase funding for his signature No Child Left Behind Act and reconsider school vouchers, urging Congress to give "families with children stuck in failing schools the right to choose some place better."

He repeated his rejection of new taxes, touted the booming economy -- in its 41st straight month of job growth, he noted -- and vowed to erase the federal deficit within five years.

Mr. Bush won far more applause from Democrats than from Republicans when he called for a "comprehensive" immigration bill and when he called for action to combat global warming. The entire Democratic side of the room stood for both, while many Republicans remained sitting and some of them shook their heads in seeming dismay.

Cameras in the chamber cut away to Rep. Tom Tancredo, the Colorado Republican who leads the House immigration caucus. Mr. Tancredo shook his head "no."

The biggest applause line of the night for Mr. Bush among Republicans was his call for an up-or-down vote in the Senate on his judicial nominees. But on the Democratic side just two stood -- Sens. Ben Nelson of Nebraska and Joe Lieberman of Connecticut, an independent who caucuses with the Democrats.

Mr. Bush made only a brief undetailed call for reform of Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid. "Somehow we have not found it in ourselves to act," he said. "So let us work together and do it now."

DOJ_NMG_0120856

One Republican-friendly feature of previous State of the Union addresses was notably absent. Mr. Bush made no mention of efforts to amend the Constitution against homosexual "marriage" by defining the union as joining a man and a woman.

In keeping the tradition, one Cabinet member -- last night it was Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales -- did not attend the speech in case of a major attack on the Capitol.

The White House sought to highlight the president's energy initiative, holding an afternoon briefing for reporters featuring senior administration officials and lifting the usual embargo on specific proposals in the address. "It is in our vital interest to diversify America's energy supply, and the way forward is through technology," he said.

According to the president's proposal, Americans could cut gasoline consumption by 20 percent within 10 years by sharply increasing the amount of ethanol and other alternative fuels that the government mandates must be blended into the fuel supply.

Under current law, fuel blenders must use 7.5 billion gallons of renewable fuel annually by 2012; Mr. Bush wants to increase that to 35 billion gallons by 2017, which would achieve a 15 percent cut. The president's plan also calls for raising the fuel economy standards for passenger cars, a plan that Mr. Bush has proposed in the past but failed to win from Congress. Doing so would reduce annual gasoline consumption by 8.5 billion gallons, a further 5 percent reduction.

"Achieving these ambitious goals will dramatically reduce our dependence on foreign oil, but not eliminate it," he said.

Mr. Bush, who last year declared in his State of the Union that Americans are "addicted to oil," again urged lawmakers to move forward to reduce U.S. reliance on foreign petroleum.

Another major initiative in Mr. Bush's speech called for tax breaks for employer-financed health care benefits, analogous to the current child allowance. Instead of paying for health insurance with wages that already had been taxed, persons could pay for a significant part of their health insurance -- $15,000 per family and $7,500 for individuals -- with pre-tax dollars.

The White House said 80 percent of workers with health insurance through their jobs would see a tax cut as a result of the change. Still, analysts say some 20 percent could see a tax increase, including those workers whose health insurance cost more than the standard deduction.

As evidence of the partisanship in the House, Rep. Pete Stark, California Democrat and chairman of the Ways and Means health subcommittee, said he would not even consider holding hearings on the plan.

Other proposals in Mr. Bush's speech included a call for "new resources" to expand the No Child Left Behind education act, which requires testing in elementary and middle schools to make sure students are learning. The president wants to expand the program and is seeking to give poor students the right to private-school vouchers.

The administration's proposal calls for giving vouchers to students in schools that repeatedly fail to meet standards set by the federal law, but Democrats blocked that idea when the bill was drafted five years ago.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat and new chairman of the Senate committee overseeing education, said again yesterday that he would work to keep vouchers out of the education law.

Bush's Focus On Health Care Draws Criticism, New Hope (WSJ)

By Laura Meckler

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

President Bush's new focus on shrinking the ranks of the uninsured is appealing to Democrats and others who have long hoped for a renewed debate over how to extend health insurance – but Mr. Bush's specific plans still face criticism.

"While the administration's current proposal is deeply flawed, the attention that the president is devoting to the issue could signal real progress in addressing the health-care crisis," said Sen. Edward Kennedy (D., Mass), who has worked many years on health issues.

Mr. Bush's proposal would change how the tax break for health insurance is calculated. Critics said that approach would do little to reduce the ranks of the uninsured and could undermine the employer-based insurance system by shifting many Americans from stable employer-based insurance, where the risk is spread over an entire work force, into the unstable individual insurance market, where people are evaluated and charged based on their individual health and projected expenses.

If workers can get the same tax break for buying insurance on their own as they would get if they got insurance through work, employers may be tempted to drop insurance plans altogether. That could spell trouble for less-healthy workers who would likely pay higher premiums than they would if they were part of a group plan, critics say. "In the individual insurance market, people will be denied coverage because of family history, existing illnesses, or genetic makeup," predicted Rep. Pete Stark (D., Calif.), chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee's health subcommittee.

Critics also argue it would also do little to help those without insurance now. Most of the uninsured have relatively low incomes, meaning the new tax deduction for purchasing insurance on the open market is less valuable for them than for those who earn more. "Since most uninsured Americans pay low or no taxes, they would receive little help from this plan," said the Center for American Progress Action Fund.

Mr. Bush's second proposal would divert dollars that now support hospitals that care for the poor into state-created programs that subsidized basic insurance plans. That, too, came in for criticism and will surely be fought by the hospitals who rely on the existing programs. "The president's proposal pulls the rug out from under safety net hospitals that care for some of our nation's most vulnerable people," the American Hospital Association said.

Bush Wants Tax Code Changes To Spread Health Care (CHIT)

By Judith Graham

Chicago Tribune, January 24, 2007

On Tuesday, President Bush used his bully pulpit to argue that the nation should be doing much more to cover the uninsured.

"A future of hope and opportunity requires that all our citizens have affordable and available health care," he told Congress, which responded with hearty applause. It's a new message from the White House. And it's likely to have resonance as a reinvigorated debate on health reform gathers steam in Washington and the states.

"I think the president is jump-starting a national discussion over expanding health-care coverage," said Karen Ignagni, president of America's Health Insurance Plans.

The president's most important contribution is his focus on changing what health economists call "perverse incentives" in the tax code.

Currently, payroll and income taxes are waived for health insurance, unlike other forms of compensation. But only workers insured through their employers get these tax breaks.

Also, companies that spend more on health insurance get bigger tax breaks. As a result, "overly generous" policies that encourage "over-use of medical services" are common, said Michael Cannon, health policy director at the Cato Institute.

The president would change the incentives built into the tax code in three ways.

First, he'd eliminate the tax breaks for health insurance and treat it like any other form of compensation. That would make consumers more sensitive to costs, his advisers said.

DOJ_NMG_0120858

Second, the president would create a tax deduction for health insurance, similar to the existing deduction for having a child. Families would get a deduction of $15,000 beginning in 2009; individuals would could deduct $7,500. Annual increases would be tied to inflation.

Consumers would get the full value of the deduction, no matter how much they actually spent. Spending in excess of the deduction's amount would be taxed as ordinary compensation. Over a 10-year period, the extra taxes would pay for the broader deductions.

About 30 million people who currently get health insurance through employers would end up paying these new taxes if they keep current coverage arrangements, according to the administration. Another 120 million workers with employer-based policies would not be affected; most would enjoy some extra tax advantages.

Third, Bush would make the deduction available to everyone, wherever they purchase health insurance.

Paul Fronstin, director of health research at the Employee Benefit Research Institute, envisions a series of serious consequences. More employers would stop offering health insurance and younger and healthier workers would opt out of company plans if they could get better deals elsewhere.

"This would be the end of employer-based health insurance as we know it," Fronstin said.

Robert Reischauer, president of the Urban Institute, worries that the president's plan would push more people into the individual insurance market, which is notorious for being expensive and excluding people with pre-existing medical conditions. "It's a jungle, and that's on a good day," he said.

Sherry Glied, chair of the health policy department at Columbia University's Mailman School of Public Health, predicts that the president's proposal would have a "minimal" impact on the number of people without insurance. The vast majority of the uninsured pay minimal or no taxes, making a deduction of little value to them, she said.

The administration estimates 3 million of 47 million people with no insurance would gain coverage under its plans. States would also get more funds, redirected from other programs, to pay for new coverage for the uninsured.

Bipartisan Cooperation On Health Care Is Dead On Arrival (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

Washington Post, January 24, 2007

When it comes to domestic economic policy, Bush the Wounded President is much to be preferred over Bush the Decider.

After six years of stubborn inflexibility, President Bush signaled last night in his State of the Union address that he is ready to come to the negotiating table on a range of domestic issues, holding some new and credible ideas that are consistent with his conservative philosophy but open to ideas that aren't.

Yes, it is possible it could be a bluff, a desperate and hollow attempt by an unpopular president to demonstrate that he's still relevant to the policy process. But whether it is or not, the right response for Democrats is to call that bluff, treating it as the jumping-off point for a much-delayed dialogue on domestic policy and seeing how his proposals can be transformed into something better.

Think about it. Here's an oil-man president who, having denied the existence of global warming for almost a decade and embraced increased drilling as the favored energy policy, is now willing to lead the charge for alternative fuels, raise automobile mileage standards and begin a conversation on what to do about global warming.

No, he's not yet come around to a modest carbon tax and cap-and-trade system for CO2 emissions, but now that corporate types have begun to accept the idea, is there any doubt where this all is headed?

This is also an administration that started out arguing that federal budget deficits don't matter and that even the teensiest, tiniest tax increase will destroy the economy. Now he's eager to be seen as a budget-balancer who is open to higher taxes as part of a financial rescue for Social Security and knows he'll have to sacrifice some of his tax cuts to save others.

And here is a president willing to take on members of his own party to celebrate the accomplishment of hard-working Hispanic immigrants, normally the kind of people Democrats like to champion, and give them a path to citizenship.

But the most surprising and encouraging development is that a president who for six years has only nibbled around the edges of health-care issues has weighed in with some bold ideas to expand coverage, rein in costs and bring some fairness to the tax code. And get this: It actually involves raising taxes on the rich and lavishly insured and giving the money to the working poor and the uninsured.

Given that, you'd think Democrats would have welcomed a politically courageous proposal to put a cap on one of the biggest and most regressive features of the individual income-tax code. But instead, they've shifted reflexively into partisan attack mode, mischaracterizing the impacts of the proposal and shamelessly parroting the propaganda from the labor dinosaurs at the AFL-CIO.

"Dead on arrival," declared Rep. Pete Stark (D-Calif.), chairman of a key health subcommittee in the House, hinting at a dark conspiracy to kill off employer-sponsored health insurance.

"A dangerous policy that ultimately shifts cost and risk from employers to employees," said Charlie Rangel, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee.

Sen. Harry Reid, the majority leader, called it nothing less than an "attack" on American workers.

Worst of all was the five-page memo distributed by Sen. Edward Kennedy to Democratic colleagues that ought to embarrass a man who considers himself the Senate's leading health-care expert -- a compendium of half-truths, unsupported assumptions and outright lies. Kennedy reverted to the hackneyed rhetoric of class warfare, asserting that the president's proposals will do nothing for working families, give new tax breaks to the rich, increase the number of uninsured and encourage everyone to buy less insurance coverage than they should have.

In fact, all of these are almost precisely the opposite of the truth.

The president's health plan would, in fact, put a cap on a $200 billion-a-year tax break that now goes disproportionately to those with the most generous and costly employer-provided health insurance plans. It would redirect a small portion of that break to those who have less generous coverage or those who have to buy their own insurance because their employer does not offer it. For a few million of the roughly 47 million Americans with no insurance, it may also make the difference between being able to afford basic insurance or not.

The fact that some of those who have these rich policies happen to be members of auto or postal unions doesn't change that the president's proposal would make the tax code more progressive, not less. They are the aristocrats of the working class who, like lawyers, investment bankers and journalists, earn more in tax-free benefits each year than uninsured janitors earn in taxable wages. And whatever modest tax increase they might face from the cap on tax-free health benefits, it is certainly less than the tax cuts they got from Bush that Democrats are so eager to rescind.

Almost every health economist agrees that the tax subsidy for employer-paid health insurance is not only unfair but that it also encourages people to buy too much insurance, consume too much health care and pay too much for both. Bush deserves praise for having the political courage to confront the issue.

Now is this the magic bullet that will solve the health-care crisis? Of course not.

Would any real solution also require finding billions of dollars more to subsidize the purchase of health insurance by low-income workers and getting states to reform dysfunctional markets for individual and small group insurance? No doubt about it.

But anyone seriously interested in health reform would welcome the president's proposal as a basis for negotiations, raising public expectations and increasing pressure on the president to embrace more comprehensive reform. Unfortunately, that is not the approach of Messrs. Stark, Rangel, Reid and Kennedy, who apparently prefer demonizing the president and grandstanding on the issue until the next election.

Haven't we had enough of this?

The Knee-Jerk Opposition (WP)

By Ruth Marcus

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

If George W. Bush proposes something, it must be bad. Such is the knee-jerk state of partisan suspiciousness that when the president actually endorses a tax increase -- a tax increase that would primarily hit the well-off, no less -- Democrats still howl.

Such is the level of distrust that when the president finally disavows the free lunch and comes up with a program not financed with deficit spending -- indeed, one that would actually bring in extra revenue as the years go on -- Democrats still howl.

Listening to Democratic reaction to Bush's new health insurance proposal, you get the sense that if Bush picked a plank right out of the Democratic platform -- if he introduced Hillarycare itself -- and stuck it in his State of the Union address, Democrats would churn out press releases denouncing it.

This sad situation is largely of Bush's own making. He is reaping the poisonous state of affairs that he helped sow for six years. So many of the president's policies have been dishonest and wrongheaded, so much of his politics has been slashingly partisan, Democrats would be crazy if their instinctive reaction to a Bush plan for fill-in-the-blank wasn't intense distrust.

It's too bad, because the president's proposal to cap the deductibility of employer-sponsored health insurance deserves more of a chance than Democrats, from their initial reactions, seem inclined to give.

Instead of the irrational current system, in which all employer-sponsored health-care costs are deductible, Bush would create a standard deduction that would replace existing deductions for health insurance, both employer-sponsored and privately purchased, and other medical costs.

The deduction would be $15,000 for a family policy, leaving 80 percent of those with employer-sponsored coverage unaffected.

Yes, the plan should be more progressive, structured with refundable tax credits rather than a deduction, so that all can share equally in the benefit.

Yes, there are big risks involved, primarily that the already-teetering employer-based system will collapse as healthy individuals use their tax deduction to buy cheaper, private insurance, leaving employers with the older and the sicker.

And, yes, it's fair to argue that a more comprehensive approach -- Sen. Ron Wyden (D-Ore.) has proposed one -- is needed.

But Democrats -- if they care more about addressing health-care needs than scoring political points -- ought to be finding ways to improve and build on the Bush proposal, not condemning and mischaracterizing it. Given that nothing's going to pass without Democratic approval, what's the risk in engaging in the discussion?

The Bush plan starts with an assessment that has long been clear to sensible people across the political spectrum: The way the tax code now treats health insurance is unfair, regressive and counterproductive.

The fact that employers can deduct the full cost of health insurance premiums means that the richer you are, the bigger tax benefit you reap. That built-in advantage is exacerbated by the fact that the better-paid tend to have pricier insurance.

This unlimited subsidy increases wasteful spending, encouraging employers to purchase gold-plated plans and employees to use them. This drives up the cost of health care and, ultimately, insurance in a vicious cycle that ends up increasing the ranks of the uninsured.

Meanwhile, those who don't have employer-sponsored coverage get no tax break; the Bush plan would not only help those who already buy insurance on the private market, it would also encourage those currently uninsured to purchase coverage.

As Jason Furman, a leading Democratic economist, wrote last summer in Democracy: A Journal of Ideas, "[R]educing subsidies for pricey plans would likely lead to a health insurance system that includes more cost sharing, promotes more consumer consciousness, and plays a modest, but potentially meaningful, role in restraining health spending."

And so what do Democrats say when a Republican president suggests doing something along these lines? "It's a bad policy," House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel (N.Y.) told the New York Times. "We are trying to bring tax relief to the middle class. The president is trying to increase their tax liability." Likewise, the Senate Democrats complained: "President Bush's Health Insurance Proposal Amounts to a Tax Hike for the Middle Class."

This is flat wrong: According to the administration's analysis, on average, the top fifth of taxpayers would face a tax increase; the rest would save money.

If you doubt that some variation on Bush's plan is at least worth considering, try this thought experiment: What if the current system had the standard deduction that Bush wants and he was proposing, instead, to remove the cap and allow unlimited tax breaks, a benefit for the better-off and those with the priciest insurance?

Wouldn't Democrats be denouncing that, and demanding my imaginary status quo?

Health And Taxes (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120861

Now we're getting somewhere. The U.S. has long needed a debate over health care and tax subsidies, and President Bush got ready to rumble last night with his proposal to make insurance more affordable for most Americans.

For all the griping about our system, Americans have the most advanced health care in the world in part because we still have something resembling a private market for insurance. But it is not a truly efficient market because current tax policy lets businesses -- but not individuals -- deduct the cost of health expenditures. Thus most Americans with private insurance get it from their employers, which leads to inequities and insulates individuals from the real cost of their treatment decisions.

Mr. Bush's "standard deduction" for health care would move in the direction of solving both problems. Instead of giving employers an unlimited deduction and individuals none, Mr. Bush would give every family a $15,000 deduction ($7,500 for individuals) regardless of their insurance source.

That might mean a slight tax increase for those who currently have the most expensive insurance plans. But the average employer-sponsored family plan runs about $11,500 annually, and about 80% of the 160 million employer-insured Americans would benefit. All Americans with employer-sponsored insurance would have to report the value of their health benefit as income, but they could deduct the full $15,000 no matter how much their insurance cost.

The 17 million Americans who buy their own coverage would be big winners. And because the tax deduction would apply to payroll as well as income taxes, the benefits would be large even for low-income earners. So a family making $60,000 would wind up with a tax savings of $4,500, which would offset the cost of acquiring coverage in many states. Meanwhile, a young person making $40,000 could buy a high-deductible plan for, say, $1,000 and actually get a tax break of $2,250 for doing so. The Treasury estimates the new deduction would add at least five million Americans to the ranks of the insured, but our guess is that would be higher given the incentives all of this would provide for new private insurance products.

Individuals who buy their own health insurance now struggle because there are so few of them and they can buy only in a single state market. That means insurers have little incentive to develop and market innovative products. But this will change if the equalized tax treatment convinces enough people that it makes more sense to have their own, portable policies than take whatever their boss offers. Imagine the same kind of capitalist energy devoted to selling health insurance as you now see selling where to roll over your 401(k).

These new products are also likely to be policies that put individuals directly in charge of more routine spending. That's because removing the tax advantage would mean it will make less financial sense to "insure" for predictable expenses like several annual office visits. That in turn could put pressure on health care providers to post -- and actually compete on -- prices. Such new price awareness might even generate pressure for states that overregulate their insurance markets (New York, Massachusetts) to ease their costly mandates.

It's true that additional subsidies might be needed for some people with chronic illnesses who might have a harder time finding private insurance in this kind of world. And we'd also like to see a more national insurance market, with companies able to sell policies over the Internet free of the worst state mandates.

But the biggest problem with Mr. Bush's plan is that it wasn't offered two years ago, when it had a better chance to pass. The White House wasted its first term health energies on a failed attempt to buy votes with the Medicare drug benefit. Now the GOP is a minority in Congress, and Democrats aren't likely to favor Mr. Bush's ideas because they think health care is a winner for them in 2008.

Ways and Means Chairman Charlie Rangel was quick out of the box to call the President's idea "a dangerous policy that ultimately shifts cost and risk from employers to employees." But the numbers show that most Americans would have lower costs, and in any case the current tax treatment of health care benefits tends to benefit the well-to-do over the poor. Figures from the Lewin Group show that the average tax subsidy under the current system was $2,780 for families earning over $100,000 in 2004, while those with incomes below $30,000 got less than $725 in aid. Democrats ought to favor this idea on equity grounds alone.

But no matter if they don't. We're fated to debate health care in 2008 anyway, and Mr. Bush is finally offering a GOP reform based on market principles that these pages have encouraged for years. Most Americans can see for themselves that the current employer-based system is breaking down, as more companies pass along the rising cost of their insurance to employees (in higher co-pays and deductibles). Yet the system remains opaque and frustrating because of the underlying tax bias for businesses instead of individuals.

This status quo won't hold, and the political race is going to be between those who want to move to a more genuine market and consumer-based health care, and those who want to move toward Canada, Europe and more government control. The Bush plan ought to jump start that debate.

Bush's Better Health-care Policy (WT)

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

If a liberal president proposed reforming the tax code to give working families a bigger tax break for health care than corporations and giving poor families direct assistance to buy health care to boot, the New York Times and rest of the mainstream media would be choking back tears as it praised an initiative that was so bold in its compassion and desire for fairness.

But this proposal to make the tax code fair and health care affordable comes from President Bush with a Congress under Democratic control in the run to a presidential election year. So it will be attacked for failing to be everything that everyone else's proposal is not.

The fact is, the Bush plan slices through the thicket of policy proposals -- all of which boil down to dumping more people into state Medicaid programs -- and gives the self employed and uninsured, from the single mom who cuts hair to the electrician starting his own business, a tax break of about $3,800 to buy health care. Under the president's plan, millions of working-class and middle-class families could buy health care with pretax dollars. It only comes at the expense of the richest health plans of top CEOs. Even then, those wanting to avoid a tax bite at that level can set up a health-savings account.

According to a study by the Urban Institute, 44 percent of people without health care don't have it because they don't want to spend the money or because they don't sign up for government-run health plans even when eligible. Add the Bush tax-break money to recent increases in contributions people can now make to health-savings accounts and another Bush proposal to allow the people to buy private health plans at group rates and the affordability issue is largely solved.

It's not the entire answer, of course. Using existing monies to fund health care for children as tax credits for insurance would help, too. But you won't find the president's critics supporting his fair and compassionate plan. Their solution, as the employer-based health-care system falters, is to expand Medicaid. That's like forcing people into the medical equivalent of public housing.

Many opponents of the president's proposal support expansion of government-run health plans because they don't believe Americans, when given the money and freedom to choose their own health care, will wind up better off. Rather, they believe we , the people, will mess it up because we're too stupid or poor or old to make decisions that are in our best interests.

We heard the same wailings and warnings when the president reformed Medicare. Sen. Barack Obama and others may believe hope is audacious, but it's President Bush who believes and has demonstrated that it creates better health care for every American.

State Of The Union: Bush's Health Plan (PTR)

Pittsburgh Tribune-Review, January 24, 2007

Democrats oppose President Bush's health care plan to increase the number of insured Americans; it's too private and encourages the exercise of freedom.

They want to soak the rich to pay for the Big Brother of all entitlements: universal health care. That must be resisted; refer to out-of-control Medicare and Medicaid costs.

Yet the president brings forth the germ of a good idea: extension of tax deductions now provided for employer plans to anyone who buys his own insurance in the private sector.

But there's more.The plan institutes tax-code disincentives for buying Cadillac policies. Any premiums above $15,000 a year for a family or $7,500 for an individual would not be federal tax free. And folks who buy insurance on their own can take the full deduction even though their policy may cost less.

These are incentives to buy less insurance, which may force consumers to deal with the real costs when bills arrive for what insurance does not cover.

DOJ_NMG_0120863

Because many today have health insurance that covers even ordinary medical expenses, they have insufficient cause to restrain their use of services and demand efficiency and cost accountability from providers.

As long as well-insured patients are cash cows, health care costs will not be brought into reason.

The Bush plan would institute some free-market-oriented elements. And that's why it's worth exploring further.

EDITORIAL: State of the Union faces stiff challenges

President's health care, energy plans skip most effective reforms

January 23, 2007

Facing more Democrats in Congress, including several who seek to replace him in two years, President George W. Bush issued a confident State of the Union address Tuesday, every bit the commander in chief.

Although he revisited some of the same tired cliches about taking the battle to the enemy, his call not to fail Iraq was stirring: "Every one of us wishes that this war were over and won. Yet it would not be like us to leave our promises unkept, our friends abandoned, and our own security at risk."

But rhetoric does not win wars and Bush will have to put the bipartisanship he stressed to the test to devise a strategy that both countries can live with.

And the details of the domestic agenda — on which Bush's advisers set up the speech to be judged — fell short of inspiration.

Health care

Just as momentum is building for health care reform, Bush offered a plan that would leave in the lurch those who need it most, punish those who have good coverage and discourage employers from offering top-notch benefits.

The scheme he laid out would subject health coverage to taxes for the first time, then award deductions for basic health coverage and tax hikes on the good stuff.

The plan's goals are sound: To eliminate the inequity between people who get coverage as a perk of work (with no taxes) and those who have to buy their own expensive health care after taxes; and to help those who need coverage, many who are between jobs or work for small firms that don't provide it. But most of them don't make enough to pay enough taxes to be helped by the breaks ($7,500 for a single or $15,000 for a family) or to afford coverage.

The plan's goals are sound: To eliminate the inequity between people who get coverage as a perk of work (with no taxes) and those who have to buy their own expensive health care after taxes; and to help those who need coverage, many who are between jobs or work for small firms that don't provide it. But most of them don't make enough to pay enough taxes to be helped by the breaks ($7,500 for a single or $15,000 for a family) or to afford coverage.

The president did pledge to help states such as Michigan that are devising creative solutions to getting more people covered. But "support" and "incentives" are pretty nonspecific, so it's hard to tell whether they'll be effective, especially if Bush dumps more hard-to-insure clients on the states.

The need for substantial health care reform is acute, as the automakers and the 47 million people without coverage can detail. The president's plan doesn't advance that reform, and cannot be allowed to distract from it.

Energy

For Detroit, Bush's speech was a signal that offering to build more flex-fuel cars isn't enough. Automakers will have to pitch in on mileage efficiency, too — and Congress may see the president's goal as only a starting point.

The president's laudable plan to reduce gasoline use by 20% within 10 years may seem a bit tame to everyone but the automakers, and his strategy may not get the country even that far. Three-quarters of the cutback would come by replacing gasoline with ethanol or other alternatives, the rest from better car mileage.

But this combination of agricultural carrots and a single-industry stick will take America only so far. The country needs innovative breakthroughs across the energy spectrum, and not just to reduce dependence on foreign oil. It may make more sense for the auto industry to come to the table on global warming discussions, as an increasing number of big firms have. That could give automakers more flexible options to drive efficiency rather than dickering over specific mileage standards — and lead to innovations that have yet to be conceived.

Rx For Our Corporate Culture (USAT)

By Alan M. Webber

USA Today, January 24, 2007

Could it be that the stars are finally coming into alignment to address two enormous and curiously intertwined items on the American domestic agenda — health care costs and the future competitiveness of big American business, starting with the auto industry?

Maybe it's just a coincidence, but the headlines over the past several weeks, when clipped from the nation's daily newspapers and placed side by side, seem to suggest some cosmic intersection.

Start with the news from the recent big Detroit auto show. Here the latest developments have less to do with the specifics of new models, new hybrid technology or new marketing campaigns, and more to do with the macro-picture of the global competition.

In a nutshell, after decades of dogged pursuit, determined improvement and developing innovation, Toyota is poised to overtake General Motors as the world's largest automaker. The hard truth is that the U.S. auto industry, starting with GM, extending to the badly depleted Ford and on to Chrysler, is starting to run out of gas.

For longtime observers of the U.S. auto industry, and big American companies in general, the diminishment of the Big Three has been a long time coming. It is possible to trace the decline of these once-great companies back to the oil crises of the 1970s that opened the floodgates to Japanese-made cars, in particular, which boasted better fuel-efficiency, fewer defects and lower manufacturing costs.

But the cars themselves have only been part of the problem for U.S. automakers — and here the story gets more interesting, and the stars start to form a new, possibly intriguing constellation.

GM has sought to make a national issue out of the role that health care costs play in its competitive problems. Every year, according to GM North America President Troy Clarke, the company spends more than $5 billion on employee health care costs, and that number rises annually. Spread those dollars over the company's entire manufacturing operation, and, says GM, health care adds something like $1,500 to each car that GM produces. No wonder Toyota, Nissan and other foreign manufacturers can overtake U.S. companies, the logic goes.

But wait! All of sudden, help may be on the way. First, the new Congress, under Democratic control for the first time in 12 years, has already begun to articulate a renewed interest in health care.

True, the Democrats are more outraged that nearly 47 million Americans — 16% of the population — lack any health care coverage. With the start of the new Congress, Massachusetts Sen. Ted Kennedy, for one, has wasted no time in calling for the federal government to join his home state in creating comprehensive health care coverage for every American. At almost the same moment, a temporarily hobbled California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, himself a recent recipient of emergency health care measures in the wake of a painful skiing accident, proposed a sweeping $12 billon health care plan that would extend coverage to every Californian.

And as of last night, President Bush seems eager to join the far-flung Kennedy clan that stretches from Massachusetts to California, with his own health care reform initiative. Or, perhaps, finally something will happen to restructure the costs and coverage of health care, and to offer a financial Rx to America's ailing industrial giants.

But if that were to happen, the remedy might include some unexpected — and maybe even more restorative — side effects.

What if the real diagnosis of the competitive problems of GM, Ford and Chrysler, as well as many other deeply entrenched industrial companies, isn't really about health care costs? What if their problems aren't even about their products? What if, as is the case with so many large, old and ailing companies, the real problem is in their culture — in the structure, the habits, the deeply entrenched ways of doing business that, in many cases, date back at least 50 years? Too many of these dinosaurs have created workplaces and work styles that are simply inappropriate to today's global, knowledge-based economy.

DOJ_NMG_0120865

So how would reforming health care coverage change corporate culture? Imagine a shift in health care coverage that decouples it from your job. It's only a historical accident of President Franklin Roosevelt and the New Deal that coverage ever was linked to employment. Now, what if a Kennedy-Schwarzenegger reform movement — backed by a Democratic Congress that in the past has been willing to think of "portable insurance" that travels with each individual — can offer health care security to all Americans, even those stuck in dead-end jobs? Imagine the chance to leave a lousy corporate culture without losing your precious health care coverage.

Imagine a chance to join a more entrepreneurial company, maybe even a start-up, without having to worry about health care costs. Imagine being the CEO of one of the old, ailing companies and suddenly realizing that, while your prayer for relief from your health-care-cost headache has been answered, all of a sudden, you've got a bigger malady: Your best employees no longer feel the need to put up with your stagnant organization just for the security of a lavish health care plan.

If that were to happen, it would offer America more than a new world of better, fairer and more humane health care coverage. It could put the stars in a new alignment for our large industrial companies finally to become places where people want to work. In other words, they'd either have to heal themselves of their deeply rooted cultural disease — or die.

Bolten: Divided Leaders Have Shared Interest In Success (pol)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, January 24, 2007

White House Chief of Staff Joshua B. Bolten spoke to Mike Allen, The Politico's chief political correspondent, about the challenges a Republican president faces in dealing with a Democratic Congress following a brutal election. Bolten has been part of George W. Bush's operation since the Austin-based campaign of 2000, later serving as White House budget director. Here are excerpts of the conversation:

Q. What is your realistic assessment of what the president and Congress can accomplish this year?

A. I'm optimistic that the president's instinct to take on large issues will continue to be rewarded, even in the last two years of his term. The president's State of the Union is going to put on the table important reforms in health care, in energy, in the reauthorization of No Child Left Behind and in immigration. I think we have a good shot at substantial legislation in all of those.

Q. What will it take to make that happen with a Democratic majority on both sides?

A. It'll obviously take more cross-aisle cooperation than there has been in the past. But one of the silver linings of the change in control is that the Democrats now have a stronger interest in harvesting actual accomplishments. In the closely divided houses that we've had for most of this president's time in office, it's been difficult for Republicans to sustain a governing majority, especially in the Senate where you typically need 60 votes. It's always been difficult, without a larger majority than we've ever had, to advance a substantial legislative agenda. What the change in control means is that Democrats now will be under more pressure than they have been in the minority to deliver actual accomplishments. I hope what that means is that we will see more bipartisan accommodation, at least in some of the areas like energy, immigration, health care and education. In all four of those areas, there are large areas of common ground, and now we're no longer in a situation where one party may be seen as advantaged because it alone put across accomplishments. Rather, both parties have advantages in putting accomplishments across the goal line.

Q. Why should the Democrats give the president and his party anything to brag about?

A. Because they're in a position where (a) they can brag about it as well, and (b) they bear a much larger burden of responsibility, being in the majority, for not allowing good ideas to proceed forward. When you're in the minority, it's a much more comfortable political situation just to be blocking. In the majority, you have a responsibility to share in advancing an agenda. It seems to me, while we'd of course much rather have Republican majorities in both houses, this does create an opportunity for the White House.

Q. Does history bolster this theory of divided government?

DOJ_NMG_0120866

A. I think so. You can look back into some of the accomplishments in the Clinton administration like welfare reform or some fiscal restraint during the Clinton administration. During the first Bush administration, there were accomplishments in the international trade area. The president succeeded in getting negotiating authority and pursuing a trade agenda with some bipartisan support that I hope we can regenerate this time around, despite trade having become much more polarized and politicized.

Q. How do you view the current relations between the White House and Congress?

A. There have been good signs, from my perspective. I hope things break for the good. There's a lot of division on the Iraq war. No discredit to those who take a different view; there's a legitimate debate to be had there. Our hope is the debate can be held in a civil, principled way that's in the best interests of the country, not in a partisan way designed to divide the country. But it remains to be seen how all of that will play. We go into this season cautiously optimistic, and I would say it's too early to tell.

Q. What are the good signs?

A. Good signs have been some of the personal relationships. The new leaders have been here to the White House and I think have established a pretty good dialogue directly with the president. There's been reasonably good tone in that dialogue. But, like I said, a lot will be seen over the course of the next couple of months. I'm hopeful that we will end up putting the relationship on a good footing because the country is facing a lot of challenges right now and does not need partisan bickering getting in the way.

Q. Have the '06 election results caused you to change your tone or approach?

A. There's obviously a significant change involved in a change in party leadership. So the president needs to be aware that while the entire Congress should be a partner, on some issues those who are controlling the agenda will be political adversaries. We need to take that into account. To the White House, I think it means primarily that we need to work harder than ever at our congressional relations. On the one hand, it's harder to work with political adversaries than it is with political friends. On the other hand, especially when your own party is in the minority, you need to be extra careful not to neglect Republicans in the way we approach the Congress. They remain a very important and powerful element because the two houses are so closely divided.

Q. Do you think the president will sign an immigration bill this year?

A. I do.

Republicans In Retreat To Work On Resurgence (POL)

By Patrick O'Connor

The Politico, January 24, 2007

As House Republicans depart today for a caucus retreat on Maryland's Eastern Shore, GOP ranks are increasingly divided over the best strategy for taking on the new Democratic majority.

The dispute is the first major test for new House Minority Leader John A. Boehner of Ohio, who is under pressure from some colleagues who believe he is too docile in challenging Democrats and laying the political foundation for a GOP comeback in 2008.

Some Republicans are advocating a wait-in-the-weeds strategy -- projecting an air of civility and selective cooperation with Speaker Nancy Pelosi and fellow Democrats, while waiting for the right moment to pounce for partisan gains.

But many backbench Republicans, joined by some members of the leadership team, believe it makes more sense to pounce early and often.

Rep. Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., the former speaker, received a rousing ovation at a closed-door meeting in the Cannon Caucus Room last week when he urged colleagues to stand up and fight. Some members interpreted that as a veiled shot at Boehner.

But Boehner said the party can afford to be patient. "It's their honeymoon," he said of the Democrats. "We're not in a sprint here. We're in a marathon Chill out."

There is some irony in that stance. Early in his 16-year House career, the Ohioan was part of a team of self-styled Republican Revolutionaries who waged daily partisan attacks in a successful campaign to wrest control from the Democratic majority in 1994.

DOJ_NMG_0120867

Now, at age 57, his early strategy is more an echo of former representative Bob Michel, R-Ill., than former representative Newt Gingrich, R-Ga. Michel was the moderate minority leader in the 1980s and early 1990s; Gingrich displayed a more partisan style during his climb to the speakership, a model that many Republicans believe can work again.

Republicans on Capitol Hill, though, don't have much time before the race for the White House drowns them out. A collection of prominent Republican pollsters told GOP House leaders recently that they have only three to eight months to establish their identity before the presidential race clogs the news cycles.

So, a small bloc of Republicans led by Conference Chairman Adam Putnam of Florida, Chief Deputy Whip Eric Cantor of Virginia; and Patrick McHenry of North Carolina and Tom Price of Georgia have been researching parliamentary procedure to wage floor fights against Democratic initiatives as the GOP staffs scour legislation for political fodder.

The group also has reached out to some of Boehner's contemporaries from the early 1990s who used guerrilla tactics to help Republicans secure their last majority after 40 years in the wilderness -- partisan firebrands such as Gingrich and former representative Bob Walker of Pennsylvania.

At a recent whip meeting, Cantor distributed copies of a Washington Post article from 1986 asking "Is Bob Walker the Most Obnoxious Man In Congress?"

Walker said his guerrilla tactics were necessary in a House where even Republican leaders had grown accustomed to Democratic dominance. But now, he suggested, the current minority faces a much different environment, in part because of the reforms approved during the early years of their majority to give the minority party more input in the legislative process.

"The circumstances are much different," Walker said.

The problem for Republicans occurs when their own leaders become too compliant with Democratic leaders and chairmen, Walker said. "There is a tendency for the institution to discipline you."

Cantor and his colleagues were well aware that they must stand up and fight without turning voters off.

"It is a balance," he explained. "We don't want to be dilatory, but we don't want to let up for a minute."

The peril for Boehner comes if his GOP colleagues come to view him as upstart Republicans once viewed Michel. As minority leader, Michel bartered with majority Democrats, which angered some of the agitators in his own party, including Boehner.

The well-pressed son of a bar owner, Boehner was a key figure in the later phase of the Republican rise to power. He led the Gang of Seven in their drive to expose abuse in the House Bank after 1990 and helped craft the "Contract With America." He was also part of the small group that included Walker, Gingrich, and Texans Dick Armey and Tom DeLay, who met regularly in the basement dining room of a Capitol Hill restaurant to plot the GOP's resurgence.

Boehner is often cast as a Dean Martin figure, a jocular, plainspoken lawmaker whose public image is that of a dapper, tanned chain-smoker who plays golf, teases members and reporters and spends his evenings drinking with a small cadre of lobbyists and fellow lawmakers.

On the other hand, though, he heads to bed early in order to get up for his regular early-morning stroll. And he has a strong sentimental streak that has prompted him to well up regularly, most notably during DeLay's resignation speech, even though Boehner was a major rival during their shared time on the Hill.

With Hastert's decision to step aside, Boehner is now the top Republican in the House. And it appears he'll continue the inclusive traditions he began when his party was in the minority.

The question for Republicans, though, is whether this inclusive style will work in the minority when the party is so divided on Iraq.

President Bush is scheduled to address the retreat on Friday, and some Republicans expect the three-day conference to be a contentious discussion about the direction of the party.

Republicans carry a skilled, experienced group of senior staffers into the minority, but leadership offices have taken time to organize.

Boehner is aware of the delicate challenge before him, allies say, but so far he has taken a decidedly passive approach to the Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0120868

On the first day of the new Congress, Boehner followed a string of heated remarks by other Republicans to acknowledge the Democrats' honeymoon and be respectful of Pelosi's historic elevation as the first female speaker.

Later that day, he took an indirect shot at his own party while encouraging the two parties to be more cordial. "This is the people's Congress," Boehner told a packed chamber during his opening-day speech. "And most people don't care which party controls it; what they want is a government that is limited, honest, accountable and responsive to their needs. The moment a majority forgets this lesson, it begins writing itself a ticket to minority status."

He has since endorsed some of the opposition tactics of outspoken legislators.

Putnam showed members a video during their regular closed-door meeting of McHenry squaring off against Financial Services Chairman Barney Frank, D-Mass., on the House floor earlier this month.

The youngest member of Congress, McHenry enraged the irascible Frank by raising parliamentary questions to highlight an exemption in the minimum-wage bill for American Samoa. And Frank furiously banged his gavel from the speaker's chair as he shouted down McHenry in an exchange that quickly found its way to YouTube.

"That is one way you can be respectful and get your point across," Boehner told his assembled colleagues afterward.

House GOP Reflects (RC)

By Nicole Duran And David M. Drucker

Roll Call, January 24, 2007

As House Republicans convene their annual retreat today to talk message and strategy, a debate persists among GOP operatives over how to best return the party to power on Capitol Hill.

Some strategists say the party must woo independent voters and concentrate on issues important to them, such as economic matters, while others prefer the base-driven political tactics honed by Karl Rove and recently departed Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman in the past three elections.

Those Republicans espousing a more inclusive message say the results of the 2006 midterm elections repudiated the base-only strategy and signaled that if the GOP does not focus on rebuilding a governing coalition that elevates policy accomplishments above politics, they should get comfortable as the House and Senate's minority party.

Republicans "over-catered to their base and as they over-played that, they looked less attractive to Independent voters," former House Majority Leader Dick Armey (R-Texas) said Tuesday. "The independent voter is not interested in politics, he's interested in policy. So when speaking to him, you need to speak with a policy voice, not a politics voice."

The GOP retreat — which will run from tonight through Friday at the Hyatt Regency Chesapeake Bay in Cambridge, Md. — is set to feature a panel discussion led by three pollsters titled "Message: you lost the moderates and independents, not the conservatives." It is part of what is likely to be an ongoing internal debate over what cost Republicans their majority as the party looks toward 2008 and what it can do to reclaim many of the House seats it lost to Democrats on Nov. 7.

Former Speaker Newt Gingrich (R-Ga.), who has advocated turning away from a base-only strategy and is an architect of the GOP's 1994 takeover, is scheduled to address the assembled Members as a keynote speaker.

A look back at much of the data from November 2006 appears to bolster the arguments of those, like Gingrich, who believe Republicans paid attention to their base voters at the expense of independents and conservative Democrats.

In the Nov. 7 contests, Democratic turnout increased slightly from 2004 relative to the GOP turnout, giving them about a 2-point edge over Republicans, but party breakdown remained essentially static, according to the Pew Research Center.

Democrats were able to pick up 30 House seats and six Senate seats because independents overwhelmingly supported them last fall — 57 percent to 39 percent — after splitting evenly between President Bush and Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.) during the 2004 presidential election, the center found.

Additionally, contrary to popular belief, voter participation by independents actually increases during midterm elections, whereas participation by registered Democrats and registered Republicans historically dips, according to exit polling data.

"Independents decide all elections," Pew President Andrew Kohut said. "Given the fact that we've had partisan parity for a very long time, and I expect that we will continue to have it for a very long time, therefore, the winning party is the party that wins a plurality of independents."

Dave Gilliard, a Republican strategist based in Sacramento, Calif., who steered now-Rep. Brian Bilbray (R-Calif.) to victory in last year's hotly contested 50th district special election to replace disgraced ex-Rep. Duke Cunningham (R), said independent voters as a share of the electorate has been increasing since 2004 — a phenomenon that he said is still under way.

Gilliard described today's independent voters as all over the map ideologically, and united only by their distrust of the two major political parties. He said lower-turnout, midterm elections used to consist of far more partisan voters than independents, making it more politically and cost effective to employ a base-driven strategy.

But he said that tact is now outdated.

"Now that independent voters have become higher-propensity voters, things have changed," Gilliard said. "They are more important, especially in lower-turnout elections. That's just a fact."

Armey explained that paying more attention to independents does not mean Republicans should abandon their core principles — and he said they don't have to. He urged them to shed the image of "earmarking pork-barreler" that they engendered in the 109th Congress and focus on bold ideas, such as addressing retirement security.

In doing so, Republicans will be in a position to prove to voters that they are tackling the nation's important issues, while simultaneously satisfying party activists' political desire for reform of a key government program.

"We lost our sense of boldness," Armey said, discussing what went wrong for Republicans last year.

While no Republican operative is publicly telling Members to ignore independents, some say rushing to implement a new strategy aimed squarely at unaffiliated voters is not necessarily a recipe for success either.

Carl Forti, who recently departed the National Republican Congressional Committee after a long tenure as its chief spokesman and one of its top strategists, said the key to electoral success in House races remains tailoring individual campaigns to each district.

"Treat each district as unique," said Forti, who is now a top operative for the presidential campaign of former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney (R). "You can't think doing one thing on the national level, whether aimed at independents or Republicans, will do the same thing in Connecticut vs. Alabama."

Many Republican Members and party strategists believe they primarily lost last year because of the corruption and misconduct of a few Members, like Cunningham and former Rep. Mark Foley (R-Fla.) — and because of voter angst over the Iraq War.

Once Republicans get back "on message" and talk about cutting taxes, shrinking government and eliminating wasteful spending, the electorate will respond positively, they contend.

Mike Slanker, political director of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said Republicans can rebuild their governing majority, and win back independents and conservative Democrats, by returning to their core principles.

"I think we have to reassure them that we remember why we were here as Republicans," said Slanker, who guided Rep. Jon Porter (R-Nev.) to a close re-election victory last November. "We came here for smaller government, lower taxes and less regulation ... whether or not we have lost touch with that is not for me to say.

"I do not believe that our coalition is fractured," he added. "It was a bad year. People were cranky; they weren't happy and we were in power."

Forti said a look back at individual Congressional campaigns in 2006 proves that all races are, in fact, local.

"The people that ran aggressive campaigns, even those in bad districts, won," he said, ticking off the names of several Republicans from swing districts who had close calls.

Those who lost "didn't go out and define their opponents early," Forti said.

Hill Pensions For The Convicted May End (WP)

By Lyndsey Layton

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

With the rhetoric of reformers bent on sweeping corruption from the Capitol, the House voted unanimously yesterday to deny federal pensions to lawmakers convicted of bribery, perjury and other related felonies.

DOJ_NMG_0120870

"Corrupt politicians deserve prison sentences, not taxpayer-funded pensions," said freshman Rep. Nancy Boyda (D-Kan.), chief sponsor of the bill.

But the punishment of those who betray the public trust will not be far-reaching.

The measure is similar to one approved by the Senate last week and comes in the wake of major congressional scandals last year that led to the conviction of former Republican congressmen Randy "Duke" Cunningham (Calif.) and Robert W. Ney (Ohio). The House passed the bill 431 to 0, with four members not voting.

The bills passed by the House and the Senate are not retroactive, which means that Cunningham and Ney will collect substantial pensions for the rest of their lives, courtesy of taxpayers.

And a current House member under federal investigation for corruption, Democratic Rep. William J. Jefferson (La.), still might be entitled to a pension if he is indicted and convicted for past crimes. The Senate version would not take effect until January 2009, while the House-passed version would take effect immediately upon enactment.

What's more, both the House and Senate bills would allow the Office of Personnel Management, which calculates the pensions of members of Congress, to award the pensions of convicted lawmakers to their families, in cases of demonstrated financial need.

"They're trying to claim to fix the problem without backing it up with legislation," said Peter J. Sepp of the National Taxpayers Union. "It's a shame, really. This may not be the most ethical Congress ever after all."

The House bill would withhold pensions from lawmakers convicted of any one of five categories of felonies, including bribery and perjury, but would protect those who have already been convicted. Stacey F. Bernards, spokeswoman for House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.), said the House had no choice because criminalizing past behavior would have violated constitutional protections.

House leaders had also wanted to postpone the effective date of the measure to Jan. 2, 2009, to make it consistent with the language of the Senate-passed bill and reduce negotiations between the two chambers. They noted that, under the Constitution, a change in the compensation of members of Congress can only be carried out after the next general election.

But House Republicans objected to the 2009 date, saying that it was too distant, and privately told Democrats that they would not support it, a senior Democratic aide said. "We wanted this to have bipartisan support, so we changed it," the aide said.

For at least a decade, Congress has been kicking around bills to block pensions for convicted lawmakers. But the issue resonated following last year's influence-peddling scandal involving convicted lobbyist Jack Abramoff and the midterm elections, when the Democrats grabbed corruption as a campaign theme and used it to win control of Congress.

Currently, members of Congress can be denied pensions only if they commit treason or other espionage offenses.

The bill approved yesterday was a watered-down version of legislation proposed by Republican Rep. Mark Steven Kirk (Ill.), who wants pensions to be withheld from lawmakers convicted of a wider range of public integrity crimes. Kirk's plan lists 21 crimes, including wire fraud and tax evasion, compared with the five in the bill passed yesterday.

"The American people understand income-tax evasion -- you want to make sure a congressman who doesn't pay his taxes isn't rewarded with a taxpayer-funded pension," he said. "This falls far short."

But Kirk could not offer his bill yesterday -- the vote was taken under a suspension of the rules, which limited debate and blocked amendments. A parade of Republicans protested the way the bill was handled, objected to last-minute changes in language and said they were being locked out of meaningful participation.

The National Taxpayers Union estimates that at least 20 lawmakers convicted of felonies since 1980 are receiving federal pensions totaling about $1 million a year.

Ney, sentenced last week to 30 months in prison after pleading guilty to making false statements and to conspiracy to commit fraud in connection with the Abramoff influence-peddling scandal, can start collecting a full annual pension worth about $29,000 in 2016 or take a reduced annual pension of about $19,000 starting in 2010, according to the taxpayer group. Cunningham, who was convicted of accepting bribes from defense contractors, can receive as much as $64,000 annually if his military service is counted in computing his pension, the group said.

House Passes Bill Denying Pensions To Convicted Lawmakers (WSJ)

DOJ_NMG_0120871

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Lawmakers convicted of crimes such as bribery, fraud and perjury will be stripped of their congressional pensions under legislation the House passed yesterday.

The 431-0 House vote comes four days after former Rep. Bob Ney (R., Ohio) received a 30-month prison term for taking political favors from Jack Abramoff, whose influence-peddling tactics helped make corruption a major issue in the November elections. Mr. Ney, as past chairman of the House Administration, backed similar legislation last year.

The House bill, like its Senate counterpart, isn't retroactive and wouldn't affect the benefits of Mr. Ney, who is eligible for a pension of about $29,000 a year if he waits until 2016, when he turns 62.

Minor differences with the Senate bill, approved last week as part of larger ethics and lobbying overhaul, must be reconciled before the measure can be signed into law.

The House bill applies to conduct that occurs after the bill becomes law, while the Senate bill doesn't take effect until 2009.

Pelosi Cements Grip On Caucus (RC)

By Jennifer Yachnin

Roll Call, January 24, 2007

Just weeks into her tenure, Democratic Members and aides see Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) taking subtle steps to consolidate her power within the new House majority, provoking some grumbling, but largely avoiding any serious internal revolts as Democrats settle into their new roles.

Pelosi has made herself the Democratic Caucus' clear leader in formulating an agenda and message strategy, also while installing key staff at the party's campaign committee. At the same time, she is working to rein in the chamber's chairmen, an effort that aims to prevent the resurgence of largely autonomous chairmen that dominated the House chamber during the previous Democratic majority.

In the initial weeks of the 110th Congress, however, those efforts are drawing largely muted reactions from the party's 21 newly installed chairmen — many of whom held gavels in the party's last majority 12 years ago. That initial response may not prevent troubles ahead, but for now, many are chalking up any discord to their new roles.

"From my vantage point, the Democratic chairmen are happy to be in charge, and it takes some getting used too," said one Democratic chairman who asked not to be named, to allow him to speak more freely on sensitive issues. "I don't think there's real disagreement."

The chairman acknowledged a push for coordination between the Speaker and committee leaders, noting that he has met with Pelosi several times in recent weeks. "To some degree, the Speaker is the leader of the party and an effective Speaker would work with the chairmen," the Democrat said.

Despite the push for consolidation, however, one Democratic aide suggested that reaction is subdued because there is little concern that Democratic chairmen will become "irrelevant," as some Democrats viewed their Republican counterparts under the rule of then-Majority Leader Tom DeLay (R-Texas).

Nevertheless, Pelosi hasn't managed to avoid every dispute within her party.

In the most public spat in the first weeks of the 110th Congress, the Speaker drew the ire of Energy and Commerce Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) when she announced last week that she would seek a new select committee to examine the issue of global warming.

The Michigan lawmaker, loathe to forfeit any his committee's jurisdiction, publicly dismissed the panel. In a meeting of the Energy and Commerce panel's Democrats, Dingell later argued the Speaker's proposal would be better served as a task force or special committee within the Democratic Caucus.

But while the proposal drew criticism from others, including Rep. Henry Waxman (D-Calif.) — who said last week, "I can see the reason for this Speaker wanting to give this extra focus and attention," but stopped short of supporting the select committee — large numbers of Democrats are not expected to oppose the proposal when it reaches the House floor. Most Republicans are expected to object to the proposal.

DOJ_NMG_0120872

House Majority Leader Steny Hoyer (D-Md.), who said he spoke with Dingell Tuesday during a weekly chairmen's meeting, could not confirm when that measure will come to the House floor.

"I want to talk to more people on our side to see if we're going to have a problem on our side," Hoyer said, before later adding: "Jurisdictional issues are real issues ... but I think we'll work it out."

The new committee, which draws on the jurisdiction of eight committees, would not have legislative authority under the proposal unveiled by Pelosi last week.

Responding to criticisms of the proposed panel at a Tuesday press conference, which focused on last night's State of the Union address, Pelosi stated: "One percent of the people in the Caucus are opposed to it, and 99 percent want to be on the Select Committee."

One senior Democratic aide acknowledged that while Pelosi may be flexing her political muscle in this case — "She doesn't think he will move legislation as quickly as she wants," the aide said — it remains to be seen whether her action is unique, or intended as a warning for future challengers.

Another Democratic chairman, who spoke on the condition of anonymity, suggested that the spat largely remains between Dingell and the Speaker, rather than all the chairmen.

"I'm jealous of my jurisdiction, I'd be less than honest if I didn't say that," the chairman said. "But I believe if we are to govern effectively, there has to be better coordination, regardless of personal fiefdoms."

The Democratic chairman, who acknowledged that the Speaker had discussed the select committee with him at an earlier date, dismissed the idea that such a panel would take power away from any panels.

"It's not precedent setting," he asserted, adding that he "would not be surprised" to see additional select committees during the new Congress.

A Democratic aide, who asked not to be named, defended the Speaker's decision to call for the committee's creation, stating: "I think it's evident she's been leading by consensus."

Still, some Democratic chairmen questioned that commitment at the start of the Congress three weeks ago, when lawmakers discovered that Republican-authored term limits would be continued in the new session.

The rules, which limit lawmakers to six-year terms at the helm of a committee, were initially adopted by the Republican majority following the 1994 elections, as part of the "Contract with America."

When House lawmakers adopted rules governing the 110th Congress, the Democratic leadership authored a series of changes focused primarily on ethics and lobbying reforms, while maintaining the majority of the rules from the last session, including those term limits.

Although Democratic leaders stated that the House will revisit those rules, no definitive date has been set for that discussion.

The Speaker "has made it clear that she doesn't care for the term limits either," the Democratic aide said. "It's just a matter of when to approach changing that. We've got six years to look at it."

There also are indications that Pelosi intends to keep a strong hand in the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee this cycle, notably the installment of Brian Wolff — a close political confidant to Pelosi and deputy executive director in charge of finance in the last cycle — as the new executive director.

DCCC Chairman Chris Van Hollen (Md.), tapped by Pelosi to head the campaign committee, also has opted to bring on another top Pelosi aide, Jennifer Crider, to run the communications shop.

'08 Race Looms Over Agenda (RC)

By Erin P. Billings

Roll Call, January 24, 2007

Less than a month into their newly elected leadership roles, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) already are confronting a vocal and prominent cast of Congressional Democratic presidential hopefuls who quickly are capturing the national spotlight.

DOJ_NMG_0120873

And while many Congressional Democrats say publicly they have grown used to Members and Senators using Capitol Hill as a platform for White House runs, they privately acknowledge the early 2008 campaign could become a distraction, and the window will be narrow for Reid and Pelosi to drive the party agenda and set the tone in the early days of the 110th Congress.

"With the New Hampshire primary about a year away, we could be looking at only a few months before presidential interests completely over take party priorities," said a senior Senate Democratic aide.

Reid and Pelosi assumed their majority slots on Jan. 4 after a sweeping November election gave Democrats control of Congress. After a dozen years in the minority — interrupted only by a short period of Senate control — Democrats are relishing the chance to steer Congressional priorities over the next two years.

But in recent days, the field of Congressional Democratic presidential hopefuls has swelled with the entries of high-profile candidates, Sens. Barack Obama (Ill.) and Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.).

Obama and Clinton joined a string of Democratic hopefuls including Sens. Joseph Biden (Del.), Chris Dodd (Conn.) and possibly John Kerry (D-Mass.).

Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) said the early primary season has "got to be a distraction" for the Senate leadership and "at times can be an annoyance," but also said it can serve to help drive the debate and encourage discussions among political players.

The challenge for Reid and others, he said, is that presidential candidates can often redirect the tone and force leaders to respond to candidates' ideas.

"Now they have to consider what others are saying," Nelson said.

Even so, Democratic Senators said presidential politics is part of the Senate, and early primaries or not, the chamber always is a launching pad for White House candidates.

Sen. Mark Pryor (D-Ark.) acknowledged the presidential primary seems to come "earlier and earlier" each cycle, but added: "The Senate adjusts to that.

"It probably will affect the operation of the Senate from time to time on both sides of the aisle," he said.

Reid appears content to let the nomination process play out with little or no interference.

A former Democratic leadership aide explained that Reid's primary focus will be on maintaining the cohesion of his 51-seat majority rather than simply focusing on the presidential hopefuls.

"The truth is, it's much harder to control the 51 than the few '08ers," this source said.

The source added, "The principal doesn't have to worry about what the kids do on the street, he just has to make sure there is order in the school."

Reid clearly has a heavier logistical burden than Pelosi, who heads the chamber where interest in the White House is slim.

So far, only Democratic Rep. Dennis Kucinich (Ohio) has hinted at launching another candidacy. Besides, with 435 Members serving in the House, the absence of a Member who is on the campaign trail is less of a problem.

But both leaders will have to work through the challenges of trying to move key pieces of legislation over the next two years, finding unity among Democrats and maintaining their roles as the party's top voices.

What's more, both Reid and Pelosi will undoubtedly be put in the sometimes-uncomfortable position of having to respond to Democratic presidential candidates' platforms and positions.

Jim Manley, Reid's spokesman, said his boss recognizes "there are always presidential candidates in the Senate. There were in the past and there will be in the future. The fact is, under the rules of the Senate — presidential candidate or not — [Senators] can have a pretty significant influence on how the Senate operates."

And Democratic leaders in both chambers said that neither Reid nor Pelosi is concerned that the candidates will steal their spotlight.

"As the first woman Speaker, there's no question that she's going to continue to receive a great deal of attention," said Pelosi's spokesman Brendan Daly. "We've had a very good first three weeks in office and that's going to continue as we move forward.

"There are plenty of people who continue to serve as the face of the Democratic Party," Manley added. "There's plenty of limelighting to go around."

DOJ_NMG_0120874

Biden said 2008 isn't all that different from previous presidential cycles, which typically draw a pool of prominent Democratic Senators to the field.

"We've been down there before," Biden said. "I think we agree on 85 percent of the issues. The idea that it's a distraction from the Senate" isn't reality.

Biden has used the early days of the 110th Congress to stake out a prominent role on Bush's call to increase troops in Iraq by 21,500. He is leading a bipartisan group of Senators introducing a resolution in opposition to the move, and in doing so, highlighting his foreign policy-oriented platform.

But Biden isn't the only Senator eyeing the White House who is using the Iraq War as a key aspect of a White House run. Dodd, Clinton and Obama all have come out with individual proposals on how best to deal with the war and the proposal for a troop surge.

The positions on Iraq by Clinton and Obama in particular have led to rumblings that the two candidates are embroiled in a bitter rivalry for frontrunner status.

Most Democrats dispute suggestions that the two are personal adversaries, but they acknowledge that the under-the-Dome campaign is sending a signal that their campaigns could present a headache for leadership down the road.

"The danger and difficulty for Democratic leaders is that the press makes it seem like what Democrats are and think is what those two are saying or not saying," said a senior Democratic House aide. "What we actually do gets lost in the shuffle."

Democratic leadership sources say that while much of the attention of late is on the presidential candidates, they expect the spotlight will dim following the president's State of the Union address and after Congress votes on various resolutions opposing his Iraq plan.

That gives Democrats a chance to push through additional legislative items before next January, the official kickoff of the 2008 presidential primary.

"It will die down," said a senior Democratic aide.

FEDERAL DIARY: GAO Questions Administration's Decision To Decline Drug Subsidy (WP)

By Stephen Barr

Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Federal employee groups favored the subsidy. The U.S. Postal Service wanted the subsidy. But the Bush administration said no.

The pull-and-tug is over a 2003 law that allows employers to receive subsidies for prescription drug coverage on the condition that they provide a benefit for their Medicare-eligible retirees that is at least as good as the Medicare drug plan. The government, of course, is an employer, operating a medical-insurance program, but Bush officials decided it made little sense for the government, in effect, to pay a subsidy to itself.

That decision has been questioned in a report from the Government Accountability Office, the congressional auditing agency. GAO analysts think that allowing Uncle Sam to move money from one pocket to another would probably lower premiums in the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program, which provides medical coverage to about 8 million people.

Taking the subsidy from the Medicare program would have lowered the average 2006 premium in the federal health benefits program by 2.6 percentage points, the GAO calculated. Those premiums rose by 6.4 percent last year, meaning the increase would have been nearly 4 percent with the subsidy.

The GAO said that insurance companies in the federal program differed over how much the Medicare subsidy would have mitigated premium increases. Officials from two large federal health insurance plans with higher-than-average numbers of retirees told the GAO the subsidy would have helped lower premiums, with officials at one company claiming the subsidy would have led to a reduction of up to 4 percentage points for their plan.

The Office of Personnel Management, which runs the federal employee health program, has ruled out applying for the Medicare subsidy. OPM officials say the law was written to encourage employers to continue offering prescription drug coverage to their retirees, which the employees health benefits program does. The OPM says it has no intention of dropping retiree drug coverage.

The National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association has criticized the OPM for refusing to seek the Medicare subsidy, contending that the OPM is missing out on $1 billion annually. The retired employees group helped lead the effort on Capitol Hill to make the federal government eligible for the subsidy along with other employers, including state and local governments.

Margaret L. Baptiste, president of retired employees group, said yesterday that the White House budget office and the OPM "should explain to federal workers, retirees and survivor annuitants, who often struggle to pay their steadily increasing premiums, why the federal government failed to do what a multitude of other employers have done to reduce this burden."

One agency, the U.S. Postal Service, petitioned Medicare in 2005 to provide the subsidy but was rejected on the grounds that postal workers are covered by the health benefits program. Postal officials sought the subsidy because it would save the agency about $250 million annually. Agency officials said the subsidy would have helped rein in operating expenses, which are financed through postage rates.

Sen. Daniel K. Akaka (D-Hawaii), new chairman for the Senate's federal workforce subcommittee, said he plans to hold a hearing on the GAO report in the spring.

"I will take a closer look at how OPM decisions affect health care premiums," Akaka said in a statement. "Although OPM did a good job in keeping premium increases down in 2006, the GAO report clearly shows that if OPM had applied for and used the subsidy, premium growth would be reduced by 2.6 percent."

As Akaka noted, the GAO report shows that the OPM has been slowing the growth in the average federal health insurance premium since 2002, when premiums jumped by 12.9 percent. Federal Employees Health Benefit premiums, on average, are going up only 1.8 percent this year.

The rise in average premiums has slowed, the GAO said, because the costs of medical services and prescription drugs have risen at a slower pace in recent years. The GAO pointed out that the OPM has used the program's financial reserves to curb premium growth last year and this year, by 2 percent and 5 percent respectively.

The GAO also noted that the Federal Employees Health Benefits Program has done a better job of controlling premiums than many private-sector employers and the California Public Employees' Retirement System, known as Calpers and second in size to the federal program.

Over the past five years, the GAO said, the average annual growth in the federal health benefits premiums was 7.3 percent, compared with 14.2 percent for Calpers and 10.5 percent for companies surveyed by the GAO.

State Of The Union: Another Take (NYT)

A Few Words in Defense of Our Country

By Randy Newman

I'd like to say a few words
In defense of our country
Whose people aren't bad nor are they mean
Now the leaders we have
While they're the worst that we've had
Are hardly the worst this poor world has seen
Let's turn history's pages, shall we?
Take the Caesars for example
Why within the first few of them

DOJ_NMG_0120876

They had split Gaul into three parts
Fed the Christians to the lions
And burned down the City
And one of 'em
Appointed his own horse Consul of the Empire
That's like vice president or something
That's not a very good example, is it?
But wait, here's one, the Spanish Inquisition
They put people in a terrible position
I don't even like to think about it
Well, sometimes I like to think about it
Just a few words in defense of our country
Whose time at the top
Could be coming to an end
Now we don't want their love
And respect at this point is pretty much out of the question
But in times like these
We sure could use a friend
Hitler. Stalin.
Men who need no introduction
King Leopold of Belgium. That's right.
Everyone thinks he's so great
Well he owned The Congo
He tore it up too
He took the diamonds, he took the gold
He took the silver
Know what he left them with?
Malaria
A president once said,
"The only thing we have to fear is fear itself"
Now it seems like we're supposed to be afraid
It's patriotic in fact and color coded
And what are we supposed to be afraid of?
Why, of being afraid
That's what terror means, doesn't it?
That's what it used to mean
The end of an empire is messy at best
And this empire is ending
Like all the rest
Like the Spanish Armada adrift on the sea
We're adrift in the land of the brave
And the home of the free
Goodbye. Goodbye. Goodbye.

Spending Sincerity Test (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120877

Members of Congress applauded President Bush's lines about spending restraint last night, but we are about to get a test of their sincerity when the Senate votes today on the line-item veto.

The official description of New Hampshire Senator Judd Gregg's legislation is "rescission" authority, and it is notably less powerful than the genuine "veto" power Congress granted Bill Clinton in 1996 before it was struck down by the Supreme Court. But the impulse behind it is the same: Give Mr. Bush and his successors the power to single out and send back to Congress the thousands of wasteful "earmark" projects that bloat today's spending bills. Congress would then be required to vote, up or down and within 10 days, on the spending cuts.

It's no accident that Mr. Gregg's bill is nearly identical to a rescission amendment offered by former Democratic Senator (and one-time Majority Leader) Tom Daschle in 1995. In fact, Mr. Daschle's version gave the President more power, allowing him to submit as many as 13 rescissions a year, compared with only four in the Gregg proposal. No fewer than 37 Democrats voted for the Daschle amendment in 1995, and 20 of them are still in the Senate.

Yet how times, and partisanship, have changed. West Virginia's Robert Byrd took to the Senate floor this week to denounce Mr. Gregg's amendment as "garbage" -- his eloquence is legendary -- and to complain that it gave too much power to the President. That's an old Byrd song when Republicans are in the White House. But back in 1995, with Mr. Clinton in office, the earl of earmarks noted that the Daschle proposal "does not result in any shift of power from the legislative branch to the executive. It is clear cut. It gives the President the opportunity to get a vote . . . So I am 100 percent behind the substitute by Mr. Daschle."

California's Dianne Feinstein also hailed rescission authority in 1995 as a "deterrence" to "the pork barrel." Wisconsin's Russ Feingold extolled it as "a useful tool." Washington's Patty Murray said the President should have the power to veto "pork items" that "contribute to our deficit." North Dakota's Byron Dorgan in 1996 said it would be "helpful in imposing budget discipline." Senators Chris Dodd, Carl Levin and Joe Biden also had nice things to say.

If this crowd meant what they said, Mr. Gregg will easily get the 60 votes he needs to overcome a filibuster. Yet so far not a single Democrat has publicly supported the measure, and Republicans had to threaten to hold up the ethics reform bill last week even to get an item-veto vote on the Senate floor. This is all the more remarkable given that the Senate Democratic caucus is teeming with wannabe Presidents who would love the power that Bill Clinton once had if they ever make it to the White House. Perhaps they lack confidence in their candidacies.

Or perhaps they simply don't want to hand Mr. Bush anything he could call a victory. Democrats ran hard against GOP overspending last year, so voters will be watching what they do in the run-up to 2008. A vote against the line-item veto is a vote for earmarks and spending as usual.

As The Democrats Dither (WP)

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

AN EARLY TEST of the courage and leadership of the new Democratic-controlled Congress will come on the question of extending full voting rights in the House of Representatives to the District of Columbia. Legislation to do just that fizzled in the final days of the past Congress as Republican leaders, seized by apathy and deaf to logic, left town without calling a vote. Now it is for Democrats to explain why citizens of the capital of the free world are disenfranchised in the halls of Congress.

They have scheduled a vote today on a half-measure that grants a partial voice to the District's delegate, as well as to delegates from U.S. territories. The resolution would allow the delegates to vote on some important House business, including amendments to legislation, but would withhold the right to vote on a bill's final passage. If adopted, it would restore the status quo in effect before the Republicans altered it 12 years ago but leave the District consigned to inferior status. It is, in other words, better than nothing, but it is decidedly not good enough. And it muddies the waters by lumping the District, whose residents pay federal income taxes, together with Guam, American Samoa and the Northern Mariana Islands, whose (vastly fewer) residents do not.

The best and most comprehensive solution in sight is the one the Republicans spurned so heedlessly in the past Congress. Embodied in a bipartisan measure co-sponsored by Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and D.C. Del. Eleanor Holmes Norton (D), it would add two full-voting seats to Congress -- one for the mostly Democratic District and one for mostly Republican Utah, which just missed getting an extra seat after the last census. That's about as nonpartisan as you could wish for (although only Utah would gain an electoral vote).

Mr. Davis believes that several dozen Republicans would support his approach should it ever see the light of day in a floor vote. And Democrats, who have every reason to grant the District a fully empowered representative in the House, should also be on board. So why is the Democratic leadership dithering?

Return Of The Drug Company Payoffs (NYT)

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

Two excessively lenient court decisions have allowed the manufacturers of brand-name drugs to resume the underhanded practice of paying generic competitors to keep their drugs off the market. It is a costly legal loophole that needs to be plugged by Congressional legislation.

The problem arises when a generic manufacturer tries to take its drug to market before the patent on a brand-name drug has expired by arguing that its product does not infringe upon the patent or that the patent is invalid. Huge sums of money are at stake, especially with blockbuster drugs whose annual sales can exceed a billion dollars.

Rather than risk it all, a brand-name manufacturer may choose to pay its generic competitor substantial compensation to drop its challenge and delay marketing its drug. Both companies make out handsomely. The big losers are consumers and the public and private insurers that must continue to pay monopoly prices for the brand-name drugs.

The Federal Trade Commission, which has been waging a valiant fight, succeeded for several years in eliminating such settlements. But two appeals court decisions in 2005 held that they are a legitimate way to resolve patent disputes. And sure enough, the F.T.C. reported last week that — after a five-year hiatus — brand-name companies made 3 such do-not-compete settlements in fiscal year 2005 and 14 more last year.

The pharmaceutical industry contends that the settlements are a reasonable way to resolve disputes and that they often result in bringing generic drugs to market before a patent has expired, albeit not as soon as the generic company wanted. The industry argues that regulators and the courts should judge such settlements on a case-by-case basis.

Our own hunch is that the better approach for Congress to take as it moves toward corrective legislation would be a “bright line” prohibition against making any payments to delay introduction of a generic drug. That would set a clear standard and enhance the likelihood that consumers would get a chance to benefit from real competition in the pharmaceutical market.

Court Rules Against Foster Parents (WP)

By Tamara Jones

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

The Tennessee Supreme Court ruled yesterday that a 7-year-old girl raised by an American couple since infancy must be returned to her Chinese parents, who say they never intended to give her up for adoption.

Shaoqiang He, a 42-year-old restaurant manager in Memphis, said he will probably return to China with his family after a transition period for Anna Mae He. She turns 8 on Sunday and has spent all but the first three weeks of her life with foster parents Jerry and Louise Baker.

"We have a big bedroom for her in our apartment, and we're going to buy clothing and furniture for her," He said in the telephone interview. "She knows by her face that she is Chinese, and she must be asking the Bakers, 'Where is my mom? Where is my dad?' "

Neither the Bakers nor their attorneys could be reached for comment. The Bakers have the option of appealing on the federal-court level. Tuesday's ruling set no timetable or conditions for Anna's return, leaving that for a lower court to iron out.

He and his wife, Qin Luo, 37, met the Bakers through the church both families attended. Financial and legal hardships prompted the Hes to place their newborn in the Bakers' care, He said, adding that another church member who ran an adoption agency had vouched for the couple and described them as experienced, loving foster parents. The Hes visited Anna, her father said, but relations turned ugly when they asked for her return at the age of 2.

"We did not give up custody," He said.

The Bakers won a court order barring the Hes from any contact with Anna, but He said his wife used to hide inside a neighborhood gas station to catch glimpses of Anna being taken for a walk or out for a ride. The Hes also have a 4-year-old daughter and 6-year-old son.

The custody dispute has wended through the U.S. court system for most of Anna's life, stirring public debate over the emotional, cultural and financial issues involved.

A Memphis judge stripped the Hes of their parental rights in February 2004, citing "parental misconduct" and abandonment, suggesting that the Hes had pursued the custody case merely to delay their own deportation. Shaoqiang He said his family's immigration status remains in legal limbo.

During the acrimonious battle, Qin Luo He had picketed outside the Bakers' home, shouting that she wanted her daughter back. The lower court concluded that her behavior amounted to "emotional instability" that would be "detrimental" to Anna.

But the state's high court found no evidence that the Hes willfully abandoned Anna. The justices concluded that the couple misunderstood the possible implications of transferring custody and guardianship to the Bakers, believing it merely enabled the Bakers to get Anna health insurance.

Emotional upheaval to Anna was dismissed as grounds for the Bakers to keep her. Being taken away from the only family she has really known "does not constitute the substantial harm required to prevent the parents from regaining custody," the Supreme Court ruling said.

6-year Custody Fight Ends In Tenn. Court (USAT)

By Robert Davis

USA Today, January 24, 2007

After six years of highly publicized court cases, a Chinese immigrant couple may soon be reunited with the daughter they have fought to get back.

The Tennessee Supreme Court ruled Tuesday that 7-year-old Anna Mae He, who has lived with a Memphis family since infancy, must be returned to birth parents Shaoqiang and Qin Luo He, who go by American names Jack and Casey.

The court ruled that lower courts had wrongly stripped the Hes of their parental rights.

The court ordered the Juvenile Court of Shelby County to reunite the child with her parents, who have been aided by pro bono lawyers. Psychologists will help her make the transition, lawyers say.

The custody fight, which made headlines around the world, pitted the Hes against Jerry and Louise Baker of Cordova, Tenn. The Bakers took Anna Mae in soon after she was born at the Hes' request as they struggled with legal, financial and health problems.

The Hes have insisted they never intended to permanently relinquish custody. But the Bakers have long wanted to legally adopt Anna Mae and originally accused the Hes of abandoning the child. They have maintained that she would have a better life with them.

"We never gave up hope," Jack He says. "This has been six years of nightmare." He hopes to be able to see his daughter again as early as her eighth birthday on Sunday.

The Hes had visited Anna Mae for a time, but things came to a head on her second birthday, on Jan. 28, 2001, when Casey refused to leave without her daughter. The Bakers called the police and five months later petitioned a court to revoke the Hes' parental rights.

DOJ_NMG_0120880

In its ruling Tuesday, the court said that "the evidence overwhelmingly shows that the parents' voluntary relinquishment of custody was entered as a temporary measure to provide health insurance."

Jerry Baker said he does not know what will happen next from a legal standpoint, but he hopes to have a child psychologist help determine the best way to "broach all of this" with the girl, who was in school when news of the ruling swept across Memphis.

Supporters from China and across the nation watched news reports and used the Internet to offer support for the Hes. One of the Hes' attorneys, Richard Gordon, says the lesson is: "This is America. Persistence pays off. Don't give up."

Jack He says that he looks forward to the day when his oldest daughter wakes up at home surrounded by the family she has never known: her parents, her brother, Andy, 6, and her sister, Avita, 4.

"She knows that she is Chinese," he says. "We want for her to wake up each morning and see all of the same faces surrounding her."

Baker pledged to put the girl and his daughter Aimee, who considers Anna Mae her sister, first with help from God. "Our God today is the same God that we thanked for all of the past decisions," he said. "He knows best. He will protect us all."

Candidate Who Thinks She Won Gets Gallery Seat (MH)

By Lesley Clark

The Miami Herald, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON - Christine Jennings wasn't able to line up and shake President Bush's hand when he walked down the House aisle Tuesday night to deliver his State of the Union address, but she did get a chance to make her point.

Clad in a cherry red pantsuit, the banker from Sarasota County who is contesting her narrow loss to succeed Rep. Katherine Harris, sat in the House gallery to the president's right -- a symbol of the fact Democrats are not relinquishing dibs on the seat -- despite the presence of Rep. Vern Buchanan, R-Sarasota, who, as a member of Congress, got a seat on the floor.

"I hope it's a reminder that we need election reform and standards for the country," Jennings said of her presence in gallery 5, row B, seat 17. ``The message has never changed, we've got to know that we have fair and accurate elections."

Buchanan, who was sworn into office by the Democratic-controlled Congress on Jan. 4 -- but not without notice that his election was being contested -- pointedly called Jennings his "favorite constituent" and said he aimed a wave in her direction.

He said he was awed to see his first State of the Union address from the House floor -- noting he's attended before, ``but just in the gallery.

"To be a blue-collar kid from Detroit, you'd never think it's possible," Buchanan said. ``But it is in America."

Before the speech, Jennings said, perhaps only partly in jest, that she hoped Bush would use the annual address to take up the mantle for election reform. The president, she noted, won the White House in 2000 with a 527-vote margin -- but only after a contested election in Florida that raised similar questions about voter intent.

"I'm hopeful that the president will include in his message that he'll champion election reform," Jennings said, a broad smile on her face. ``I think it's very appropriate. He's obviously familiar with the voting problems in Florida."

Bush, not surprisingly, did not issue a call for election reform, though one of the prime players of the 2000 Florida recount made a guest appearance: Harris, a Sarasota Republican, appeared on the House floor, hugging former colleagues and chatting with several members.

Jennings was the guest of Rep. Ellen Tauscher, D-Calif., who gave the Florida Democrat her sole audience ticket to the event to "highlight the gross injustice of election problems" in the Florida congressional district.

Many Florida members of Congress gave their tickets to family or friends. Buchanan invited his wife. Democratic Rep. Tim Mahoney of Palm Beach Gardens invited Army Spc. Joshua Shirley of LaBelle, who was stationed in Iraq last month when his brother, Sgt. Luke Shirley, was seriously injured by a land mine.

A Coast Guardsman from Broward County who has patrolled the Persian Gulf near Iraq may have received the best invitation, however. Petty Officer 2nd Class Nathan Thomas of Hollywood was the invited guest of first lady Laura Bush, and he was seated in her box Tuesday night for the speech.

DOJ_NMG_0120881

Thomas joined the Coast Guard in August 2001, according to the White House, and has been twice deployed to the region -- for a total of seven consecutive months in 2006.

He was part of the U.S. Coast Guard Patrol Forces in Southwest Asia, Bahrain and Kuwait, where his job was to work as a boarding officer, on assignment to protect two major Iraqi offshore oil terminals from potential terrorist attacks.

As part of his work there, the White House said, Thomas designed a training video and lesson plan on law enforcement tactics on boarding missions.

He used those resources to train more than 500 foreign military servicemen, including marines and navy personnel from Iraq and Kuwait, the White House said.

In addition, "he trained 80 U.S. Coast Guard and 60 U.S. Navy members deployed to the Persian Gulf in high-risk, noncompliant boarding procedures, thereby improving the capabilities and readiness of coalition forces," the White House said.

Jennings lost the election by fewer than 400 votes, but is challenging the results because the voting machines failed to register votes in the congressional race for more than 18,000 voters in Sarasota County.

Some observers chalked it up to particularly nasty primary and general election campaigns, others to a bad ballot design. But Jennings contends the machines malfunctioned and cost her the election. She's suing to examine the computer source code used in the county's voting machines.

A state circuit judge last month refused to give Jennings access to the software; she's appealing the decision.

But Congress has the last say in who sits in the chamber and Democrats have signaled intense interest in the outcome of the contest. The chair of the House Administration Committee, which would investigate the matter, sent a letter to the Florida appeals court, urging it to give Jennings full access to the computer code. The court has rejected the letter.

Jennings, though, remains a favorite on Capitol Hill. She attended a breakfast Tuesday for new Democratic members of Congress and spent some of the day working the phones at the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, which helped her set up a fundraising account for the election challenge.

She said she was warmly greeted at the breakfast and encouraged to keep waging the battle. One member, she noted, has received more than 100 letters from constituents alarmed about the lack of paper ballots for voting machines.

"It's no small matter," she said. ``People are concerned about the situation."

No Money, No Problem (RC)

By Kate Ackley

Roll Call, January 24, 2007

Any penny-pinching lobbyists looking to save a few thousand dollars in the sure-to-break-records 2008 presidential race have the perfect candidate to throw their theoretical support behind: Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

Not only has Obama's presidential exploratory committee said it will refuse all donations from political action committees, but it also is barring cash from registered federal lobbyists. Word has just started to spread among K Street's Democrats that when it comes to the candidate's coffers, they're off the hook.

"Thank, God," quipped one prominent Democratic lobbyist who does not publicly support any candidate. "Now I'm for him."

Another well-known K Street Democrat, one who publicly supports another candidate in the party's primary field, echoed those sentiments, saying lobbyists are high-fiving the move.

"Most people are happy about it," this lobbyist said. "Some people are going to get hit up by multiple candidates, but not by Barack."

This lobbyist said Obama can likely succeed in raising the $50 million he'll need to be competitive in early primaries through online donations and grass-roots support from beyond the Beltway, other Democratic contenders such as Sens. Chris Dodd (Conn.) and Joseph Biden (Del.) would find that banning lobbyists' contributions "could potentially affect their ability to remain competitive" since both have large donor networks in the advocacy world.

The party's frontrunner, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) will cash lobbyists' campaign donations, too. But former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.) won't. An aide with the Edwards campaign confirmed that Edwards wants nothing to do with the money of PACs or federally-registered lobbyists.

Among the qualifications for acceptable donations listed on Obama's Web site are that the funds are not from a PAC. A donor also must certify that, "This contribution is not made from the funds of an individual registered as a federal lobbyist or a foreign agent, or an entity that is a federally registered lobbying firm or foreign agent."

Dan Pfeiffer, a spokesman for Obama's exploratory committee, said the prohibition is not limited to Web donations. "The same criteria applies to all donations," he said, including old fashioned handwritten checks. Pfeiffer said he was not certain whether Obama's campaign also would turn away funds that lobbyists helped raise from their family members, friends and non-lobbyist clients and colleagues or whether it applies to lobbyists who are registered at the state or local level.

While most lobbyists privately cheered Obama's move as a money-saver for their own bank accounts, one lobbyist who supports Obama's candidacy said he was disappointed not to be able to put his money behind the presidential contender. "He just saved me $2,000, but I wish I could write the check," the lobbyist said.

Obama, who has been a leading proponent of tightening lobbying ethics laws, has not always shied away from lobbyist and PAC money. In the 2005-2006 cycle, according to the Federal Election Commission, Obama reported collecting about $100,000 from PACs alone, including those connected with BellSouth, Coca-Cola, Johnson & Johnson and the National Association of Realtors.

"If you're a lobbyist you just have to accept that elected officials, especially in the Democratic party, have decided we're a target and they're going to score political points on us," said one Democratic lobbyist.

New Congress, New Clients. Longtime lobbyist Alan Roth, a partner with Lent Scrivner & Roth and, more importantly, a one-time aide to Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman John Dingell (D-Mich.) has been tapped by pharmaceutical company Amgen, which has been locked in a long-running legislative feud with rival firm Roche.

Roth, who served as Democratic staff director and chief counsel on the tony committee in the 1990s, also added AT&T and Qualcomm to his firm's client roster and is close to inking a deal with the United States Telecom Association.

"After 10 years as a Democratic lobbyist, it's nice to get your phone calls returned," said Roth, who added that the firm is looking to pick up another Democrat. The firm's Louis Finkel left late last year for a corporate lobbying job with oil giant Exxon Mobil Corp., but Finkel has returned to Capitol Hill to work for the Science Committee.

As for the Amgen-Roche fight, the two companies have been warring over patent laws that could allow a Roche product that treats anemia into the U.S. market to compete with one of Amgen's most profitable therapies, Epogen.

K Street Moves. Sonnenschein Nath & Rosenthal has added John Russell IV and Gilberto Ocañas to its national public law and policy strategies group. Russell, who spent a decade on Capitol Hill including a stint as deputy to the chief of staff for former Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Ill.), is signing on as managing director. Ocañas, who in 2000 led the National Latino Presidential Campaign for the Democratic National Committee, will be a senior adviser. "John and Gilberto both will be tremendous assets to Sonnenschein's public policy practice," said Mike McNamara, chair of Sonnenschein's lobbying group.

• Janene Jackson, formerly a staff member for the D.C. City Council, is joining the D.C. Chamber of Commerce as senior vice president of external affairs, a position that amounts to the group's top lobbyist.

Watergate Figure E. Howard Hunt Dies (AP)

By Tim Reynolds

AP, January 24, 2007

E. Howard Hunt, who helped organize the Watergate break-in, leading to the greatest scandal in American political history and the downfall of Richard Nixon's presidency, died Tuesday. He was 88.

Hunt died at a Miami hospital after a lengthy bout with pneumonia, according to his son Austin Hunt.

The elder Hunt was many things: World War II soldier, CIA officer, organizer of both a Guatemalan coup and the botched Bay of Pigs invasion, and author of more than 80 books, many from the spy-tale genre.

Yet the bulk of his notoriety came from the one thing he always insisted he wasn't — a Watergate burglar. He often said he preferred the term "Watergate conspirator."

DOJ_NMG_0120883

"I will always be called a Watergate burglar, even though I was never in the damn place," Hunt told The Miami Herald in 1997. "But it happened. Now I have to make the best of it."

While working for the CIA, Hunt recruited four of the five actual burglars — Bernard Barker, Virgilio Gonzalez, Rolando Eugenio Martinez and Frank Sturgis, all who had worked for Hunt a decade earlier in the Bay of Pigs invasion.

All four also had ties to Miami, where part of the Watergate plan was hatched. He said the burglary's aim was to see whether Fidel Castro's Cuban regime had given money to the campaign of Nixon's Democratic opponent, George McGovern.

"According to street gossip both in Washington and Miami, Mr. Castro had been making substantial contributions to the McGovern campaign," Hunt told CNN in February 1992. "And the idea was ... that somewhere in the books of the Democratic National Committee those illicit funds would be found."

The idea was wrong, and the fallout escalated into huge political scandal.

Nixon resigned on Aug. 9, 1974. Twenty-five men were sent to prison for their involvement in the botched plan, and a new era of skepticism toward government began.

"I had always assumed, working for the CIA for so many years, that anything the White House wanted done was the law of the land," Hunt told People magazine for its May 20, 1974, issue. "I viewed this like any other mission. It just happened to take place inside this country."

The Hunt recruits and James W. McCord Jr., security director for the Committee for the Re-election of the President, were arrested June 17, 1972, at the Watergate office building. One of the burglars was found to have Hunt's White House phone number.

Hunt and fellow operative G. Gordon Liddy, along with the five arrested at Watergate, were indicted on federal charges three months later. Hunt and his recruits pleaded guilty in January 1973, and McCord and Liddy were found guilty.

In March 1973, McCord wrote a letter to the federal judge in his case, John J. Sirica, claiming perjury occurred and that there was political pressure applied to the defendants to plead guilty and remain silent.

In a secretly recorded conversation that same month that became one of the key pieces of evidence of the White House cover-up, White House Counsel John Dean told Nixon that "we're being blackmailed ... Hunt now is demanding another $72,000 for his own personal expenses; another $50,000 to pay his attorneys' fees."

After some further discussion, Nixon said: "If you need the money, I mean you could get the money. ... I mean it's not easy, but it could be done."

Hunt eventually spent 33 months in prison on a conspiracy charge, and said he was bitter that he was sent to jail while Nixon was allowed to resign.

"I felt that in true politician's fashion, he'd assumed a degree of responsibility but not the blame," he told The Associated Press in 1992. "It wasn't my idea to go into the Watergate."

Hunt also was involved in organizing an event that foreshadowed Watergate: the burglary of the the office of the Beverly Hills psychiatrist treating Daniel Ellsberg, the defense analyst who leaked the Pentagon Papers, published in 1971.

Hunt and Liddy — the so-called White House "plumbers" — broke into Ellsberg's office to gain information about him. The break-in was revealed during the 1973 espionage trial against Ellsberg and co-defendant Anthony Russo, and was one of several incidents that led to dismissal of the case because of government misconduct.

Watergate was one of many wild tales — some true, some not — that followed Hunt through the final decades of his colorful life.

His alleged involvement in the purported conspiracy to kill President John F. Kennedy was among the most popular spy-esque stories Hunt was linked with. One theory, which still exists in the minds of some, was that Hunt was in Dallas on the day Kennedy was shot, that his image was captured in photographs from the scene.

"I was in Washington, D.C., on Nov. 22, 1963," Hunt wrote in a December 1975 letter to Time magazine, a note penned while he was incarcerated at Eglin Air Force Base's prison camp. "It is a physical law that an object can occupy only one space at one time."

Everette Howard Hunt was born Oct. 9, 1918, in Hamburg, N.Y., graduated from Brown University in 1940 and was commissioned as a Naval Reserve officer in Annapolis, Md. the following year. He served as a destroyer gunnery officer, was injured at sea and honorably discharged from the Navy.

From 1949 through 1970 he worked for the CIA, and was involved in the operation that overthrew Jacobo Arbenz as Guatemala's president in 1954, plus the failed Bay of Pigs invasion in 1961.

Hunt declared bankruptcy in 1997, largely blaming his Watergate fines and legal fees. A court overturned a $650,000 libel settlement he was awarded in 1981 stemming from an article alleging his involvement in the assassination of Kennedy, and he never received any of that money.

"I think I've paid my debt to society," Hunt said in 1997. "I think I've paid it amply."

Hunt spent his final years in a modest home in Miami's Biscayne Park neighborhood with his second wife, Laura Martin Hunt, and declined many interview requests from The Associated Press.

He has a memoir coming out next month titled "American Spy: My Secret History in the CIA, Watergate and Beyond."

Hunt's first wife, the former Dorothy Wetzel Day Goutiere, died in a plane crash in 1972. Besides his wife, Hunt was survived by six children.

A memorial service was scheduled for Monday in Miami.

Ex-Spy Crafted Watergate, Other Schemes (WP)

By Patricia Sullivan

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

E. Howard Hunt, 88, the shadowy former CIA man who organized the Watergate break-in and other "dirty tricks" that ultimately brought down the presidency of Richard M. Nixon, died of complications from pneumonia yesterday at a hospital in Miami.

The Watergate episode was the most notorious caper in a colorful career that included the overthrow of a Guatemalan president, oversight of a group of Cuban exiles in the Bay of Pigs fiasco and such over-the-top ideas as firebombing the Brookings Institution to distract guards while his crew burglarized the think tank.

Melodramatic and devious in character, resembling the actor Gene Hackman in appearance, Hunt donned a cheap red wig and wore a device that altered his gait while casing another burglary site -- the office of a psychiatrist to Daniel Ellsberg, who had released the classified Pentagon Papers on the Vietnam War.

Hunt recruited four of the five Cuban exiles who broke into the Democratic national headquarters at the Watergate Hotel on June 17, 1972. He was watching the burglary from an adjacent building when the group was discovered and arrested, and it was his phone number in their address books that let investigators and reporters connect the break-in to the president and his reelection campaign.

Hunt's covert background included some 20 years in the CIA, where he helped overthrow the president of Guatemala, Jacobo Arbenz Guzman, in 1954. As the CIA station chief in Mexico City, he planted false newspaper stories about politicians who were out of favor. In 1961, he was the planning director for a group of Cuban exiles who unsuccessfully attempted to overthrow Fidel Castro by invading the island at the Bay of Pigs. That's where he met Bernard Barker, Virgilio Gonzalez, Eugenio Martinez and Frank Sturgis, whom he would recruit for a covert group of "plumbers" whose job it was to fix the "leaks" that threatened the Nixon administration.

Their first job was in Los Angeles, where they broke into Ellsberg's psychiatrist's office. Back in Washington, Hunt and G. Gordon Liddy hatched the Watergate plan.

"What we were looking for is the same thing every congressional committee is looking for today, which was evidence of illegal foreign contributions," he told the Miami Herald in 1997. "That was the rationale for going in there. We'd heard rumors that both the Vietnamese and Fidel Castro were inserting funds illegally into the Democratic National Committee. And the idea was to look at the books, photograph them, in and out, and that's it. It didn't seem like such a deal to me. You know, I'd been doing that stuff for years, a 'black-bag job' into other embassies. But you know, I didn't have skilled people."

DOJ_NMG_0120885

Hunt didn't let his loyalty to Nixon prevent him from pressuring his bosses for money. In a secretly recorded conversation in March 1973 that became one of the key pieces of evidence of the White House cover-up, White House Counsel John Dean told Nixon that "we're being blackmailed. . . . Hunt now is demanding another $72,000 for his own personal expenses; another $50,000 to pay his attorneys' fees."

After some further discussion, Nixon said: "If you need the money, I mean you could get the money. . . . I mean it's not easy, but it could be done."

Nixon, facing impeachment, resigned Aug. 9, 1974.

Hunt spent 33 months in prison for his role in the Watergate burglary. He was bitter that Nixon did not stand up for him. President Ronald Reagan rejected a pardon request for Hunt in 1983.

He was born Everette Howard Hunt in Hamburg, N.Y., on Oct. 9, 1918. He graduated from Brown University in 1940 and was commissioned as a Naval Reserve officer the following year. A talented writer, he worked as a correspondent for Life magazine until he was called to active duty during World War II. He served as a gunnery officer on a destroyer.

After the war, he received a Guggenheim fellowship and worked as a screenwriter before joining the Office of Strategic Services, the precursor to the CIA. He retired from the CIA in 1970 because "I found out the CIA was just infested with Democrats," he told Slate magazine in 2004.

Throughout his life, he wrote more than 80 spy novels and thrillers, usually under such pseudonyms as John Baxter, Robert Dietrich, David St. John, P.S. Donoghue, Gordon Davis or David St. John. He described one of his leading characters, Peter Ward, who shares some of his background as a Washington-dwelling Brown graduate, as "the secret agent with the taste and the talent for fine living."

Tad Szulc, a former New York Times reporter, wrote in the 1974 book "Compulsive Spy: The Strange Career of E. Howard Hunt" that Hunt was a relatively low-level CIA officer not well thought of by most of his colleagues and superiors. Hunt's autobiography, "American Spy: My Secret History in the CIA, Watergate & Beyond," has a March publication date.

Hunt declared bankruptcy in 1997, largely blaming his Watergate fines and legal fees. A $650,000 libel settlement he was awarded in 1981 stemming from an article alleging his involvement in the assassination of President John F. Kennedy was overturned, and he received none of that money.

In the past few years, Hunt lost a leg to complications from atherosclerosis, battled lymphoma in his jaw and used an electric wheelchair to get around.

Hunt's first wife, Dorothy Wetzel Day Goutiere, was killed in the Dec. 8, 1972, plane crash of United Airlines Flight 533 in Chicago. Congress, the FBI, and the National Transportation Safety Board investigated the crash, but they did not find any basis for determining that the crash was not purely accidental. The more than $10,000 in cash found in Dorothy Hunt's handbag was generally regarded as part of the "hush money" paid to Watergate defendants in an attempt to procure their silence regarding White House involvement.

Survivors include his wife of 30 years, Laura Martin Hunt of Miami; and six children.

Who Cares About The Poor? (WSJ)

By Arthur C. Brooks

The Wall Street Journal, January 24, 2007

When control of the U.S. Congress changed hands earlier this month, it was clear that a raised minimum wage would be high on the legislative agenda. And indeed, an increase to $7.25 from $5.15 per hour raced through the House and is unlikely to face much substantive opposition in the Senate.

The Democrats have two reasons for focusing on the minimum wage. The first is poverty: $5.15 an hour is insufficient to support a family -- according to the Congressional Budget Office, about 18% of workers in 2005 making between $5.15 and the new minimum wage lived below the poverty line. Democrats believe raising the legal minimum will help solve this problem.

The Democrats' second reason for a minimum wage hike is relative (not absolute) deprivation: They hope that raising the minimum will lower income inequality, which has been a concern of the political left for generations. The Democratic National Committee defended the hike by charging, "The federal minimum wage is so disgracefully low that now, during a period of extraordinary prosperity for the nation's corporations and wealthiest families, the average CEO earns as much in just a few hours on the first workday of the year as a full-time minimum wage worker earns the entire year." The economic chasm between the CEO and the minimum wage worker, in this view, is evidence of an unjust society.

While just about everybody -- left and right -- agrees that poverty is unacceptable (although policy makers disagree as to whether a minimum wage hike would help or hurt the working poor), conservatives do not share liberals' concern about income inequality. According to the 2005 Maxwell Poll on Civic Engagement and Inequality, self-described liberals are more than twice as likely as conservatives to say income inequality in America is a "serious problem." And while 84% of liberals think the government should do more to reduce inequality, only 25% of conservatives agree.

This is empirical substantiation for the old cliché that conservatives just don't care about the poor, right? Wrong. In fact, the data do not tell us that conservatives are uncaring; they actually tell us that conservatives are optimists. Conservatives are relatively untroubled by inequality, and unsupportive of government income redistribution, because they believe the American economy provides private opportunities to succeed. Liberals are far more pessimistic than conservatives about the possibility of a better future for Americans of modest means.

Consider the evidence. While 92% of conservatives believe that hard work and perseverance can help a person overcome disadvantage, only 65% of liberals think so. This difference of opinion, contrary to the convention, is not because conservatives earn more money. In fact, lower-income conservatives are about twice as likely as upper-income liberals to say they think there's "a lot" of upward mobility in America. If a liberal and a conservative are exactly identical in income, education, sex, family situation, and race, the conservative will be 20 percentage points more likely than the liberal to say that hard work leads to success among the disadvantaged.

Naturally, well-to-do liberals must be amazed at the gullibility of the millions of poorer conservatives who still cling to the idea of America's promise of a better future through hard work and perseverance. Sunny conservatives of all economic classes may very well prefer to see things their way about America. Are conservatives naïve, or are liberals unjustifiably dour? Reasonable people disagree on this question. One thing that is clear, however, is that conservatives' lack of anxiety about income inequality -- and perhaps even their opposition to redistributive government policies -- is evidence of a light heart, not a hard one.

A Healthy, Well-Regulated Wall Street (NYT)

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

A healthy financial sector is crucial to the economic well-being of this country and to New York City in particular. And it is true that Wall Street is facing ever stiffer competition from financial markets like London's and Hong Kong's. But beware of the doomsayers who argue that American markets are in free fall and — not incidentally — contend that looser regulations are the only way to save them.

Senator Charles Schumer and Mayor Michael Bloomberg joined that chorus this week. In a new report, they warn that without changes to what they call America's "stringent regulations and high litigation risks," this country's share of the lucrative finance business will decline further, at a cost of billions of dollars and thousands of jobs.

We certainly don't want American regulations to drive away good business. But it is first important to remember that when investors lose their shirts in huge frauds like Enron, plenty of damage is done to markets as well. And any discussion about the health of our financial industry must be as honest and open as possible. This report at times seems to cull facts to prove predetermined conclusions.

For example, to support its argument that the United States markets are losing ground, the report notes that over the first 10 months of 2006, American exchanges managed barely a third of the overall share of initial public offerings that they did in 2001. It strikes us as odd that a report released in late January could not include data from the previous November. In that month, the Securities and Exchange Commission registered 32 initial public offerings worth a total of $8 billion — the highest monthly total in five years.

The report goes on to say that the number and cost of securities class-action settlements in this nation set an all-time high in 2005. That's hardly surprising, considering the many settlements in that year stemming from the enormous fraud at WorldCom. But what about last year? The number of securities fraud class-action suits fell 38 percent in 2006, to the lowest level in 10 years. And in May, prosecutors indicted the nation's leading class-action securities law firm, Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman, for allegedly making secret payments to plaintiffs.

The report raises some valuable questions, and we agree with some of its conclusions. Loosening restrictions on work visas for talented foreigners and visitor visas for dealmakers strikes us as essential. And efforts under way to reduce the costs associated with complying with Sarbanes-Oxley regulations — for example, by focusing audits on the riskiest parts of balance sheets — are a valuable recalibration of the law's most onerous provisions.

While some common-sense changes are needed, the rights of shareholders and the stability of our markets cannot be trampled in the headlong rush for competitive advantages. United States financial markets are still the largest in the world, and Wall Street just enjoyed a year of record profits. And while we're talking about reforms, financial firms might take a look in the mirror and ask whether lower underwriting fees and smaller bonuses could also contribute to their long-term health and the health of America's financial markets.

Petraeus Supports Troop Increase In Iraq (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, January 24, 2007

The general who will carry out President Bush's plan for Iraq cautioned on Tuesday against expecting quick results and used bleak terms to describe a country engulfed in war for nearly four years. Yet, he said the strategy can work as long as the Iraqis do their part.

Facing a skeptical Congress and an American public that has turned starkly against the war, Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus promised lawmakers that as top U.S. commander in Iraq, he would speak up if he determines the new approach is failing. Bush is adding 21,500 U.S. troops to secure Baghdad and Anbar Province, home to many insurgents.

"The situation in Iraq is dire," he told the Senate Armed Services Committee, which is expected to easily approve his nomination for the Iraq command. "The stakes are high. There are no easy choices. The way ahead will be very hard. ... But hard is not hopeless."

Though Petraeus was warmly received by members of the panel, the war he will help lead — and Bush's plan to prevail in it — faced a rougher reception.

White House hopeful Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., launched a sharp attack on the administration's Iraq record and called Bush's new strategy "a dead end."

"I wonder whether the clock has already run out," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, a sponsor of a GOP-led resolution saying the Senate disagrees with the build up. She said she was worried that U.S. troops in Iraq are already perceived "not as liberators, but as occupiers."

One of Congress' few vocal supporters of the war, Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., warned that upcoming votes criticizing the president's strategy would be harmful.

"No matter how well-intentioned, a resolution being opposed to this new strategy is a vote of no confidence in you," he told Petraeus. "No matter how well-intentioned, the enemy will see it as a weakened resolve."

Petraeus made his appearance as the Bush administration struggled to limit Republican defections when a Senate committee votes Wednesday on a measure declaring the president's new Iraq policy is not in the national interest.

All 11 Democrats on the Foreign Relations Committee panel are expected to support the proposal, and so far, Nebraska's Sen. Chuck Hagel is alone among 10 Republicans in favor of it.

The measure is expected to advance to the Senate floor next week, and several Republicans opposed to Bush's policy said they prefer a more mildly worded alternative. Advanced by GOP Sen. John Warner of Virginia and others, it expresses disagreement with the president's plans without criticizing them as contrary to the national interest, and also leaves open the possibility of adding troops to Anbar Province in western Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0120888

Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore., seeking re-election in 2008, said he was swinging behind Warner's proposal. "This war has devolved far beyond what we authorized," placing U.S. troops in the middle of a sectarian war between Shiites and Sunnis, he told The Associated Press.

Warner and Senate Democrats are eventually expected to try and reach a compromise on the issue. If they are successful, the result would likely be a dramatic bipartisan rejection of a commander in chief in wartime.

If confirmed, Petraeus will implement Bush's plan to send an extra 21,500 U.S. troops to Iraq — most of them to Baghdad where the general said they will operate from smaller, dispersed bases in the city to help the Iraqi security forces clear specific neighborhoods of insurgents, illegal militias and death squads.

At Tuesday's hearing, Petraeus told the lawmakers that no amount of U.S. effort will succeed unless Iraqis learn to compromise.

"Ultimately, the outcome will be determined by the Iraqis," Petraeus said.

Petraeus would replace Gen. George Casey, who has led U.S. forces in Iraq since July 2004 and has been nominated to be the next Army chief of staff.

That move was part of a broad overhaul of the Iraq war effort. In addition to replacing Donald H. Rumsfeld with Robert Gates as defense secretary, Bush announced two weeks ago that he was increasing U.S. troop levels and ordering a more robust economic development program.

Levin, a leading war policy critic, pressed Petraeus on whether the flow of additional U.S. troops could be halted in midstream if the Iraqi government failed to meet its commitment to provide thousands more Iraqi troops.

"It could," Petraeus replied. Earlier, he said there were no "specific conditions" the Iraqis must meet in order to keep the flow of U.S. forces moving.

The last of five additional U.S. brigades are scheduled to arrive in the Iraqi capital in May; the first, from the 82nd Airborne Division, got there just days ago.

Asked by Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., how long the extra troops would remain in Iraq, Petraeus said he did not know. Casey said last week they might begin leaving as soon as late summer.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., a leading proponent of Bush's plan, asked Petraeus how long he thought the U.S. buildup could be sustained.

"I am keenly aware of the strain" on the Army and Marine Corps, Petraeus said, adding that he welcomes Bush's proposal to increase the size of the land forces over the coming five years.

The concern about strains from the Iraq war also arose at a House hearing featuring the top Army and Marine Corps generals.

"We have examined other war plans and our capability to respond to those plans, and we see that we are lacking in some areas in our ability to do so," said Gen. James Conway, commandant of the Marine Corps.

"We feel we would be able to respond with those forces that are not committed to Iraq or Afghanistan — that the response would be slower than we might like," he said.

Rep. Ike Skelton, D-Mo., chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, issued a written statement expressing similar worries. And he called Bush's troop buildup in Iraq "too little, far too late."

Asked by McCain how soon he thought he would know whether the new strategy was working, Petraeus said, "We would have indicators at the least during the late summer." As currently planned, he said, the last of the five additional U.S. Army brigades would be ready to fight in Baghdad by the end of May.

Petraeus said the U.S. military needs new, "greatly increased" contributions from other federal agencies to stabilize a country torn by political divisions and hobbled by a weak economy, a battered infrastructure and corrupt police.

General Says New Strategy In Iraq Can Work Over Time (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, January 24, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0120889

WASHINGTON, Jan. 23 — Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, President Bush's new choice as the top commander in Iraq, told senators on Tuesday that the new military strategy to secure Baghdad can work, and that he had asked that the additional troops the administration promised be deployed as quickly as possible.

In his first public comments about Mr. Bush's plan to send some 21,500 troops, the general described the situation in Iraq as "dire" but not hopeless. He asserted that the "persistent presence" of American and Iraqi forces in strife-ridden Baghdad neighborhoods was a necessary step, but also cautioned that the mission would not succeed if the Iraqi government did not carry out its program of political reconciliation.

"The way ahead will be neither quick nor easy, and undoubtedly there will be tough days," he told the Senate Armed Services Committee. "We face a determined, adaptable, barbaric enemy. He will try to wait us out. In fact any such endeavor is a test of wills, and there are no guarantees."

But much of the hearing focused not on details of the strategy about to unfold in Iraq, but rather on the political debate within the Senate over resolutions that would signal disapproval of the new strategy.

When Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, who has long favored sending more troops to Iraq, asked if approval of a Senate resolution assailing Mr. Bush's new strategy could hurt the morale of American troops, the general replied, "It would not be a beneficial effect, sir."

Asked by Senator Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut, who also backs the plan, if a resolution would also "give the enemy some encouragement" by suggesting that the American people are divided, General Petraeus replied, "That's correct, sir."

That answer sparked admonishments by critics of Mr. Bush's strategy, who insisted that the point of the Senate resolutions is to put pressure on the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki of Iraq to follow through on its political program and take more responsibility for its own security.

"We know this policy is going forward," said Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, Democrat of New York. "We know the troops are moving. We know that we're not likely to stop this escalation. But we are going to do everything we can to send a message to our government and the Iraqi government that they had better change, because the enemy we are confronting is adaptable."

Senator John W. Warner, the Virginia Republican who is promoting a resolution opposing Mr. Bush's troop reinforcement plan, cautioned General Petraeus to be sure that "this colloquy has not entrapped you into some responses that you might later regret."

By the end of the hearing, General Petraeus sought to extricate himself from the political tussle by insisting that as a military man he did not want to take a position on the Senate debate. "There are a number of resolutions out there," he said. "Learning that minefields are best avoided and gone around rather than walked through on some occasions, I'd like to leave that one there."

Senator Carl Levin of Michigan, the Democratic chairman of the panel, said later that he was satisfied that the general had not intended to involve himself in the debate. The exchanges at the hearing did not appear to have any ill effect on the prospects for the confirmation of General Petraeus, and Mr. McCain said he hoped the commander would "catch the next flight" to Iraq after winning Senate confirmation.

When their questions focused on the military plan, senators elicited several new details. General Petraeus said Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the day-to-day commander of American troops in Iraq, advised that in order to carry out the new strategy, five additional brigades were needed in Baghdad and two additional battalions were needed in Anbar Province in western Iraq.

Under the current deployment schedule, it will be May before all five of the brigades are in Iraq, but General Petraeus hinted that he would like them sooner, saying that he had asked the Pentagon to dispatch them "as rapidly as possible."

General Petraeus acknowledged that the guidelines in the military's counterinsurgency manual implied that 120,000 troops would be needed to secure Baghdad. But he reasoned that the roughly 32,000 American troops that would be deployed in the capital under the plan would be enough, because the total number of American and Iraqi security personnel would be about 85,000, while the use of civilian contractors to guard government buildings would reduce troop requirements.

If the troops are sent according to the current schedule, General Petraeus said the United States would know by late summer if the plan to clear contested neighborhoods of insurgents and militias, hold them with American and Iraqi security forces and win public support through reconstruction was working.

He said he would raise the issue of suspending troop reinforcements with his military superiors if the Iraqi government appeared to have not lived up to its commitments. But he suggested that withholding assistance from specific Iraqi institutions that fall short would have a greater influence. The general also said that a decision to withdraw American troops within six months would lead to more sectarian attacks and increased “ethnic cleansing.”

General Petraeus acknowledged that he had concerns about the absence of a unified command structure. Under the new plan, the Iraqi Army and police units will be under direct Iraqi command. The American Army units that work with them will be under a parallel American command. To ensure proper coordination, American officers are trying to establish joint command posts.

Senator Levin said his committee had repeatedly asked the administration to make available a list of the security and political “benchmarks” the Iraqi had agreed to meet. He warned that the committee would use its subpoena power or hold up military nominations if benchmarks were not provided.

By insisting on that the benchmarks be provided, Mr. Levin seemed to be trying to position himself to argue that the “surge” of reinforcements be suspended if the Iraqis fell short of meeting commitments.

Petraeus Expresses Confidence In Buildup (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, the expected new top commander in Iraq, yesterday gave Congress a stark preview of the challenge ahead, saying sectarian violence has reduced Baghdad's population to a daily struggle for survival, undermined the U.S. strategy of handing responsibility to Iraqi forces and created the prospect of a "failed state."

Petraeus voiced confidence, however, in a new approach that would shift the focus to protecting the population by pushing tens of thousands of additional U.S. and Iraqi troops deep into Baghdad neighborhoods, one aimed at allowing Iraq's government to "come to grips with" what he called an "exceedingly difficult situation."

"The way ahead will be neither quick nor easy, and undoubtedly there will be tough days. We face a determined, adaptable, barbaric enemy. He will try to wait us out," Petraeus told the Senate Armed Services Committee at a confirmation hearing. "Any such endeavor is a test of wills, and there are no guarantees."

Indeed, Petraeus promised simply to provide "the best leadership and direction I can muster" and "forthright" military advice, even if he concludes the mission is lost. "Should I determine that the new strategy cannot succeed, I will provide such an assessment," he said, reassuring senator after senator that he would speak up if he believed U.S. civilian leaders were making false statements about Iraq.

Twice a commander in Iraq, Petraeus won strong endorsement from both Democratic and Republican senators as one of the U.S. military's most talented officers -- but many also wished him "Godspeed" in leading what they described as the "last chance" for the U.S. military to bring stability to Iraq.

Petraeus said he had asked Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and Marine Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, to execute the push of 21,500 U.S. troops into Iraq "as quickly as possible," saying the five additional brigades should be in place in Baghdad by May, providing a new "critical mass" to clear and hold districts of the city of 6 million people.

Asked by Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) whether he could carry out his mission without the additional troops, Petraeus said no. He said the Pentagon is planning options for continuing the buildup, and said Gates told him it was his job to request additional forces if needed. He applauded Gates's recent decision to increase the permanent size of the Army and Marine Corps by 92,000, acknowledging the stress that has depleted the readiness of U.S. ground forces.

Senior Army officers said yesterday that all the Army's combat brigades in the United States -- except for the handful on alert or ready to go overseas within a month -- are currently rated as unready to deploy. If there is another "combat scenario" involving the demand for heavy conventional forces, "that's where America is taking risk," Lt. Gen. Stephen Speakes, the Army's deputy chief of staff, told reporters.

Under questioning from senators opposed to the Iraq buildup, Petraeus allowed for the possibility that the troop flow could be aborted if the Iraqi government fails to provide three more Iraqi army brigades for Baghdad or fulfill other pledges. He said Iraqi commanders told him yesterday that three or four additional Iraqi battalions had already arrived in Baghdad, and that some of them, with predominantly Kurdish troops, were being welcomed by citizens.

He rejected the concern raised by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) that the addition of more U.S. troops would inflame the insurgency. "I think that at this point in Baghdad, the population just wants to be secure, and truthfully, they don't care who does it," he said.

Petraeus acknowledged that the strategy shift to "controlling" terrain and protecting the population would lead to heightened risks for U.S. troops, who have suffered a spike in casualties in recent days. He assured senators that U.S. troops in Baghdad would remain under an American military chain of command, though he acknowledged the complications of having a dual command chain with partnering Iraqi forces.

Despite such risks, Petraeus warned of incalculable dangers of any rapid U.S. military withdrawal from Iraq, as favored by many congressional Democrats, saying it would lead to intensified terrorist inroads, "ethnic cleansing" and a bloodbath in Baghdad.

In a move that is unusual for an active-duty officer, Petraeus also spoke against pending Senate resolutions disapproving of the new Bush administration strategy. Asked by Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) whether those resolutions would give encouragement to the enemy by exposing divisions among the American people, he replied: "That's correct."

His statement drew a sharp rebuke from Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who said, "I very sincerely but wholeheartedly disagree," saying the point was to send a message to Iraqis.

Pressed later by other senators -- including committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) and John W. Warner (R-Va.) -- Petraeus said he did not intend his statements to be taken as opposing or supporting any resolutions.

Levin, a leading critic of the administration's Iraq policy, also repeatedly urged Petraeus to hold the Iraqi government accountable on benchmarks it agreed to with President Bush. "We certainly will to the very best of our ability," Petraeus answered.

Levin then asked what leverage the United States had over the Iraqi government if it failed to perform to expectations, as it has in the past. "Providing assistance or withholding assistance in various forms," Petraeus replied, agreeing with Levin that the consequences should be "clear, real and significant."

Sen. Bill Nelson (D-Fla.) asked if Petraeus had a "high degree of confidence" that the new plan would work.

"I believe this plan can succeed if in fact all of those enablers and all the rest of the assistance is provided," Petraeus said, adding that interagency help for the war effort "needs to be substantially more robust than it is."

On a personal note, Petraeus said he fully understood the daunting job he faces.

"Many of the e-mails I've received in recent weeks have had as their subject line 'Congratulations -- I think,' " he said. "I know how heavy a rucksack I will have to shoulder in Iraq if confirmed," he said. But he said he would accept the call to "soldier again with those who are part of the brotherhood of the close fight" and out of an obligation to help the Iraqi people.

America's New Round In Iraq (CSM)

By Peter Grier

The Christian Science Monitor, January 24, 2007

Only days after President Bush announced a new US strategy for Iraq, a potentially pivotal battle for Baghdad already may have begun.

Sectarian violence in Iraq's capital has spiked in recent days, even as the first US and Iraqi government military reinforcements have deployed into the embattled city.

The car bombs that racked Baghdad Monday may not have been a response to the presence of new troops, strictly speaking. But if nothing else, they emphasize the chaos into which the city has sunk, and the prospect that the new US and Iraqi troops may be at just the beginning of what promises to be a difficult and protracted counterinsurgency campaign.

"The way ahead will be neither quick nor easy," said the incoming US commander for Iraq, Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, at his Senate confirmation hearing Tuesday.

Two bombs struck separate Shiite targets Tuesday, killing five – a day after a double car bomb killed 88 in the most deadly such attack in Baghdad in two months.

DOJ_NMG_0120892

For US troops, recent days similarly have been difficult. Twenty-eight died over the weekend, including 12 in a helicopter apparently shot down northeast of Baghdad, raising the war's US military toll to 3,064, according to an Associated Press count.

A few deadly events can distort the casualty trend lines in Iraq, notes Stephen Biddle, a senior fellow in defense policy at the Council on Foreign Relations. Thus it is easy to read too much into a difficult few days.

If anything, sectarian fighters in Baghdad soon may melt into the population, in an effort to wait out the coming surge in US and Iraqi government troops.

"My hunch is we are likely to see an artificial decrease in casualties soon," said Mr. Biddle.

That said, the White House and US military leadership are walking a number of difficult tightropes in regard to Iraq, Biddle adds. They are insisting they will stay the course, while hinting to the US public that the course will not be too long. They are warning the Iraqi government that if it does not move against Shiite death squads, the US may pull out – while at the same time insisting that US units will stay until the military job is done.

"The administration believes that a few months of calm [in Baghdad] will create momentum for reconciliation," says Biddle. "I'm concerned that nothing fundamental will have changed."

At his confirmation hearing Tuesday, General Petraeus was bluntly critical about the current situation in Iraq –perhaps more so than any Bush administration or military witness, ever.

He admitted that the current situation is dire. "Many Iraqis in Baghdad today confront life-or-death, stay-or-leave decisions on a daily basis, just to feed their children," he said.

Three of four promised battalions of Iraqi troops have already deployed into Baghdad, said Petraeus. All have more than 80 percent of their troops present.

On the US side, the 82nd Airborne Division's 2nd Brigade Combat team has also moved into Baghdad as part of the first of wave of US reinforcements. The paratroopers had been based in Kuwait as an Army ready reserve for the region.

The Iraqi and US forces will now provide a "persistent presence" in violence-racked Baghdad neighborhoods, said Petraeus, by living in 20 to 30 police stations or other fortified forward posts.

Setting this up won't be a quick operation. "It will take time for the additional forces to flow into Baghdad, and time for them to gain an understanding of the areas in which they will operate," said the new Iraq commander.

And the US command is fully aware that time may not be on their side, in this case. "My concern is that [the] timeline that we see needed is not the same timeline that the country is prepared to provide us," said Marine Commandant Gen. James Conway Tuesday at a hearing of the House Armed Services Committee.

Petraeus is not beloved by everyone in the US military. Some grumble that he is fond of press attention, among other things. At one point in his hearing, he did offhandedly remark about a conversation he had had with former NBC news anchor Tom Brokaw.

For the short term, however, the prospect of Petraeus as the new Iraq commander appeared to hearten the Senate Armed Services Committee, at the least. Sen. Edward Kennedy (D) of Massachusetts, for instance, quickly announced that he intended to vote for Petraeus's confirmation despite reservations about President Bush's policies.

Unsurprisingly, the questions of each key lawmaker said as much about them as they did about the general before them. Thus the panel chairman, Sen. Carl Levin (D) of Michigan, pressed Petraeus as to whether he believed the Iraqis would live up to their commitments. Sen. John McCain (R) of Arizona, a longtime proponent of a surge in US forces, asked whether the planned increase would be enough, and whether US forces now could withstand the strain of added deployments.

"I am keenly aware of the strain" on US troops, said Petraeus.

Blunt Commander Nominee Says 'Hard Is Not Hopeless' (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — President Bush's nominee to be the next commander in Iraq, Army Lt. Gen. David H. Petraeus, told Congress on Tuesday that the situation there is dire and poses "tough days" ahead, but he pleaded for time to begin executing a new strategy.

DOJ_NMG_0120893

Petraeus, a Princeton University Ph.D. who developed the Army's counterinsurgency warfare manual, is expected to win Senate approval later this week. But as Petraeus fielded questions from senators of both parties about the deepening dilemma facing U.S. forces, he was forthcoming and occasionally blunt in his assessment of American odds in the war-torn country.

"The situation in Iraq is dire. The stakes are high. There are no easy choices. The way ahead will be very hard," he said. "But hard is not hopeless."

If confirmed as a replacement for Army Gen. George W. Casey, Petraeus would represent the first step in a military restructuring ordered by Bush as part of his new strategy to send in 21,500 additional U.S. troops. Navy Adm. William J. Fallon faces a hearing Jan. 30 to succeed retiring Gen. John P. Abizaid as commander of U.S. forces throughout the Middle East.

Throughout his hearing, Petraeus appeared assured and confident, answering questions crisply and directly. Asked by Sen. Joe Lieberman, I-Conn. if passage of a resolution denouncing the new Bush strategy would show the enemy that the American people are divided, Petraeus answered yes, it would.

After other senators -- both Republicans and Democrats -- objected, Petraeus backed away. When Sen. John Thune, R-S.D., tried to get him to take another swipe at the resolution, Petraeus became more diplomatic.

"Learning that mine fields are best avoided and gone around rather than walked through on some occasions, I'd like to leave that one there, senator," Petraeus said.

Petraeus has served two tours of duty in Iraq, first as commander of the 101st Airborne Division and then as the general overseeing the training of Iraqi forces. For the past 15 months, he has been the commanding general at Ft. Leavenworth, supervising much of the Army's education system and developing the military's war fighting doctrine, including the new counterinsurgency manual.

At Fort Leavenworth and in the pages of the Army's academic journal, Petraeus has argued the most important goal in a counterinsurgency fight is making the population feel safe. And on Capitol Hill on Tuesday, Petraeus said that would be the cornerstone of the new strategy.

He said the sectarian violence in Baghdad amounted to "soft ethnic cleansing" and described the risks taken by ordinary Iraqi citizens every day as "incalculable." The erosion of security, he argued, had become the primary challenge for the U.S.

So rather than focusing on training the Iraqis, the new priority would be improving security in Baghdad. The new strategy, he argued, was as important as the additional forces.

"The objective will be to achieve sufficient security to provide the space and time for the Iraqi government to come to grips with the tough decisions its members must make to enable Iraq to move forward," Petraeus said.

Skeptics of the surge latched on to the counterinsurgency manual arguing that for every 50 people, one police officer or soldier is needed. Under that formula, securing Baghdad, a city of 6 million, would require at least 120,000 Iraqi and U.S. troops. By Petraeus' count, once the additional U.S. forces arrive, there will be 85,000 U.S. and Iraqi troops in Baghdad.

"You wrote the book, general, but the policy is not by the book," said Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., a member of the committee and a presidential contender in 2008. "And you are being asked to square the circle, to find a military solution to a political crisis."

Petraeus argued that the additional brigades flowing into Baghdad would double the number of U.S. forces in the city.

Despite Clinton's attack on the Bush administration plan, she said she would support Petraeus' nomination.

"The president is going forward with the policy, the debate is academic," Clinton said outside the hearing room. "I want the very best leadership for the young men and women who will be implementing this strategy, and I have no doubt Gen. Petraeus is the person to try and pull this off."

It will be late May before the full complement of five additional U.S. brigades arrives in Baghdad, Petraeus said. Petraeus said he would not need all the new units to begin executing the new strategy but would like to have many of the extra forces to begin the shift in earnest.

"I think you have to wait until you have a certain critical mass of forces on the ground to take action," Petraeus said.

Petraeus promised senators skeptical of the administration's plan that he would provide them regular updates. But he cautioned it would not be until all the additional forces are in place before he would get a real sense of whether the plan was working.

DOJ_NMG_0120894

"I would think that we would have indicators at the least during the late summer of the ability to clear and hold and then build in the Baghdad area and to secure that population," he said.

Before troops move into an area, Petraeus suggested, U.S. units would need to assess their partner Iraqi units, meet the local leaders and learn about the localized sectarian tensions. Only then could U.S. forces successfully "hold and build" an area.

Petraeus said the new strategy has been tried with success in Fallouja and Tall Afar, where the U.S. moved to create "gated communities" to monitor and control the flow of people in and out of an area.

But the strategy, Petraeus emphasized throughout the hearing, would require time to work and patience from the Congress and public.

"None of this will be rapid," he said. "In fact, the way ahead will be neither quick nor easy, and there undoubtedly will be tough days."

Anti-surge Efforts Called Enemy Hope (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, January 24, 2007

The next U.S. commander for Iraq told Congress yesterday that pending Senate resolutions against a surge of more than 21,000 troops give the enemy hope by depicting America as divided on winning the war.

Army Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, President Bush's choice to take over command in Iraq and change the tide of a deteriorating battle, revealed his assessment in questioning from the Senate's two leading war hawks: Sens. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and Joe Lieberman, Connecticut independent.

Mr. McCain, who supports a larger troop increase, asked what the results would be if senators "tell those troops that we support you, but we are convinced that you cannot accomplish your mission. ... What effect does that have on the morale?"

"Well, it would not be a beneficial effect, sir," Gen. Petraeus replied during a confirmation hearing to four-star rank before the Senate Armed Services Committee. "Obviously, a commander would like to go forward with as much flexibility as he can achieve."

Mr. Lieberman tried to pull Gen. Petraeus further into the upcoming Senate debate. He asked what effect an anti-surge Senate resolution would have on the enemy. After praising the U.S. system of open political debate, the general added, "having said that, a commander in such an endeavor would obviously like the enemy to feel that there's no hope."

"A Senate-passed resolution of disapproval for this new strategy in Iraq would give the enemy some encouragement," Mr. Lieberman said, to which Gen. Petraeus answered, "That's correct, sir."

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee is set to vote today on a nonbinding resolution from Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, that condemns Mr. Bush's plan. Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, has garnered bipartisan support for another resolution critical of the surge.

Gen. Petraeus spent much of the hearing explaining his views on counterinsurgency, assessing the "dire"situation in Iraq and predicting the troop surge can succeed. He testified that the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has taken steps to change policy by bulking up Iraqi forces in Baghdad.

"The situation in Iraq is dire," he said. "The stakes are high. There are no easy choices. The way ahead will be very hard."

Gen. Petraeus, whose confirmation is expected by the full Senate, is to replace Army Gen. George Casey, whom Mr. Bush has selected as Army chief of staff. His hearing was the first of two confirmation proceedings that will change the nearly four-year war's military leadership. Next up is Adm. William J. Fallon, who is to replace Army Gen. John Abizaid as head of U.S. Central Command, which includes Iraq.

Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat and the committee chairman, expressed doubts that Mr. al-Maliki would keep his promise. Mr. al-Maliki had refused to order his military to crush the death squad forces of radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, who controls Shi'ite members in parliament who support Mr. al-Maliki.

"They have not complied with previous commitments that they've made," said Mr. Levin, who advocates a predetermined phased withdrawal of all U.S. forces. "I'm very doubtful, as one senator, that it's likely they're going to carry out the other commitments that they have made. I just think history should make us very dubious about the likelihood that they are going to carry out these critically important commitments."

Mr. Bush announced a surge to about 155,000 troops in what may be the last major bid to put down Sunni-Shi'ite sectarian violence and defeat al Qaeda in Iraq.

In Gen. Petraeus, Mr. Bush tapped a commander who led part of the force that invaded Iraq in 2003 and who then returned to the country to train its emerging security force. The general is commander of the U.S. Army Combined Arms Center at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., and oversaw the writing of the military's new counterinsurgency manual, which states that too many troops can alienate civilians and push them to supporting the insurgents.

Gen. Petraeus said, "I think that at this point in Baghdad, the population just wants to be secure. And truthfully, they don't care who does it."

Petraeus Criticizes Anti-surge Resolutions During Hearing (HILL)

By Roxana Tiron

The Hill, January 24, 2007

In a rare move for a uniformed officer, Lt. Gen. David Petraeus, considered a shoo-in to become America's next top commander in Iraq, jumped into the political fray of his nomination hearing.

Prompted by presidential hopeful and Armed Services Committee ranking member Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), Petraeus spoke out against congressional attempts to pass resolutions of disapproval on the new White House strategy in Iraq, which includes a troop increase of 21,500.

In response to a question from McCain regarding the effect of such congressional resolutions on troops, Petraeus said, "It would not be a beneficial effect, sir."

McCain supports sending additional U.S. troops to Iraq, and is at odds with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), another presidential hopeful and member of the Armed Services panel.

When Sen. Joe Lieberman (I-Conn.), a strong supporter of the Bush administration's strategy for Iraq, later asked Petraeus whether the resolutions of disapproval would encourage the enemies in Iraq, the officer said: "That's correct."

"This is a test of will," he said, adding that as commander he would like "the enemy to feel that there is no hope." He stressed, however, that he respects freedom of speech and the discussions taking place in Congress.

Lieberman used the nomination hearing to ask his colleagues to defer the resolutions of disapproval and give both the "surge" plan and Petraeus a chance at success, "perhaps a last chance."

"If, God forbid, you are unable to succeed there will be plenty of time for resolutions of disapproval," Lieberman said.

Clinton, however, rebuked criticism of congressional attempts to condemn the president's Iraq plan. Clinton is authoring legislation that would require Bush to secure congressional consent for any troop increases above this month's level and set several other conditions for political and security progress before Iraqi troops receive further funding.

"I very sincerely but wholeheartedly disagree with those who are trying to up the rhetoric about our position in Iraq," Clinton said, adding that the resolutions' goal is to send a message to the Iraqis.

"It has nothing to do with the loyalty, the warrior skills and the leadership of our men and women," she said. "It has to do with years of lost opportunity and the failures of the Iraqis to step up and take responsibility."

She told reporters that the U.S. troops, by virtue of their access to the Internet, recognize "that there is a debate in this country." "This debate is academic," she added.

Clinton acknowledged that there is little Congress can do to stop an "escalation" already in progress, saying, "We know that this policy is going forward." She urged Petraeus to ask Congress for all resources necessary to provide the troops with the adequate equipment.

Clinton, who is giving her support to Petraeus, called the nominee "a very good soldier."

Petraeus's stance against the resolutions of disapproval, combined with Lieberman's rhetoric, sent Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), a co-sponsor of such a resolution, on the defensive. "The American people are not divided in their support for our troops.

DOJ_NMG_0120896

The American people are not divided in wishing you all the success in the world, despite our disagreement with the strategy," Collins said.

"And I must say that the resolution that I've been working on with Sen. Ben Nelson (D-Neb.) and Sen. [John] Warner (R-Va.) is very clear in expressing support for our troops," she added.

Warner also came to the defense of the congressional debate surrounding the surge plan. "We're trying to exercise the fundamental responsibilities of our democracy and how this nation has two co-equal branches of the government, each bearing its own responsibilities," he said.

"I hope that this colloquy has not entrapped you into some responses that you might later regret."

Petraeus predicted "tough days" ahead in Iraq. "None of this will be rapid," he told the Senate Armed Services Committee. "The way ahead will be neither quick nor easy." However, he voiced confidence in the administration's plan to send thousands of additional troops into Baghdad. He said he would not be able to carry out his assignment as top U.S. commander successfully without the additional troops.

But Petraeus encountered criticism from members of the panel for his planned implementation of a policy contrary to views he expressed in a manual he wrote on counterinsurgency. He wrote there that any counterinsurgency force should have at least 20 soldiers for every 1,000 members of the local population. That would require a force of at least 120,000 for Baghdad, a much higher number than the 85,000 combined U.S.-Iraqi force there

Clinton said she feared that Petraeus is being sent to administer a policy that "does not reflect your experience."

"You wrote the book, general, but the policy is not by the book," Clinton said.

Petraeus commanded the Army's 101st Airborne Division during the 2003 invasion of Iraq. He was later assigned to stabilize Iraq's third-largest city, Mosul.

He served for 15 months in 2004–05 as head of the U.S. effort to train Iraqi security forces. After that he was assigned to Fort Leavenworth, Kan., where he was in charge of revising the counterinsurgency manual.

Leave Politics To Us, Warner Tells General (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks

The Washington Post, January 24, 2007

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) asked Army Lt. Gen. David H . Petraeus during his confirmation hearing yesterday if Senate resolutions condemning White House Iraq policy "would give the enemy some comfort."

Petraeus agreed they would, saying, "That's correct, sir."

Sen. John W. Warner (R-Va.), until recently chairman of the Armed Services Committee and a co-sponsor of one of those resolutions, later explained to the general that he needed to be more careful about appearing to wade into a political debate and warned Petraeus to not let himself be trapped into portraying members of Congress as unpatriotic for disagreeing with President Bush:

We're not a division here today of patriots who support the troops and those who are making statements and working on resolutions that could be translated as aiding and abetting the enemy. We're trying to exercise the fundamental responsibilities of our democracy and how this nation has two co-equal branches of the government, each bearing its own responsibilities.

I hope that this colloquy has not entrapped you into some responses that you might later regret. I wonder if you would just give me the assurance that you'll go back and examine the transcript as to what you replied with respect to certain of these questions and review it, because we want you to succeed.

. . . I'm very proud of this committee and I don't want an impression, certainly among the armed forces, that we're not all steadfast behind them.

General: Iraq Situation 'Dire' But Not Hopeless (USAT)

By Tom Vanden Brook

USA Today, January 24, 2007

WASHINGTON — The commander chosen to implement President Bush's new strategy in Iraq warned a Senate panel on Tuesday of tough days ahead there.

DOJ_NMG_0120897

"The situation in Iraq is dire," Lt. Gen. David Petraeus told lawmakers skeptical of the plan to commit 21,500 more troops and an additional $1 billion in aid.

"The stakes are high. There are no easy choices. The way ahead will be very hard. … But hard is not hopeless," Petraeus said at a Senate hearing on his nomination to lead U.S. forces in Iraq.

Petraeus and the chiefs of the Army and Marine Corps converged on Capitol Hill on Tuesday, fielding questions from lawmakers about Bush's plan and troop readiness.

Nobody has announced opposition to Petraeus' nomination, and Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, D-Mich., said after the hearing that a vote will come quickly.

Petraeus has served two tours of duty in Iraq, one as commander of the 101st Airborne Division and another as the top trainer of Iraqi forces. He recently co-authored the Army and Marine Corps manual on counterinsurgency, a type of troop-intensive warfare that emphasizes security for local populations.

Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., who has announced initial steps to enter the race for president, said Bush's plan "inspires skepticism for good reason." She accused former Defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld of refusing to adapt to increasing violence in Iraq and the previous Republican-led Congress for failing to challenge the administration's strategy there. She said she disapproved of the plan and called it a "dead end."

Supporters of the president's plan, including Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., another probable 2008 presidential candidate, also criticized the administration's approach in Iraq.

"We've made many, many mistakes in this war," McCain said. Among them, he said, were sending too few troops for the initial invasion in March 2003 and not responding to the "hostile actions" of Iraqi religious sects.

Sen. Joe Lieberman, an independent from Connecticut who is allied with the Democrats, pleaded with colleagues to reconsider adopting resolutions that oppose Bush's policy, which he called "perhaps a last chance to succeed in Iraq."

Lieberman asked Petraeus whether the resolutions could be interpreted as encouraging the enemy.

"That's correct, sir," Petraeus said.

Later, Petraeus said he was not taking a stand on the resolutions.

In the House Armed Services Committee, Chairman Ike Skelton, D-Mo., said Bush's plan would overextend U.S. forces and hinder their ability to deal with threats.

"Because I am convinced a 20,000-troop increase is too little far too late to make a difference in Iraq's security, this is a trade-off I cannot support," Skelton said.

Gen. Peter Schoomaker, the Army's chief of staff, told the committee that troops going into Iraq and Afghanistan are properly trained and equipped. But he said he had concerns about the military's readiness to fight other battles.

Schoomaker recently announced his retirement.

Marine Corps Commandant Gen. James Conway said that the response to threats outside Iraq and Afghanistan would be slower than he would like and that the military would not be equipped as it should.

"There is certainly a risk associated with that," Conway said.

Petraeus Discourages Anti-war Resolutions (POL)

By Christian Lowe

The Politico, January 24, 2007

Though he would have preferred to sidestep the political debate in the Senate over Iraq policy, Lt. Gen. David Petraeus said yesterday that resolutions opposing the administration's "surge" strategy would give the enemy encouragement and the impression that America is divided.
